Beltsar puts the stick down the well. He h grabs her hands, pulling her up the last few feet. Desiree lays on the ground, crying, while Beltsa is able to talk. "Thank you, thank you, Beltsar," she says, crying into his shirt. "I've never had a

"I couldn't let you die," he answers, and the two children sit together for a long time, until they finally stand up and start home. Barbara and I are quiet as we watch them together; while neither of us mention it, in our secret hearts, we wish that we could just leave them alone to be best friends, and that we did not have to manipulate their relationship.

The chapter describes how the Illuminati manipulate a person's maternal and paternal instincts to buttress programming and cult loyalty. Like in the Jesuits and other occult societies, children are valued in the Illuminati not so much as family members to cherish but as assets to deploy. For instance, a socially astute, intelligent and diligent child might one day raise the family's status by rising in the ranks, and a beautiful child might gain the parent favor if a higher-ranking member shows pedophilic interest in that child. The first child of an Illuminati female is also sacrificed as a proof of loyalty and mark of adulthood. Rarely, at other times, biological children may be sacrificed in rituals to gain spiritual power and social standing.

My memories as Ana show one more use of children in the Illuminati: to hold the adolescent parents' amnesia, mind control and loyalty, before they are old enough to marry and have children as respectable adult citizens. Being forced to give away a child is no less painful than being forced to kill it. When I first remembered baby David, I was emotionally overwhelmed and cried for several days as I recalled his birth, and the wrenching feelings of having to let him go to be fostered by another family after being allowed to spend weeks with him. He was fostered by a well-to-do family in France that were a minor branch of the Rothschilds. Over the years, whenever I was in France, I was allowed time to spend with him. Today, this son is a politician in Europe.

Male children in the Illuminati also need a love bond to keep the cult host and presenters hostage and to maintain full amnesia for the non-cult presenters. As described in this chapter, this is accomplished by allowing the boys when young to have a special childhood friend that they become close to, and feel very protective of. During childhood, the boy is allowed to rescue their female friend from life-threatening danger such as the scene described above, or from being sold or trafficked by the female's family; or whatever setup the programmers believe will be most effective based on the children's personalities. Once the boy becomes a teen, this close childhood friend becomes his lover, and the bond is strengthened even further into a romantic bond. The teenage boy is then made to understand that the life of the young woman he loves depends upon his non-cult presentation maintaining their amnesia to cult activities, and his continued obedience to the cult. Over the years, the boy and later man is allowed romantic interludes with this childhood friend to maintain the bond – and ensure the amnesia and cult loyalty. Often, the programmers will put the boy or man through virtual reality scenarios or staged scenarios of his lover's extensive torture and death to inculcate a very concrete terror of disobeying the cult or breaking his amnesia programming.

The hidden children are one reason among many why it can be very difficult for survivors to question their amnesia, resolve programming, or resist returning to the cult. It is tremendously painful to lose access to this child (or children, if the person has been given more than one hidden child), and seemingly unbearable to refuse to return the cult if the children are threatened with torture or death by the cult. Often, if an adult is trying to leave the cult, this hidden child is sent to him or her to beg him or her to return and/or stop questioning his or her programming. Sometimes, this child will show his mother or father marks on their bodies and/or look starved, in order to 'prove' to their parent that the cult is hurting the child because of the parents' resisting the cult. The presenters will typically, especially early on the healing journey, have no conscious memory of having seen their child. Nonetheless, the child's pleas will usually trigger anti-healing symptoms such as increased panic about healing, denial, difficulty engaging in therapy, migraines, turning up for a ritual night, and so on. It has caused me many, many tears and heartbreak to continue resisting the internal urges or external pleas/orders to return to the cult. What helps me to stand is praying for strength from God, and reminding myself and other parts in my system that what my children need the most from me is not for me to return to the cult, but to show them that it is possible for people to get out.

Chapter 7: Rothschild Procurateur

I am 16 years old, and I am in my Illuminati presenter, Anagram. I am sitting at a table in a beautifully appointed banqueting room that has rich, velvet draperies, round tables with pure white silken tablecloths, genuine silverware, and glasses made from the finest Waterford crystal. The place is lit by crystal chandeliers and filled with the murmur of conversation in numerous languages from those who are dining. Across from me sits David Rothschild. I have known him since early childhood, since part of my training was in the French house, where I was sexually abused by him and his siblings like a toy and plaything as their right and due. I am only Battenberg's bastard child to them. I was allowed to be tutored by a French nanny in manners only because Philip Battenberg asked for this favor. Even now, my skin crawls as I sit with David, but I cover my distaste completely. While I am too old to sexually amuse David, he likes my quick wit and intelligence, and so he has remained friends with me over the years.

The food is superb, but it tastes like ashes in my mouth. David has bought me a custom-made Dior gown for the evening as he usually does for those he takes out on the town. He has a need to control exactly what I wear when we are out in public together with his other friends. He wants to show me off like a doll. I play the part well, with sophisticated makeup, and glittering jewels around my neck and on my fingers. As expected, I am smiling with a hint of seductiveness at all around the table, creating envy which David basks in.

After dinner and a light sorbet to finish off the meal, the reason we are here in this place begins. The diners turn their attention to the circular platform in the middle of the room. A soft light from above clearly illuminates a young teenage girl brought to the platform and chained to a pillar that runs down its middle from floor to ceiling. This is the great auction house on a private estate outside of Paris, and David is here to make some bids. He is not going to bid this early in the evening, so he and I make small jokes back and forth while one after another, teens of both sexes are brought out and sold to their fates at the hands of the wealthy private individuals or exclusive brothels that can afford the prices here.

As the evening goes on, the children chained to the pillar get younger and younger. It is two a.m. now. Deep inside, I hate what I am doing but I must play my role perfectly. I see that David's interest is piqued by a pair of cute twin boys who are three years old. He looks at me, and asks, “What do you think, Ana?”

David trusts my opinion since he believes I have a “discerning eye” for those that he would enjoy the most. His look makes me want to crawl away, but I have a job to do. “No,” I tell him in French. “Wait. They will bring better out later.” And they do. There are children trained to do special things, things that he enjoys. There is one little girl that is two years old, and already can perform one of his favorite acts.

As he looks my way, I nod, and then he tells his procurator, “Buy it.” Not “her”, but “it”, for this is the view that David and other members of this wealthy family have of expendable young children. I feel a deep sadness, for I know that later, David will want me to spend time with him and the child, that he will humiliate me by ripping off the designer dress that costs thousands, ask me to do unthinkable things, and then he will abuse and kill this young child. I think about how my mother has told me and my twin sister over and over again since our earlier years about how lucky we were that we were fathered by a high-ranking, well-respected Illuminati man who considered us useful rather than expendable. But, I do not consider myself one bit lucky to have been born into this system of evil, and the older I get, the more I despise myself for being part of perpetuating it. At the same time, I also feel completely trapped, because disobedience means pain, humiliation and the threat of my family being hurt.

Scenes such as the above are one among several in my life that illustrate why many years ago, the Jesuits chose to program female agents. While a male agent could have played the same role that Ana did, they wanted individuals of both sexes to meet the variety of emotional and other preferences that those raised within wealthy families might have. Some men prefer a woman's advice, while others prefer a man's, and the Jesuits have agents to fit either preference. It was also useful to have female agents on missions against individuals or cultures that were misogynistic because they tended to underestimate or dismiss females.

Ana, as the Illuminati cult presenter, only had memories of her Illuminati cult life and her lives as Illuminati non-cult presenters or cover identities in France, Germany, the UK and the USA. She did not know that her 'memories' of being a bastard child of a Battenberg leader was a script that she was programmed with by the Jesuits. She was completely amnesic to Rome and the fathers there, and did not know that other parts were reporting her observations and knowledge about the Illuminati back to the Jesuit fathers in Rome. She had no idea that Luke (Luce), the Jesuit cult presenter, was watching everything through her eyes. Nonetheless, deep inside, both Ana and Luke were equally sickened by their role in the trafficking of children, but yet felt powerless to change their lives. During this time in my life, I was the Order's programmed and mind-controlled slave. They had carefully trained and prepared me to carry out such jobs, and taught me over many years that the reward for obedience was 'love' and 'acceptance'. To have said "No" would have incurred wrath, emotional abandonment, torture and even death, not only for myself, but those I loved within the Order, including brothers and sisters. I had already experienced this type of deep, horrendous emotional pain once at age 14, and at age 16 – still a child in many cultures – I was unable to face a possible repetition of this pain.

When I first recovered this memory of the auction house and time spent with David, I did what I referred to as "toilet therapy" - heaving over a toilet from the emotional pain and anguish - for several days. I had trouble putting together the types of scenarios that I engaged in with these individuals, with the 'normal' and 'Christian' life I had formerly believed I had lived. The utter carelessness for pain, suffering and human life, the terrible auctioning of children, grieved me beyond my ability to emotionally cope with. For the past several years, I have volunteered with anti-trafficking agencies, because I can never forget the looks in the eyes of the children being auctioned, the fear, bewilderment, and the despair generated by the knowledge of what might happen as they were auctioned to men and women around the glittering room. Because I myself was trafficked as a very young child at wealthy parties (as described in the first book in this series, Never Give Up*), I also knew all too well the painful fate that awaited the 'disposable' children. Even writing this chapter, deep grief wells up within me, knowing that even today, children are being auctioned in places such as this, secret auctions on private estates and clubs that the public will never know about. My hope is that by exposing even part of this terrible industry in this chapter, more people will be motivated to say "This must be stopped!" and then take action to do something to fight the trafficking of young children.*

Chapter 8: Satan's Generals

I am 17 years old, and I am participating in a very special ceremony. Tonight, I and two other Jesuit fathers will join the ranks of the generals of the Jesuit army. On the occultic, non-public side of the Order, there are 12 generals under the direct the leadership of the occultic Superior General. This hidden Superior General is a different individual from the one who takes the office publicly; the Jesuit Order maintains two faces – a public, Catholic one for the world at large, and a secret occultic one that is openly Satanic. The Order teaches that Satan has 12 mighty generals who surround his throne. Each of these are large, muscular and intimidating spiritual beings. The 12 generals of the Order are a reflection of the 12 generals of hell, reflecting the dark spiritual hierarchy here in the natural realms.

We are all gathered in the room where Satan's throne is. This is a room at a secret level of the Vatican that is protected by numerous security measures and technology. Within it sits a large golden throne with a golden altar. Allegedly, this room was constructed hundreds of years ago, at great cost, by a master architect and his masons. The workers were required to stay at the Vatican the entire time. They were fed and treated well, but were not allowed to interact with anyone outside of the Vatican during the construction of this room. When it was completed, with beautiful floors of expensive stone, ornate pillars gilded with gold, and the golden throne was installed, the architect and his workers were then all killed in a huge ritual. This was in order to ensure absolute secrecy. The families were all told that there was an unfortunate "cave in" and that all the workers had died. These families were given substantial sums of money to recompense their loss, but there naturally was deep suspicion regarding this story by many family members. Whether this account is true or not, the room is real, and no one outside of the Order and certain members of other occultic groups even know it exists.

A huge sacrifice is being done on the golden altar as the other fathers and I chant in worship, while we ask Satan to allow us entrance into hell. After a time, a dark opening in the room appears. It gets wider, and there are steps that descend down. Conner looks a little nervous, Vitali is sweating, and I feel a chill down my spine. There is a dark silence, oppression, and odd smell associated with these steps down into the dark. Taking a deep breath for courage, the other two young fathers and I slowly descend the stairs, going deeper and deeper into the earth. We are descending into hell, where Satan and his 12 generals rule.

The room we descend into is huge. It looks as if it were carved from the earth itself, with rock pillars and grottoes everywhere. There are flickering lights and by this low illumination I see a huge throne of smooth gleaming black stone. On it sits Satan. He is in his hideous form here, a huge, towering, black hulking figure. Around him are 12 enormous spiritual beings in a semi-circle. Each being is clad in armor, and holds a sword made of shining, black metal in his hand. I am trembling, as we three young generals-to-be come towards the throne which towers above us. Each of us kneels on one knee, then we prostrate ourselves on the hard rock floor, waiting. There is utter silence for a minute.

Then, a deep voice asks, "What is your wish?"

"To serve in your army and to lead well," we each say in unison, as we have been told to reply. "To conquer the earth for you, and to vanquish your foes."

Satan then calls Conner forward. Conner is his childhood name; now he is Father Peter, and so Satan addresses him as Peter. "Upon this rock I will build my church," he growls at Conner. I wonder at Satan's use of the scripture that speaks so negatively of him, but I am also spellbound as I watch the encounter.

"Kneel before me," Satan tells Conner. He does. Satan places his hand on Conner's head, and then whispers a name into his ear. He is telling Conner his general's name. This is a secret now, but will be announced later in another public ceremony once we go back above.

Vitali is called forward, and the process of receiving his name is repeated. Finally, Satan calls me forward. I kneel on one knee before him, and he pauses. "You and I had a difficult time not long ago," he tells me softly, "which makes this all the sweeter to me now." He leans over and whispers into my ear, "Your name is Basrat, and you will rise in rank with the others and do great things for me."

I rise. We all raise our swords, the beautiful swords with jeweled handles that were hanging in sheaths from a girth around our waists, and salute Satan, our supreme general, rapping our hands over our hearts in the Roman loyalty salute. The generals of hell look down upon us human beings with scrutinizing looks, as if measuring our worth to take on this great honor. Satan nods, giving us permission to leave, and the three of us salute again, then turn and slowly walk up the stone stairs that lead back to the secret room in the Vatican, the room with the golden throne in it.

We believe that we have been to hell and back. The terror we felt throughout the experience is indescribable and our relief at being allowed to return above is equally intense. When we return, the fathers are delighted. They are also thankful as visits to hell, even when supposedly to be honored, can sometimes go awry. Another sacrifice is done, and then we all go into a room next door laid with a magnificent banquet, with golden cups, plates, and silverware. Candles in golden holders flicker softly.

"To the new generals!" Father Mattheo says, holding his goblet up high. He had become the Superior General on the occultic side of the Order two years prior, and is pleased that we have become generals. He had lost one general in a very dangerous mission several weeks ago, and two of his current generals are getting older. They are ready to retire and become consultants, or Senators as they are called in the Order. We three will enter at the lowest rank: 12th general, 11th general, and 10th general to fill these places. I (Father Luke) am 11th general, Conner (Father Peter) is 10th, and Vitali (Father Thomas) is 12th. After the dinner honoring us, one by one we go into Mattheo's office, and privately tell him our general names. From now on, when we meet with the other generals, we will be addressed by this name.

The twelve generals in the Jesuit Order are in charge of strategy and planning operations on the national, regional and global scales, coordinating the efforts of the many Jesuit agents around the world. They are expected to anticipate or at least respond quickly to any national crisis or other events that could threaten the interests of the Order, and to create, implement, assess and monitor short-term and long-term plans in all regions. The younger, less experienced generals are often given smaller, or less vital, areas of the world to plan operations for, with close mentoring from the older generals and senators. Always, always, their agenda is to establish and strengthen Satan's control over the earth, through any means possible. This can include bribery, assassinations, blackmail, and other means to ensure that the country under a general's control will assist the Order – and Satan – in his plans for that country, and to help pave the way for the coming of the man one day that they call variously "The Light of the World," "The Hope of the World" or "The Anointed One." Because of its strategic and spiritual importance, Jerusalem and the land of Israel are always under the leadership of the first general.

As the generals become older, and retire from this role, they will step into the less demanding role of a Senator. The Senator role is given to members of the Order with wisdom and experience gained from years of helping to strategize world operations as a general, or other key leadership positions in other critical areas such as mage craft, programming, political analysis and so on. Senators are often rewarded for their lifetime of service to the Order with a beautiful villa in Italy. The younger fathers and mentees love to visit these villas, and enjoy having a cup of tea or coffee with a beloved older mentor in this luxurious setting. The Order rewards those who stay loyal well – at least financially. This is one thing that made my complete poverty when leaving the Order difficult at first, but I learned to adjust to this lifestyle, realizing that the price of a villa – staying loyal to a cruel master that enjoyed hurting human beings - was far too great to pay.

While I was in the Order, I believed that Satan and the other dark spiritual beings were in charge of hell, and could open up a passageway into hell for human beings to visit. I now believe that this was another deception, one where Satan labelled an underground location 'hell' and filled it with unspeakable horror and oppression whenever human beings visited. I also no longer believe the unbiblical position that Satan is in charge of hell. While I believe that this memory reflects a genuine physical encounter with Satan and his supposed 'hell', I also believe that many of my memories of hell and similar locations were actually setups in the programming studios accomplished through elaborate props, virtual reality and other technologies. As described in my first book Never Give Up, the programmers put children through such staged versions of spiritual experiences early in their life in order to indoctrinate and prepare the children to experience the 'real' events later in life.

Chapter 9: Joining the 33

I am 17 years old, a few months after becoming a general. I am extremely busy. Not only am I working hard at my new duties as a general, but I am continuing to work as a trainer and scientist, and spend time maintaining my cover identities in various countries. One day, there is a knock at my office door. I stifle a sigh. Despite having my own private space for work, it is a rare hour that passes without some kind of interruption.

"Come in," I say.

A young man in his late 20s, Father Theophilus, or Phil as I call him, enters the room.

"Hey, Luce," he says in greeting. He is in his father's robes today, as many are when they are not in lab clothes, or military dress, or in civilian clothes in order to go out and about in the city. The black robes are very comfortable and the fathers have the pick of high-quality fabrics when ordering their robes. Phil is an extremely handsome man and a real charmer. He grins at me and I grin back.

"I have something to tell you," he says, his tone turning serious. "I want you to join the 33".

I look at him, unsurprised. Others had told me that I would probably be tapped soon to join them. The Vatican 33 is the Jesuit Order's assassin corp. While all agents in the group are highly trained since childhood to be skilled assassins, the 33 are the best among these. Much of their work is extremely dangerous and often takes place in sensitive or volatile areas of the world or with targets that already have their own sophisticated security measures, and so require close coordination with our intelligence specialists. The challenging nature of these missions means that the 33 are themselves premier intelligence agents themselves, gathering and working from their own intelligence as well as that supplied by other units in the Order.

"James's departure has left a gap and we need you," he tells me.

I feel a twinge of sorrow. While very, very good, the members of the 33 are also human, and Father James died in an interrogation cell a week ago. He died undetectably in a heavily guarded cell using only his theta skills to stop his heart from beating, rather than betray Rome and her secrets. His was a hero's death so the entire facility and school had honored him in a short ceremony. His name was also engraved on a special stone wall that lists those who gave their life in service.

I feel sad, but also honored by Phil's request. "I accept my place in the 33," I tell my new captain.

We meet at regular intervals throughout the year. Due to the high number of assignments we take on as well as how each member of the 33 also has other roles in the Order, with the exception of the key meeting that happens once a quarter, it is rare for all of us to be present at a meeting. A week after Phil's request, I join nine others at a meeting. We are all laughing, making ribald jokes and teasing one another. Our work is hard and dangerous, and dark and dirty humor is one way that we cope with the stress. Phil walks into the room. We rise, salute him and settle down. After greeting us, Phil gets down to business.

"I need a team to go into Africa," he says, "and gather information about the political environment in one of its cities." There probably would not be anything too difficult about this considering the network of well-rewarded contacts we already had on the ground. But then he adds, "We need the leadership in this city to change, so over the next year, we will have to take care of a couple of people there who don't like change. And it has to look like poorly planned incidents by a local group who just got lucky that their assassination attempts actually succeeded." Okay, this is a bit harder. He continues, "Paul, Peter (Conner) and Luke will be going in."

Phil has just given Conner and I our first assignment as part of the 33. He then spends the next hour giving us plenty of background, answering our questions and sharing the intel that had already been collected by our intelligence specialists and the members of the 33 who had been on the ground in this country and specific city the previous year. The plan is for us to leave in a week for the first phase of the assignment which will take about three weeks to complete.

We end the meeting with a loud shout of "For Rome!" For whatever we do, whatever our role, in the end, it is all for Rome, and we are its soldiers.

After the meeting is over, I go to my private office and call up the scheduling program. I state the mission's code that Phil had given us orally during the meeting. The program updates my schedule to accommodate the mission, automatically rearranging my other duties according to my saved preferences. I go over the changes, make a few adjustments manually then have the program notify my colleagues about my schedule changes. The program also modifies the schedules of my colleagues where they have to take over my duties in my absence. My sister Lizzie, for instance, will take over some of my responsibilities in the programming labs, since she is a talented programmer herself. I also arrange a quick meeting with Mattie, the head trainer, to discuss how the training of three particular students should be continued until I come back from Africa.

The Vatican 33 are one of the 'black ops' units of the Jesuit Order. They follow on the long tradition of Vatican spies where Jesuit fathers employed as tutors and counselors to the royal families, universities and merchant guilds fed information to Rome which informed its policy and decisions. The 33 are skilled in the myriad ways of killing, including with quiet close-contact means such as the garrote and knives, with weapons that work at further distance such as rifles, arrows and drones, with acute and delayed-action poisons, and by arranging for deadly accidents on the road, at home and so on. They are also trained to gather and analyze intelligence, operate all kinds of vehicles, speak numerous languages, use disguises and pose utterly convincingly as practically anyone – a prostitute, farmer, soldier, university professor, political dissident, eager intern, artist, chemist, hairdresser, etc. – as necessary for the mission. As mentioned earlier, all Jesuit children receive this training; the 33 are chosen from the agents who have reached extremely high levels of competence in all these areas.

Agents of the 33 may at times be hired by outside organizations, by those who pay enough to do so – who want a job accomplished without a trace left behind. Of course, the last area of activity was always mediated through several layers of parties, and those contracting a job never knew who was really doing that job for them. They only knew who they thought was doing it.

The 33 pride themselves in normally being "invisible" and unknown in the countries they operate within, when completing sensitive missions. All missions are designed to be completely undetectable, and are the result of close teamwork with other units within the Vatican and its facilities around the world, such as data analysis and technical units who contain brilliant scientists. The Jesuit university that creates bright scholars in a far-flung location may well also have secret underground rooms that house technologies that are 50 to 70 years ahead of those publicly available, to feed the constant need for information that is accurate, timely and useful. Teamwork is the norm within the Order, with those who lead listening carefully to the information and advice provided by all others. The 33 know that any success they enjoy is based upon the teams that support them and provide the information that can make the difference between success, or disaster, including death.

Chapter 10: Satan's Child

I am 18 years old, and I am four and a half months pregnant with Satan's child. Since this pregnancy started, I have been treated like royalty. Others in the Order bow when they see me. My health is carefully monitored. I am given delicacies to eat and am allowed a lighter workload.
The other fathers frequently ask me, "How are you and the baby doing?"

Most days, I don't know how to answer. As the child within me develops and grows, the overwhelming darkness and despair grows exponentially. I feel as though I am dying. But I smile and say "Fine," while privately wondering how long I have to live. This pregnancy is sucking the life out of me. It feels as if this tiny child is trying to eat my spirit alive, from the inside out. Since I was tiny, I was told by the oracles and the trainers that I would be carrying Satan's child. And now I am. I realize that they failed to tell me the horrendous cost of the "great honor". Daily, I am crushed by a deep, dark and unspeakable oppression.

As each day passes, I grow paler and paler, and thinner and thinner. My body is reflecting the complete despair and deadly spiritual oppression I am under. Mattheo, Jerome, Carlotti, Danny, Lizzie, John and Mattie spend extra time with me, trying to get me to eat. They remind me that they love me. They remind me that this has been what I was genetically engineered and conceived for. They remind me that this is my ultimate purpose and destiny. Nonetheless, I continue fading. As strong-willed as I am, as healthy as my body was at the beginning of the pregnancy, my spirit and body are failing under the weight of this occultic pregnancy.

It is three weeks later in the middle of the night. Mattheo is sleeping nearby. I am suddenly stabbed by blindingly sharp cramps in my lower body. The agony takes my breath away for several terrifying moments. I wonder if my bowels are being torn open by the fetus, but I look down and my abdomen is intact. However, blood is flowing from between my legs. Another deep spasm, like a knife in my belly, rocks my body. My body can no longer carry this fetus and is violently aborting it. I feel both complete despair and vast relief. I cannot imagine anything I have ever wanted more in my life than to get rid of this creature. But if I fail to carry it, I have utterly failed the great hope that all the fathers I love and Satan himself have placed in me. I will lose their love, and I feel despair at the thought even in the midst of this pain.

The contractions continue, and I weep. I am bleeding to death between my legs, and I don't care. I want to die. Mattheo hears my weeping and soft groans. He is immediately up, turns on a light and sees the blood seeping onto the sheets. He rings a buzzer located in the room, and someone answers. "Send a healing team here!" he shouts. "Now!"

Amidst the waves of pain, I feel something like a huge clot but firmer pass between my legs. Mattheo, Jerome, Danny and Carlotti are there, and I see tears in their eyes. But I know they are not weeping for me. They are weeping at the loss of this creature that has been killing me. I go unconscious from loss of blood and despair.

I wake up, I am not sure how much later. I have been given a blood transfusion as well as fluids and nutrients; I can feel the difference. The room is darkened, and I hear the soft sounds of weeping and mourning outside the door. The hope that the Light of the World would be born into our world has been shattered, so the whole Order is in mourning.

I am tired, weak and shaken.

"How could you?" Mattheo hisses at me. "How could you fail when this was so important to me?"

I am shaken to the depths of my being by his accusation. Doesn't he realize that it is my love for him that kept me alive so long, that otherwise, I would have lain down and died months ago – as has happened to others before me who tried to carry Satan's child? That the only reason I have lived this long was for him? Others come into the room, and I see the anger and disappointment in their eyes. I have failed, utterly failed. I am a failure. I should not be allowed to live. I wonder why I didn't die, too, along with this aborted thing, this creature that everyone values so much more than me. I close my eyes, and sink into a catatonic coma generated by my desire to die.

I am laying in a bed, and I hear Danny's voice whispering near my ear. "Sister, don't die. Come back to me. I want you to live." I sigh softly, and sleep on.

Later that day, I hear Lizzie's voice. "Come back, Luce," she says softly, touching my face. "Don't leave me, please. I need you."

I stir, and then continue sleeping.

Mattheo comes into the room. I hear his voice next to me. "I am angry and disappointed, but I don't want you to die," he says. His voice is hoarse. "I love you, in spite of this. You know that, daughter." I rouse slightly, and my eyes blink open. I see his face, and see that he means what he is saying to me. I am coming out of a deep sleep, a sleep that has held my spirit captive, and slowly, with great difficulty, I reach for his hand. He clasps it, and tears fall from his eyes.

Mattheo, Danny and Lizzie stay with me continuously for the next few days, taking turns. They realize that I am at high risk for suicide as my body spasms in convulsions of grief for my failure and a deep depression still blankets me. They feed me with high nutrient density drinks and soft fruit, and after several days, I strengthen. I can talk now, and tell each of them that I love them, as they love me. This love is what has brought me back from the brink of death, much as it did when I was an infant and failed to thrive.

Days pass, and slowly I begin to do more. I have trouble meeting the flash of disappointment that I see initially in the eyes of those I care about, including Mattie, Conner and Mary Margaret. Mary Margaret is now pregnant with Satan's child, and one night after I am once again strong enough to work, she comes to see me in my private office. "Was it this hard for you?" she whispers.

I see how depressed and wan this classmate, closer than a sister to me, looks. She is now near her fifth month of carrying Satan's child. I am worried as I look into her eyes. She does not look well at all, and I don't want her to die.

"Yes, very hard, I thought I was dying" I answer, with real concern.

"So, I am not weak for feeling this way," she says.

"No, not at all. It will pass with the birth." I desperately hope this is true.

The next week, Mary Margaret also aborts her child. She is unable to carry it long enough for the fetus to be viable. Like me, it takes her several weeks to recover from the trauma of carrying, and then she must deal with the deep depression caused by disappointing the expectations of those she loves more than life. Carlotti, her primary trainer, and her twins stay close to her, just as my primary trainer and twins did with me. After the first day that she rouses from a deep sleep, I come in.

"It wasn't your fault," I tell her. "For some reason, our bodies and minds are unable to do this. But I will find a way, even if it takes years to do so. I will find out why and how to fix this."

Years later, working together with many other members of the Order, I discover a way to help humans carry this type of child. The oracles were right that this being would be born through me. However, it not with my own pregnancy, as was assumed. Instead, it was the technologies that we developed that enabled human mothers to succeed at carrying the hybrid children.

The Jesuits have been committed for many years to the goal of bringing into the world children who are half human and half spiritual beings. Many women in the early years either died from the effort or the fetus was aborted while still too young to live. These losses did not stop them from trying. The genetic engineering used to improve health, strength, healing and strength of will was not just for creating super soldiers, but to create human females strong enough to be able to conceive and carry these hybrid children to birth. More than physical strength and extraordinary will was needed, however, to successfully carry the hybrid children to term. The mothers desperately needed support for the sheer despair, depression and oppression that literally killed them and/or caused a miscarriage.

As I and other members of the behavioral, spiritual and scientific units pondered how to solve this problem, we developed this solution: put together teams of individuals who were closely bonded and spiritually linked to the pregnant female. These teams would spiritually carry some of the spiritual darkness and despair for short periods of time, and so offer some emotional and spiritual relief to the mother. This plan was instituted within twenty years of my own failed attempt, and the first successful births of hybrids occurred as a result. The teams were called Omega teams since they tapped into Omega spirituality and bonds between individuals.

These hybrids were not always "Satan's child". Some were fathered by other principalities, such as Mammon, Pain, Hades, Death, the Prince of Persia as well as other beings including the deities from the pantheons of various religions and cultures. While early hybrids appeared less than fully human, within the past 24 years, fully human appearing hybrids have been birthed within the Jesuit Order. A few, however, have unusual features, such as violet eyes or hair that is silver-blond. But the greatest difference, as I will describe in a later chapter, is in their personalities. These truly are not fully human beings, and the way they act reflects this reality. One of the main Jesuit labs for developing hybrids is located in Czechoslovakia; another is located in Hungary, and another in Poland just south of the Russian border. Here, experimentation is ongoing to improve the success rate of these pregnancies in order to populate the world with these beings. While I had kept my promise to Mary Margaret, I had no joy in this because of the darkness and evil it was bringing on the earth.

At times, I laugh with dark humor at those who wonder if Biden, or Bill Gates, or other well-known public figures are actually Nephilim. Anyone who has ever met a real hybrid would know immediately "No." These public people are very human indeed, even if greedy, selfish, sociopathic or misguided in their desire to rush in a new world order. Even Yuval Hurari, in spite of his monstrous stated agendas for mankind, is human.

Chapter 11: Rothschild Oracle

I am 19 years old and have recovered physically from the efforts to carry a hybrid child the year before. I am in France as my Illuminati cult presenter, Anagram (Ana). My Illuminati twin and I are to be oracles for a year for Philip Rothschild. He has heard that we are very gifted oracles, so he wants the two of us to take turns filling this role for his family. Phillip believes that we are bastards of Battenberg, a German high Illuminati family, "Ana" and "Celine". As I am the older twin, I take the first turn and have just arrived the night before at the lavish mansion of this very wealthy family. Despite my years of dancing attendance on Illuminati nobility at rituals, meetings, and training events, my stomach clenches in anxiety as the servant who has shown me to my suite lays out the robes that I am to wear to meet Phillip. To be called on to be an oracle to someone as high-ranking and powerful as Phillip Rothschilds is a great honor – and a great risk. This year-long job could have tremendous impact on my sister's, my mother's, my children's and my status, safety and opportunity over the next years.

I don the soft white robe of silken material, decorated with gold embroidery, and beautifully embroidered white silk slippers. Gold and white are the colors of a high oracle, and this outfit is what I will wear when formally performing my role as an oracle. I have spent time in polite small talk with the members of the family the evening before, including enjoying an outstanding dinner accompanied by a priceless wine. Now, my duties begin. I enter a private room within the mansion, one that has special technologies to prevent others from listening in.

Philip is waiting for me. "Who is my greatest enemy?" Philip asks me first. He is testing me, for he well knows the answer to this question.

"You have two; one is _____________," as I name the head of a large corporation that he has lent a large amount of money to over the past three years. "This man resents your financial hold over him." I pause. "But there is another. Your son David. He seeks your death for he wants to rule instead of you."

Philip looks surprised. While oracles for wealthy houses must be very accurate or they are punished or killed, not many would dare to say something like this to him.

"Will he kill me?" Philip asks.

"No, your death will come from another means," I tell him.

Philip relaxes a little. He realizes that he does not have to kill his son in order to live.

One day, David passes me in the hall and takes me into a small, private study off to the side. He closes the door. "Oracle", he says, addressing me by my title, "What will be the date of my father's death?" I know he wants very much to know how long he must wait. All sons of wealthy houses want to know such things.

"Do you think I would be so foolish as to tell you such a thing?" I respond in anger. "The day I do so is the day I die. Your father would kill me for telling you this, for he would know immediately by your manner towards him. It would change." I have been hired as Philip's oracle, and to speak as one at special gatherings within the mansion, and at a select public ceremonies. I am therefore under no obligation to answer anyone in private but Philip, including his son.

David stalks away, angry. But I don't care. He knows the rules as well as I.

After a year of doing this job, I am feeling defiled, sick at heart, and tired of warning and helping this family, of calling on spirits within to give me knowledge. I am more than ready to stop being an oracle, and am greatly relieved that the year's contract is up. Of course, now Philip owes Battenberg a lot of money, or a special favor in return for lending his supposed bastard twin daughters to his family. So, Battenberg is happy with my sister and I for a time. We continue working hard to rise in the Illuminati, hoping as always to make our mother proud of us, and to be acknowledged by the Battenbergs.

Individuals who are considered spiritually gifted within the Illuminati may be required to act as oracles, whether for the head of a wealthy family, during ceremonial or ritual events, or during business meetings. They respect the information that gifted oracles provide, just as Rome does, and will use this information to guide business and other important decisions. During high rituals, oracles will also be asked to give prophecies regarding the coming year. Acting in this role comes at a price since the demonic enjoys causing emotional and physical harm. This is one reason why young women who also show ability in other areas or otherwise have value to their groups are usually not asked to take on the role for longer than a year. Depression, panic, suicidality, dementia, psychosis, ataxia, cancer, IBS and other diseases are documented side effects of being an oracle for too long a time. Typically, the task is rotated among many spiritually gifted women within the group. Even so, it is considered a high honor to be asked to be one.

Having Jesuit agents as highly gifted and sought-after oracles in the Illuminati gave the Jesuits much opportunity to gather inside information on Illuminati leadership since only top-ranking Illuminati had the financial resources and social status to hire these oracles, over longer contracts. It was remarkably easy for Ana and her sister Celine to learn the secrets, plans and concerns of the Rothschilds as over the months, Philip asked question after question about what business deals he should make, or not; who he can trust, or not; and whether a new financial venture he is planning will be successful. Unbeknownst to Ana and Celine, specialized reporter parts, as well as the Jesuit presenter Luce, passed this information on to the Jesuit fathers. This was information that we could not have gathered so reliably otherwise, so the Jesuits were delighted when Philip made his request known to the Battenberg father.

Me, Lizzie and our other genetically identical siblings in the Order had our schedules carefully planned over the next year to ensure that the Rothschilds believed they had "Ana" or "Celine" at any point in time without conflicting with other jobs and roles in the Order. For the most part, this schedule involved rotating the four of us in two-week long periods, so each of us usually had six weeks off for our other duties before having to act as a Rothchild oracle again. All of us hated the mission, not just because of the spiritual defilement and weariness, but also because of the Rothschilds' penchant for extreme sexual sadism and other perversions. To help our Illuminati cult presenters with tolerating the Rothschilds' perversions, they were heavily programmed to dissociate their natural repugnance at such activities, and to instead feel awe and respect for them. Nonetheless, Ana and the Illuminati cult presenters of my identical siblings could never fully suppress the disgust and weariness that came from spending time with them.

Part 2: Adult Years

Part 2 describes the responsibilities I was given in my adult years in both the Illuminati and the Jesuit Order from age 20 to 32 years old. Many of these responsibilities in the Order include leadership roles in scientific development, programming and training, intelligence and assassination work, and strategic planning. Within the Illuminati, I continued rising in the ranks as a programmer. During these years, while I hated what I was doing, I was outwardly compliant with the expectations that I serve Satan's agendas through the occult world.

Chapter 12: Leadership in the Order

As time goes on, my closest friends Conner, Mary Margaret, Vitali, Simon, Andrew and I rise in the Order. By the time I am 26, Simon is the first general, and we are all extremely proud of him. It is expected that he will be the next Superior General, since the first General is typically the next Superior General. Vitali is second general, Conner is third general, and I am fourth general. Mary Margaret is sixth general. Each one of us, as well as the other fathers in the top echelons of leadership in the Order, have also held other leadership roles, such as captaining the Vatican 33, coordinating scientific research, and administering various facilities around the world. One reason for earning our ranks and multiple leadership roles over the years is not just due to years of service, complete dedication and unquestioned loyalty. It is also due to our ability to see “the big picture”, to strategize well, and to work well with others and inspire loyalty in them, traits and skills that have resulted in these ranks. The ability to inspire others to work well and assemble teams that are effective is one of the most valued leadership abilities in the Order; anyone who is gifted in this area typically receives numerous leadership roles. In fact, while I have held leadership roles in numerous research projects, typically, it was not my talent in physics or programming that had me tapped as leader, as much as it was my ability to bring out the talent in the other fathers.

But rank does not matter as much as how we view each other. I love each one of them deeply, and would willingly lay my life down in a second for any of them, and they feel the same way in return. Because we have worked together so closely and for so long, when we go into a new situation, we can almost anticipate what each other will do, or how the others will think. We truly are closer than brothers, and this only helps us to work even better together. Whether going into a country with unstable politics to gather intelligence without seeming to do so, or strategizing how best to conduct meetings and negotiations with various leaders in the Mideast, or figuring out how to develop a stronger relationship with the Japanese criminal clan dynasties that soon will be hosting some of our children in a special “exchange program” in which we also host some of theirs for a few months each year, we all rely on the thoughts and opinions, and even intuitions, of each other. No decisions are made alone, for we all well know that only a fool works alone or trusts only their own observations. For we cannot completely erase our own biases and will miss things – sometimes small things – that others can see. And seeing it all to the degree possible can mean the difference between life and death in these situations. The love between us, and deep sense of belonging and purpose compels me to push away my doubts about my life, cling to my programmed defenses against the guilt and anguish of the inhuman acts we did to carry out the Orders’ agendas, and continue my loyalty.

I am in my early twenties. In the programming studios and labs, for years we had taken advantage of computers much more advanced that those publicly available. We already used virtual reality, augmented reality, and holograms to create convincing scenarios when programming the children in the Order. However, we were always seeking to improve our technology. I am now working with many others within the Order on a special project that we hope will exponentially advance our programming technology. As human beings are driven most primally and sustainably by a basic set of emotions, we are seeking to develop a device that can reliably stimulate and control the individuals' feelings of love, joy, hope, anger, fear, sadness, disgust, despair and so on in tandem with controlling their cognitions related to these emotions. That is, we were not only seeking technology that would, for instance, cause terror, but one that would simultaneously deeply sear into the brain the programmer's explanation for why that person was experiencing terror. Naturally, for programming purposes, this technology would also have to be able to cause both pain and pleasure (punishment and reward). Our goal is to combine it with the best of virtual reality technology in order to create a seamless experience for the person being programmed.

The members of the Order who collaborate on this project contribute their knowledge from the several different branches of the physical, biological, behavioral and material sciences. We work from extensive information on the brain and mind, based on decades of meticulous work mapping in exacting detail how the different regions of the brain work and how they relate to each other. These prior projects had mapped the neural responses that occur with happiness, terror, sadness, joy, love, hate and so on, and how they interrelate with specific thoughts, actions and experiences. Similarly, we have reams of information on patterns of response at the electrical, energetic, biochemical and cellular levels, also tracking their impact on the other parts of the body and physiological processes. Now, our goal is to discover in comprehensive and precise detail how to stimulate these patterns directly using waveforms on the brain. We also need to discover how biological sex, age, prior goals, beliefs and experiences, system structure, physiological state (such as sleep deprivation, hunger, etc.), programming drugs, nutraceuticals, hormones and other neurochemicals, and stimulus to the five senses (such as virtual reality scenes, spinning, cold, pain, sensory deprivation, high and low pitch tones, etc.) affect responses to the direct brain stimulation.

As we move into studying how to actually harness the waveforms correctly, the sheer disregard for animal and human life and suffering that marks science in the occult world becomes horrendously evident. We conduct experiment after experiment on simians, then on what are considered 'expendable people' – trafficked individuals, homeless individuals, prisoners from countries with oppressive governments, etc., that the Order has purchased or traded favors for. We use subjects of all ages, because we need to understand the impact of this new technology on adults of various ages, on children, and on infants. We use AI to take care of the complex calculations for each set of experiments.

The work is slow at first. In many of our initial experiments, the waveforms are either too great, and the brain is damaged, or too small, and cannot stimulate the correct response. We also struggle with ensuring the waves penetrate to and stimulate the intended locations of the brain in the right sequence and intensity. We are patient, however, because we have no doubt that we will eventually succeed. I bring in students who show promise, hoping that they can see what I cannot, mentoring them just as I was mentored when I was younger. The other trainers do the same with their students.

As we believe that true knowledge is first found in the unseen realms, our dogged interdisciplinary scientific work is complemented at every step by extensive spiritual labor. We do countless rituals to ask the immortals for their wisdom. We lay our bodies prostrate across traditional spiritual diagrams, blueprints of the technology and project workplans, where we offer the gift of self-flagellation, human infants, and other sacrifices. We travel the dimensions, asking for answers. During one of the major rituals, I encounter Shiva who gives me the part of the knowledge we needed to harness the waveforms correctly. In fact, I had been chosen to be the project leader because I had received the original inspiration for the project directly from Shiva several years earlier.

Our first success was with a young white homeless man purchased from a trafficker in Europe. We did not know his name or his story, and did not care to know. To us then, he was not a person but a scientific subject. Lizzie straps him down, then enters the command into the machine to stimulate the neural patterns of rage. I watch the man, not expecting much. The microburst waveforms are invisible to the human eye, so despite the millions of dollars poured into the project by this point, there is literally nothing to see. Then, the man lets out a howl of rage that barely sounds human. The howl continues as he strains at his straps with all his strength. It breaks off as he pauses for breath, his heart rate sky high, pupils fully dilated, then resumes screams of mindless rage. Lizzie herself catches a breath, then cues the machine to stop. Within two seconds, the man is silent, panting. He looks around at us. He was frightened when he was first brought in. Now, we can see that he is confused and twice as frightened as before.

“Do it again,” I snap out an order. We have to know if we are indeed seeing what we are seeing – a first success. I can sense that the other team members are equally tense.

Lizzie gives the machine the command. Again, the man screams and writhes in a paroxysm of rage. After ten seconds, I lift my hand. From years of working together, Lizzie understands my silent gesture and stops the waveform stimulation. Once again, the man’s rage passes and he gazes around the room, eyes round with terror and bewilderment. We put him through this torture two more times. Each time, exactly the same thing happens. The team’s excitement mounts with each successful display of direct control of the man’s emotions. Lizzie then unstraps the man, and puts him back into a cage with food and water in the adjoining room.

Cheering breaks out in the lab. We embrace each other, almost dancing with joy. We notify the senior leadership of the Order (those who were not already in the room as team members) and send orders down to the kitchens to prepare a special meal with champagne to celebrate. We would have this meal not in the large dining hall used for every day meals, but in one of our smaller banquet rooms. The fathers at this celebration meal are all smiles as we toast each other. The younger students who had been working on the project with us are especially delighted with the lavish spread of desserts since sweets are rare treats for them.

Later that evening, when I am alone, I wonder about what we have unleashed on the world. This technology will change how programming is done. I feel a deep sadness, and no longer feel like celebrating. Years of hard work and data collection have helped our teams to create something that is...evil. I feel it deep inside, and this thought makes me restless. But I cannot voice this thought to others, although I am sure that others must feel the same. I go to bed, wondering what I am doing and why, with this feeling of unrest showing up even in my dreams.

Two days later, Mattheo, who is now the superior general, and several other fathers, ask Lizzie, Mary Margaret, and I to place our hands on the newly developing technology, and to prophesy how it will be used. As I attempt to do so, I am overcome with extreme sorrow and I weep. I see people destroyed by the use of this technology. I see a terrible world where this technology will be used to enslave human beings. I am overcome by despair, sobbing, and I lift my hands from the machine. As I look up, I see that my sisters are weeping copiously as well, salty tears streaming down their cheeks. Our prophesies make it impossible for me to deny that we are fools who have created evil.

It took many more years of work and great harm to thousands of what the Order labeled 'experimental subjects' to develop this technology into an effective programming tool. We called it the "God Machine" because it was "God" to those programmed by its use. We also called it "Shiva" after the spiritual being who we believed gave us the inspiration and part of the scientific knowledge for its development. The machine's most basic design is that of a small rectangular chamber, not unlike a coffin, that the subject lies in, then the lid is closed. The walls and lid of the machine are comprised of panels that display the scenarios for the programming session, such as a starry sky, the pit of hell, the person's therapist's office, the person's presentation home in America, and so on. Special glasses are also placed over the person's eyes. These glasses interact with the walls and lid, and the waveforms, to create extremely realistic experiences. For instance, the programmers can have the person 'look down' at his left arm and see it on fire while the machine stimulates that arm to feel the horrendous pain of the burning, fully accompanied by the smell of burning flesh. The machine is precise enough that it can even start the 'burning' at the tips of the fingers then cause the sensations of the burning flames to slowly crawl up the hand then arms accompanied by the relevant visuals. When not playing back the programming scenes, the walls and lid are transparent. The machine monitors neural responses, vital signs and other parameters. The chamber is built such that IV lines, feeding tubes, catheters and other medical devices can be used without disrupting the programming scenarios when necessary for longer programming sessions. Different sizes of the machine chambers are used for subjects of different ages.

In my own thoughts, I secretly called it the "hell machine" because the manipulation of neural responses creates a deeper bondage to programming than the techniques based on physical traumas, intimidation or persuasion, and scenarios staged in the programming studios with props and programmers in costumes. Programming installed by the 'God Machine' is considered "unbreakable" because the individual is entrained by hour after hour after hour of cyclic repetition of stimulus and response that goes deep within the various brain states. Like a tractor wheel ploughing through mud, this entrainment creates neural ruts of cognition and emotion and behavior for parts according to the programmers' precise design that are robust and difficult to change. Such programming is also considered more effective because the direct neural manipulation 'downloads' the desired programmed response to that person while preventing the individual's own response to the programming milieu. For instance, traditional techniques to program an assassin part to experience 'enjoying' killing involved intense conditioning through praise, treats and other rewards from the trainer and often, the administration of drugs that create a sense of bliss and/or thrill. Nonetheless, the part may still feel twinges of unease at the bottoms of their stomach or pangs of guilt, shame or pity for the target, especially when they are still very young. The programmers also have to ensure that the person's negative feelings about killing, such as horror, are being dissociated correctly into the right parts or locations in the system. With the 'God Machine' directed stimulus of emotion, thought and action, the part being conditioned to deeply associate killing with joy will not experience any twinges of guilt or discomfort, or have negative emotions that need to be seconded to other emotion-holding parts in the system; the part's entire experience is that of joy at killing.

In the early 2000s, before I left the Order, large parts of my own system were 're-installed' using the machine. Based on my memories, during this period, all the older fathers in the Order had much of their own programming redone with the machine in order to 'strengthen' it. It was pitched as a privilege and as the fruit of our labor, but deep in our hearts, we knew that it was actually a horror. We did not truly want our mind control to be 'strengthened' but we knew that saying 'no' was not permitted. After I left and started to try to heal, it was terrible indeed and extremely difficult to access and resolve the entrainment. Having parts try to leave the "neural ruts" the machine created would immediately trigger unremitting replays of terrible headaches, agony in my entire body, mind-numbing terror, unspeakable despair and other effects meant to bring any change to a halt. The deep subconscious, almost unconscious states that many entrained parts were in also made it very difficult to use more traditional means of healing work such as other parts helping these parts to leave their torture scenarios or connect with current reality. Two things have seemed most helpful so far: (1) soaking prayer in the love of God while welcoming the self and (2) alternating abreaction of the entrainment with soothing of the body and calming words. In my personal experience, the usual techniques for addressing programming and trauma using the imagination to change programmed scenarios, conscious communication between parts, talk therapy, art, journaling and so on has been less effective for machine-installed programming, and takes much longer to help it stop running.

I have asked God's forgiveness for my involvement in bringing this terrible technology into the world. When these memories first came, I was overcome with grief over what I and others had done, and over the blindness and deception that made us rejoice when it was developed. I am particularly grieved that since the 2000s, infants and children in the Order have large portions of their programming installed via the machine. The 'God Machine' was one key reason that within several years, I would again attempt to leave the Order. I believe that my guilt at being one of its creators has been a huge reason for the extreme difficulty I encountered when trying to heal the programming installed by the machine; I believed deep inside me that I deserved to be chained in this way because I had caused others to be chained by this machine. I have also recalled memories of entrainment in the machine itself where I was indeed told explicitly by the programmers that I did not deserve to heal because I was the one who had helped create this evil machine that 'took away free will'. I have had to face the fact that this kind of belief only served the purpose of Satan and the group to control me. With God's help, I have been on the journey to find the courage to forgive myself, to receive His forgiveness and let go of the guilt. I hope that as I continue working on healing from the machine programming, some of what I learn will be helpful to other survivors.

At my last point of contact with the Order, portable or mobile versions of the technology that looked like a helmet used in combination with a full body suit had already been in use for over a decade. A younger survivor who has recently left the Order told me that they can now 'record' the experience of one person then 'download' this experience onto another person. For instance, they can record one person's pleasurable experience of eating a chocolate croissant then 'download' this experience onto another person. Similarly, they can record an experience of brutal torture on one person, then 'download' this onto a different person, enabling them to put this next person through all the pain and terror, yet with actual little physical damage. I have also heard that this or similar technologies can be used to 'read' a person's dreams or thoughts remarkably well, though not fully precisely yet. (Note: While I do believe that such advanced 'mind reading' technology has been developed, I am also aware that in order to enhance their control and discourage parts from daring to think independently, programmers do use many tricks to persuade parts that they can 'read their minds' or 'read their dreams' spiritually, psychically or through the use of technology. Often, these tricks are accomplished through other parts in the survivor having already reported the thoughts or dreams, unbeknownst to the parts currently being told that their very own thoughts and dreams are not safe from the programmers.)

Such work in scientific research is a huge reason why the Jesuits give their children an extremely rigorous education in numerous branches of math and science, assiduously cultivating in them scientific curiosity and a love for these subjects, and provide special mentoring for those who show talent. The Jesuits are not unique in this respect; many groups provide such training and education to their children. Additionally, the Jesuits and other groups have learned over the years techniques for 'creating' and programming parts with exceptional intellectual ability; these parts are often called on for such projects. This chapter provides another illustration of how teamwork is highly valued within the Jesuit Order. No one in the Order would ever act like a prima donna scientist, claim credit for the work of others, or overlook a teammate's contribution. Besides cultivating intellectual ability in numerous areas of scientific study, the Order is very careful to develop the skills for collaboration and teamwork in their children; group exercises, group activities and group projects are a large part of the children's training from their early days. The leaders within the order are leaders precisely because they do see, value and honor the gifts of all team members. I only wish that our teamwork, talent, knowledge and financial resources had been put to truly creating good for the world.

Many groups have worked hard to develop similar technologies, meaning that many survivors from different groups would have memories of high-tech programming involving direct brain stimulation. According to my memories, there was something of a race between the different occult societies and government agencies as far back as the 50s and 60s to create devices to directly control a person's brain and mind, and to develop effective protocols for integrating the use of these devices into programming. Other areas of development that cult scientists engage in include weaponry, transportation and communication technologies, agricultural technologies, climate control technologies and medical technologies. In fact, the medical advances in the Order, unknown still to the public, enables them to heal many types of injuries from torture, programming accidents, training accidents, incidences on missions and so on without leaving any scars.

Chapter 14: CERN

I am 23 years old, and Mattheo has called me into his office, the office of the occultic Superior General. He has a new assignment for me. The fact that he wants to give it to me personally tells me that it will neither be easy or pleasant. He is sitting in his chair when I come in, but rises and embraces me.

"Oh, boy!" I think. "I am not going to like this assignment." But I am quiet as I wait to hear what he is going to send me to do.

"I want you to go to CERN for a while," he tells me.

I feel a cold trickle down my back. The public knows CERN (Conseil européen pour la Recherche nucléaire, i.e., the European Organization for Nuclear Research) as a large physics research center in Switzerland, run by an intergovernmental organization of the same name. However, the secret levels where research by the occult world is conducted involves nightmarish things unimaginable to the general public. No one ever wants to go there. It makes visiting the Rothschild family and being their oracle seem like a walk in the park.

"Do I have to?" I ask, knowing that of course I do but I can't help myself. "I am so busy here. Mattie is having me run the main labs a lot of the time, and Phil needs me for a mission in a few weeks. I am also making real progress on the machine technology. I am needed here, more than there." Only my years of discipline keeps my tone matter-of-fact rather than whiny or shaky. My arguments are logical, but I know it is hopeless. Every Jesuit father must do a rotation at CERN, where our main genetics laboratories are located, and now it is my turn.

"You know you have to go," he says gently.

Of course, he is right. I look at him with pleading eyes, but bow.

"I want you to assess the people there, and give me a full report of how they are doing." He knows how emotionally difficult it is to work at CERN. It is not unusual for the scientists, technicians and other workers to have breakdowns after a period of time. The regular assessments were instituted several years ago as part of a multipronged strategy to improve the mental health of those on their CERN rotations. He continues, "I also would like to hear any ideas you have on how to improve things."

The Jesuit genetic labs at CERN are located in underground levels that the public has no awareness of. All the scientific and support staff in these labs are Jesuit fathers. The other roles not requiring scientific or administrative skills, such as food prep, laundry and cleaning, are done by mind-controlled individuals who are never allowed to leave CERN and are killed then replaced with new individuals about every half year. We consider this a necessary evil as the stress of being underground around the horrors of CERN degrades the quality of even such menial work over time, thus new workers are needed. Furthermore, that they never get to leave CERN alive means that our secrets are kept secure. These levels can only be accessed through special elevators hidden in the more public levels of CERN, and through special underground tunnels deep beneath the ground. The tunnels extend for many miles and have several openings above ground far away from the facility. The openings are located in small villages run by the Knights of Malta (KOM), an occult society with close ties to the Jesuits. These knights, who look like ordinary villagers, have guarded these secret tunnels entrances and exits for many years. They have been trained to guard this secret with their lives if necessary, for the KOM are dedicated to Vatican – and Jesuit- security. On the Italian side of the alps, there are other tunnel entrances that are guarded by other groups such as Opus Dei with equal diligence.

"I will go," I tell Mattheo. Of course, I will for I am nothing if not obedient to my superior general.

It is a week later, and I am driving myself and two other agents into Switzerland. The three of us have just spent a night and a day in the Italian alps, enjoying the scenery to give us happy memories before going below ground. Now, we are crossing into Swiss territory. The other two agents are going to relieve two workers in the labs who are finishing their 3-month rotation at the end of the week.

"Last chance to see daylight," I quip dryly as we approach a village where there is an entrance to an underground tunnel. "Say goodbye to the sun." We all three look out the window a bit wistfully. No one likes going into CERN, and our expressions say it all, even if we cannot voice how we feel about this assignment. Good soldiers obey orders willingly. We are all excellent soldiers, or else we would be running screaming from the car, preferring to get shot for desertion rather than go down into the hell on earth that is CERN.

The KOM soldiers, dressed as simple civilians but well-armed, see our car and our license plate, and nod. We give them the security codes for the week. We still have to go through the biometric security procedures required: retinal scans, blood sample, voice and facial recognition. The computers scan their databases and give us permission to go on. The tunnel door opens in the side of a grassy hill with goats grazing around the perimeter. As I drive the car into it, I feel as if I am actually driving the three of us into hell. After several minutes, we reach one of the underground parking lots. Once again, at the entrance into the labs, there are guards waiting and we again pass through several rounds of security measures. The steel door lifts, and we walk in.

The first thing I notice is the noise. It is high-pitched and eerie; it sounds like a human being in distress, but not quite. It is coming from down a well-lighted hall. Thankfully, the office that I'm headed to is in the opposite direct of the noise. Nonetheless, it makes the hairs on the back of my neck stand as I walk down the hall. We are greeted by two security officers, one of the lab technicians, and a haggard-looking trainer. I will be relieving this trainer, Father John, whose job has been to assess the mental health of the workers in the facility and provide interventions. I am startled to see a haunted look in his eyes, which are rimmed with dark circles. Father John is a very experienced and accomplished programmer as well as assassin. Considering that I had never seen him look this way despite the horrifying things we have to do in the programming labs, at occult rituals and in the 33, I am chilled.

"Hey, John," I greet my friend. I have mixed feelings as I see the look of relief in his eyes upon seeing me. I am glad for him that his rotation is nearly over, but I am certainly not glad for myself that I have six weeks here ahead of me.

"Hey, Luce," he says, using my childhood name. I don't correct him; I am Luke now, but he is already stressed enough.

"Let's go into a private room and talk," I suggest. "You can tell me what I need to know before I visit the labs." John gives me a look that suggests that I am a lamb about to go to the slaughter, a curious mix of sadness and pity, and this makes me even more afraid. But I won't show it.

He takes me into a private room, meaning that it has full security so that no one else in the facility can hear us. I am tired after the long drive so I get a cup from the espresso machine in the room. John gets a cup for himself, and we sit.

"How are the techs doing?" I ask, to start. John gives me a rundown on each person's level of stress with his thoughts on why some people were experiencing higher amounts of stress than others. I note, as others have, that the amount of stress reported seems to correlate to how much time a technician has spent in the labs. I am dismayed to hear that at least three individuals only midway through their rotation are already showing signs of imminent breakdown. John's eyes constantly flicker around the room, and he makes tiny nervous movements of his hands and feet. He is certainly not doing well himself either. I wonder what I will look and feel like after a month here.

After this initial chat, I take a deep breath, square my shoulders, and begin a tour of the labs. We walk side-by-side down the hallway towards the eerie wailing that I heard earlier. The wailing had mercifully been blocked out by the soundproof room I was in while getting up to speed with John. We go towards a high-security bombproof door, where John places the pad of his third finger on a plate by it, and simultaneously speaks the security code for the day. The steel door opens, and I enter the genetic labs at CERN.

We are on the first level where our trans-human genetics experiments are being done. Just ahead, to the left, I see a small cage with a creature that has a human-looking face but the tail of a cat. Fine tawny fur covers its body. While her features are partially human, her mentation is not. The cat creature snarls and lunges at me, striking hard the bars of her cage with her arms and shoulders. Her attempted attack is accompanied by a horrifying scream that peters off into a soft growl filled with malice. I can see with one glance that this creature is female as it has no clothes. I feel a pang of pity for it even as my stomach turns in horror; its face and form are still human enough to make its nakedness stand out.

I barely keep myself from cringing away from her cage. She is the product of combining the DNA of a cheetah and a human in hope of creating a super soldier capable of inhuman speed and strength. John pulls up her charts on the computer which describes her genetic, emotional, social and physical characteristics as well as the results of her five most recent health assessments. Like many of these creatures, her physical health is now poor. She is not doing well with the stress of her environment in the labs, and is suffering from weaknesses caused by the genetic manipulation. Our research involves learning how to prevent the poor overall health, aggression and low levels of intellect created when combining humans with animals.

I feel ill as I go down the hall and see varying physical results of this trans-species genetic work. There are two small children, male and female, that look human until I spot their paws. They growl menacingly at me as I walk by, showing sharp canine teeth. I make a mental note to never get within reach of those teeth. I see other human-animal chimeras: combinations with chimpanzees, with birds, with fish and other odd appearing creatures. All of them, however, have a look of bland and resigned yet intense rage in cold eyes that lets me know that given the opportunity, they would kill me in a minute. The terrible almost human grunts, growls and screams they make sends chills down my spine and make me weak at the knees. I am not sure whether to think of them as "human", "animal" or "monster". The tour of this level seems to go on and on and on, as John introduces me to the lab workers on this level. They are subjected to the horror day after day; It is no wonder that they are stressed, to understate matters.

Finally, we are done. John walks me to the lounge. It is luxurious and bright with full spectrum lighting meant to provide the benefits of sunlight. Coffee machines on one side of the lounge offer several different types fresh-ground coffee and the refrigerators are stocked with organically grown fresh fruits and vegetables. It even has a garden with a small recycling indoor stream that has flowers growing near the water. The lounge is sound proof and I breathe a sigh of relief. I wish that I could spend the rest of my six weeks in here, away from the horrible noises of the labs.

John sinks heavily down into one of the soft, low couches and tells me, “The staff can spend an hour here in the morning and an hour in the afternoon.”

I can see in his eyes that the two one-hour breaks during an eight-hour shift are not enough. I see something else that few other facilities have: an alcohol dispensing machine, stocked with the finest wines and liquors. The staff on the floor can unlock the drinks of their choice once their badge shows that they have completed their eight hours on duty. I am not a drinker but I plan to visit the lounge tonight and grab something alcoholic to help me sleep. It is unsurprising that alcohol over-consumption is common in the lab workers here. I have no doubt that my name is going to be added to that list of over-consumers over the next month.

After showing me the well-equipped gym and large swimming pool next to the lounge, John takes me down to the next level. Both of us have to pass through even tighter security measures in order to enter and exit the elevator to our destination: the genetic labs that focus on human performance. Over many years of work here and in a few other labs, we have identified the genetic sequences and the interactions between the genetic sequences that impact numerous characteristics like intelligence, sex, muscle mass, strength, health, eye color, hair color, height, and race. We can already reliably control these factors in our babies and are experimenting with new genetic development to further advance our next generation of babies. We are still looking to improve our control over physical traits, such as the efficacy of muscle recruitment, healing, endurance, psychological traits such as loyalty, perseverance, will to live, creativity and spiritual traits such as psychic ability, sensitivity to the spiritual realms, aptitude for traveling the dimensions, and so on. These labs are not as stressful as the ones above, and the staff are rotated between the two sets of labs to give those working with the transhumans desperately needed breaks.

The lab technicians are carefully marking various sequences for further study. Depending on the experiment, the sequences are being spliced into eggs and sperm or fertilized eggs, then stored in row upon row on special climate-controlled shelves. Besides just trying to study outcomes of manipulating DNA, we have also been studying how the genetic engineering interacts with fertilization conditions as well as the environment of the womb. We continue to study each successfully born healthy child for several months to several years to identify the outcomes of the experiments. Once a particular series of experiments is deemed successful, we will use this knowledge to engineer the next batch of Jesuit babies in our labs located in Rome itself. In front of each shelf is a series of DNA sequences on a label that shows the part of the human genetic strand that is being researched. In the lab, these tiny cultured beings are known by this genetic strand, and not by name. Numbers are given to each zygote after implantation into its birthmother. The technicians raising these experimental children however do usually end up giving names to these children, rarely calling them by their numbers. I am excited about the work happening here because at this point, I believe the indoctrination that the gifted children we produce would create better soldiers of Satan and will make the world a better place.

The next set of rooms down the hall, however, make my stomach heave again. To unknowing eyes, there is nothing at all upsetting or unusual about these rooms. In fact, they look like a spa or retreat center for wealthy women wanting the best of care and rest during pregnancy. The place is beautifully appointed and extremely comfortable. It seemingly houses many happy-looking women at various stages of pregnancy whose needs are monitored by extremely well-trained attendants. In truth, these women have been enslaved to be carriers for the human and transhuman genetic experiments that I had been viewing since I arrived at CERN. The ones being given the most careful attention are actually the ones carrying the worst of the transhuman experiments; these chimeric pregnancies have very high failure rates so we give these mothers the most care. These women have been told that they are very privileged and will be rewarded highly for their work as surrogates. The truth is, however, in order to main the secrecy of CERN, every single one is killed once their use as healthy carriers has run out.

Some of the women are not carrying “genetic experiments”, but rather, “genetic products”. These are transhuman or genetically modified children specially ordered by the extremely wealthy from various occult societies around the world. Common requests include children completely covered in fur, having a slightly animal-like appearance, or those with both male and female genitals. Always, they request that these children come with sexual training upon delivery. We can deliver a broad number of designer “products” at a cost of only several million dollars each. Sales contracts specify that these children are not allowed to live past two and half years old. They are sterilized before being taken to their new owners. At times, individuals and families become attached to one of these special children, treating them as a “pet”, and have been reluctant to kill them at the end of the contract. We therefore have a fail-safe: an implant that releases poison to kill the child by the specified time. The implant is placed where attempts at removal will kill the child. The limited lifespan of these children helps ensure that they remain highly sought-after items.

After this, John takes me to the next level down to view the nurseries and labs where the experimental human children live during their first year of life. Those who live beyond this age are raised and monitored in a different facility. The nurseries look very much like the ones that the Jesuit children are raised in, with the spaces, studios and equipment for promoting and assessing the children’s mental, emotional, social, physical and spiritual development. The labs for assessing their levels of pain endurance, stamina, and responses to physical, emotional and spiritual stress, however, make me queasy. On the farthest end of the level are the rooms for autopsies and the disposal of the bodies of the children who do not survive the outcomes of their genetic manipulations, or do not survive the testing of their ability to endure pain, disease and stress. Somewhere, at the back of my mind, a quiet voice accuses me that by being part of this, I am no different from Mengele. By habit and the programming done on me since I was nursery age myself, I silence, then forget the accusation.

All in all, the full tour of our secret levels takes several more hours. Afterwards, we have a semi-formal dinner with excellent food in the largest reception room where John lets all the staff know that I will be replacing him. All of them have that weary look that pervades those at CERN. Yet again, I am struck by how these fathers who have been trained to handle trauma, exploitation and violence since their earliest years are nonetheless displaying signs of extreme stress here in this underground facility. When dessert is served, I make my rounds from table to table, chatting with my old friends at each table, affording me a very brief snapshot of each person’s mental state, work progress and relationships with other staff. Finally, John takes me to the private room, answers more questions I have, then orally gives me the codes for accessing each staff member’s file and takes me to my room. This room will be both my private work and sleeping space over the next six weeks. Despite the money we have poured into our CERN facilities, space is still at a premium and staff who are here on shorter rotations are given the less luxurious quarters.

I am far too disturbed by the day’s events to sleep, so I start reviewing the staff files. These chart in comprehensive detail the daily on-duty and off-duty activities of everyone. There is no privacy in this underground lab, where cameras and computers, and the ever-present badges that all must wear, show exactly what and where people are doing and going. I am particularly interested in reviewing their chosen coping mechanisms, especially the unhealthy ones: alcohol, excessive sleep, isolation, self-harm, and excessive engagement in sexual activities or changes in their pattern of sexual activities compared to their usual profile (sex of every type and with every type of partner is available here once someone has finished an 8-hour shift). Some do use strategies that seem healthier: journaling, art, meditation, watching funny movies, heavy exercise, spending more time talking with colleagues after hours, and so on. However, when I have the AI run the statistical analyses relating patterns of behavior and levels of stress, there seems to be no discernable meaningful difference between 'healthy' and 'unhealthy' coping mechanisms in mitigating stress. This finding has been noted many times by other assessors; the main thing that we have found over and over again is the correlation between rising stress and length of time at CERN.

I ask the AI to highlight the individuals whose mental health seem at highest risk. It uses numerous parameters to create the list including behaviors and activities off-duty, self-report of stress levels, length and quality of sleep, appetite, heartrate variability, levels of cortisol and other hormones over the day and month, quality of work, and quantity and quality of interactions with colleagues. The list that results includes the three scientists that John had already brought to my attention earlier in the day. I first review their videos for the past week, starting with the clips that the AI had already highlighted as being indicative of concern. I am more than dismayed as I watch one staff scientist mock a young human-simian chimera and remove its food and water for no reason at all. Such casual cruelty with no discernable scientific purpose is indicative of sociopathic traits. I knew this father and knew he was not sociopathic at all; this was a sign of extreme stress. The other clips are no less disturbing. I schedule time with each of the three for the next day. Two of these scientists have been here for over two months, and are thankfully almost at the end of their rotation. I hope to keep them from breaking down and help them to finish their last three weeks as strongly as possible. I set aside the most time for the first person that the AI listed, Father Augustine. She has only been here for a month, so I am especially worried about her.

I lie down to sleep in the last hour before the start of the workday. In that short time, I have nightmares of strange, feral creatures with piteous human eyes stalking me. Their eyes make me want to stop to help them, but when I do, they try to tear at me with venom-tipped claws. In some part of my mind, I know I am dreaming, but try as I might I cannot wake myself up anymore than these chimeras can wake themselves up out of the nightmare of their existence in CERN. Over and over again, I barely escape the claws. Such nightmares are one of the known side effects of working at CERN. This is why Mattheo and Lizzie will be assessing and monitoring my own mental health on a regular basis through our special secure communication channels. When I finally wake, I find that I cannot look at myself in the mirror when preparing for the day. Somehow, I feel like I am a monster.

I skip breakfast and go straight to the room where I will be talking with the three fathers scheduled for the morning. I hope that the extra time alone will help me to feel more like myself. The people at CERN are relying on my support and I cannot let them down. The room looks like any therapy room that you might find in any counseling center. Soft restful colors and comfortable furniture give the room a gentle ambiance. I am able to sit directly opposite or slightly across from the person I am assessing or counseling with no desk or any barrier in between. This room is used primarily for talking with the cult presenters who are doing the job of scientist at CERN; deeper assessment of the person's systems where I will be conducting brain scans and talking to the internal parts in charge of emotions, dreams, memory, program maintenance and so is done in a separate set of labs. After half an hour, the phone on the end table next to me rings. John lets me know that he has arrived in the room next to us, with two other members of the team responsible for staff welfare. They are able to observe and hear the sessions through a two-way mirror and microphones set up in the first room.

Augustine enters. I can tell that she is barely holding it together and is extremely ashamed of this fact. She looks hopefully at me. With no preamble at all, she requests a retuning of her emotion-management programs. I am taken aback. It is rare for members of the Order to directly request retuning of their programs or systems.

I reply gently, “Why don’t you first tell me what you think is going on with you?”

Augustine responds with a frustrated silence.

After five minutes, I repeat my question more firmly. Augustine capitulates and begins to share, hesitatingly at first, the horror she experiences in the labs and in her sleep at night. She is afraid that her programming is failing, and again, requests a retuning. In my position as the assessor, I feel a quick stab of sorrow in my chest that this loyal and diligent agent is blaming her own ‘weakness’ for her very human responses to the inhumanity at CERN, rather than being able to say, “What we are doing is horrifying.” Yet I know that if our roles were reversed, I would be responding in exactly the same way; the request is itself the result of years of programming and habituation to perceive evil actions as rational and beneficial events, and to fear our own human responses to evil.

With tears in her eyes, Augustine concludes, “I need to be able to do my job.”

I assure her that I will indeed be conducting a full assessment of her system, and will retune any programs as necessary. I am very careful, however, to emphasize that her responses to the work at CERN are normal and not a sign of programming failure. Almost every staff member I assess requires the same reassurance, even John and the two other trainers, Joel and Patrick, who have been in charge of maintaining staff mental health.

Over the next few weeks, my morning to mid-afternoons are spent conducting comprehensive system assessments of CERN staff and retuning of their systems in the programming labs. Counseling sessions are scheduled for the late afternoon, where the workers can pour out the feelings of horror, fear, sadness, confusion and grief that they feel as they work here. I also spend time observing the staff in their labs, in the lounges and other recreational facilities, and during mealtimes.

There is an observable hierarchy in how the transhumans are treated: the more human the chimera looks, the better it is treated. If they can speak a few words, all the better; those that can talk a little are given less unnecessary abuse, and more time, attention and nurture. The more animalistic children, on the other hand, consistently receive less nurture and more violence to “keep them in line.” Unlike the more human children, they cannot cry when slapped or hit, instead, they bite and growl and fight back at their tormenters. For this is how they view their captors, and rightly so. The difference in treatment bothers me deeply, even though I know that it is one way that the staff are coping. My evenings are spent in meetings with John and the other trainers to review the findings, and discuss intervention plans for each staff member and strategies for making working conditions more tolerable.

Three weeks pass. John left a week ago; I am now fully taking over his duties. At times, when I walk through the transhuman labs, I feel that some of the growls of the creatures there are directed at me. At night, their angry, feral eyes continue to stalk me in my dreams. When I visit the human experiment levels, the children seem to be looking at me with accusing eyes, even when they smile at me. It is getting harder and harder to be present for the staff during their counseling sessions. Another week passes drearily. I see circles under my eyes when I look in the mirror. I am also drinking every night now to fall asleep – me, the one who never drinks alcohol. I have also indulged in extra sexual activity which, again, is not typical for me.

I am due for the meetings with Matteo and Lizzie that occur every ten days. More frequent meetings would probably be more ideal for supporting me, but we have to balance my need for support with the need for minimizing the security risk inherent to communications between CERN and other locations. The communications app chimes and I give permission for Matteo to connect with my terminal.

He takes one look at me, and I can see the concerned surprise on his face. “How are you doing?” he asks, the concern reflected in his voice.

“About as well as could be expected in this place,” I reply. “I am so glad that it is only 167 hours, 43 minutes, and 12 seconds until I can leave here.” I have been counting not just the days, but the hours and minutes until I can go. My counting lets him know how stressed I really am.

“Are you taking breaks in the lounge?” he asks.

“Yes, of course, but I can’t break all day,” I respond with irritation. He knows this, and my anger is showing him my stress, too. I can’t help it.

“I want you to take three hours today, and go up and see some sunshine,” he says.

“What if I don’t come back?” I ask, half serious.

“You won’t go alone. I will have three others go up with you. Who else needs a break?”

“Everyone,” I respond. Mattheo chooses to ignore my sarcastic – but true - response.

Later that day, with three other fathers, all of us being at CERN in science-related roles, dressed in civilian clothes, we go up the elevators, and through a door to a small walkway that leads into a beautiful park with flowers. I had forgotten it was spring, living with the horrors down below the ground, never seeing the sun. There is a soft breeze, and the other workers and I soak up the sunshine. The other fathers are due to be rotated out soon, and this break will help them to endure the next week remaining as well; more time above ground is one of the strategies that John and I are proposing for improving workers’ health. The current one hour a week is too little.

The trees are in bloom, with cascades of white flowers on some and delicate hues of pink on others. We reach up to smell these flowers; I bend over to gently finger the velvety petals of small red flowers growing among the grass. The world is still a beautiful place. It is not all just the deep darkness that seems to surround the labs beneath the ground. A darkness that is more than just the twice-daily sacrifices made to Shiva in all our labs. This is a darkness that seems born out of trying to be gods, and to create new beings; to improve upon what has been originally created to develop new species. But today, for these hours, we are all feeling sunshine on our faces, and enjoying the beauty of a creation that has nothing to do with the work below ground. The time passes all too quickly, and reluctantly, we all go back down. But we also know that our remaining time is short, and this helps us to endure.

One week later, Vitali is up for duty at CERN. He will be replacing me, and we will spend two weeks working together before I fully hand off the role to him, as John did with me. As he enters the facility, his eyes cannot conceal the anticipatory dread that he is feeling. Like John before me, I give him a complete rundown on each person there. I then warn him about the feral beings that are the most dangerous, and the types of both human and near-human behavior that he can expect from beings equipped with strength, fangs, claws, and intelligence higher than that seen in animals. It has made me wonder if maybe it is not a good idea to try to "improve" on creation.

"Watch out for this one," I tell him, pointing to the part cheetah, feral child. "A week ago, she figured out how to escape from her cage, and killed two lab technicians." Vitali's eyes show a flash of fear.

"How did she do that?" he asks.

"She watched the techs, and learned the code for her cage."

"My God!" Vitali says. "She can think."

"All of them do," I say, giving him the basic warning all newcomers to CERN are given. "Never, ever underestimate their intelligence, no matter how much they still look or sound like animals. Always, always remember they have human DNA. This makes them dangerous."

"What did they do after this happened?" Vitali asks quietly.

"They added biometric security to the cages, so that only full humans without any animal DNA can open the cages. Voice recognition and face recognition are also now needed." I add, "She has been enraged ever since, so tread softly when near her cage."

The next two weeks passes all too slowly. Finally, with utter, complete relief, after a small ritual to Shiva at the altar before the passageway leading to my designated elevator for leaving, I pass through three security doors using biometric security. This is required since we want no chance that a transhuman could escape. In my parking space, a dark car is waiting for me. I get in, put my coffee thermos in a holder on the console, put some classical music on the radio, and start the drive back to Italy. I will pick up another agent on the other side of the tunnel, and we will take turns driving back to Rome. I can't wait to get away from here.

Back in Rome, I give my report. The team and I make several recommendations, including further reducing the length of rotations at CERN, allowing more time aboveground, soundproofing the transhuman enclosures (mikes in the cages would still allow the staff to track behaviors when needed, and the computers could flag any changes in vocalization patterns or unusual noises, or unusual movements), and adding another mental health support staff to increase the team number from three to four. I also strongly recommend that staff be allowed make a call at least once a week with the fathers and students they are the closest to who are not also at CERN; the enforced isolation from loved ones was another strong predictor of stress, alongside length of time there. This recommendation is accompanied with several ideas for minimizing the security concerns raised by there being frequent communications between the staff in CERN, and those in Rome and other facilities. I then go through the extensive amnesia programming used to wipe out my memories of CERN, programming that I actually want. Because nobody – absolutely nobody- wants to remember CERN once they have been there.

This chapter shows some of the extraordinarily bad things that can occur when people listen to Satan, and do things that we were never meant to do, including tampering with human DNA. I first recovered memories of CERN in 2009, and was horrified at what I was remembering. I had a panic attack that lasted two days straight, as the programming to forget these underground labs kicked in. But I knew that I could not make this type of thing up. I didn't WANT to make it up, I didn't want it to be true, but like a terrible creature, this memory sat within my mind and did not go away. Once the panic eased off, I was able to talk with the parts that had endured working at CERN. I learned that like all Jesuit trainers, I was sent there at intervals for years for periods that varied between 4 weeks and 6 weeks, to do these assessments and provide counseling for those who worked there.

I had nightmares for weeks, after these memories came up, and helped myself through the time of remembering by reassuring myself: "I survived being there the first time, and I can survive remembering. I can remember, and stay sane". I had to counteract several layers of security and amnesia barriers and punishments designed to prevent ever revealing this secret of the Jesuits: their transhuman and genetic experimentation. I had to deal with the sadness and despair as well that welled up, as I realized that human beings are actually capable of doing the kinds of things done at the labs in CERN – and yet, in spite of the emotional and spiritual cost of participating in this, continuing to do so.

Just for the record: if anyone should go into the isolated Swiss villages searching for the tunnel entrances I describe here, I highly advise against doing so. The agents of the Knights of Malta that guard them will first attempt to divert anyone coming near, but if all other methods fail, they are trained to create "accidents" that are fatal for those without authorization who are too inquisitive.

Chapter 15: Misha in Israel

I am 23 years old, and am in my Israeli presentation. While my real name is Mariam, everyone who knows me well calls me “Misha”. Here, I am a Jewish female of German descent. My aunt Gertrude raised me because my parents were killed in a freak auto accident when I was two years old. She came and got me from my parents’ kibbutz in Haifa when I was three years old. Gertrude had visited me from time to time while I was still in the kibbutz, but her work as a lawyer in Germany did not allow her to remain in Israel. She was finally able to secure a good consulting job the following year, and so took me to live with her in a suburb of Tel Aviv, a rapidly growing city in the 1960s.

As an older child, I loved wandering some of the streets, enjoying the scent of coffee mixed with cardamom, of teas mixed with pungent smelling spices, and the sight of rugs, linens, and various pots and pans for sale in the marketplace. I love visiting the ocean with my aunt and her friends, where the breeze is often soft and warm, and the sand crunches beneath my feet. I love this city and the areas surrounding it. I love the warm, friendly people of many nationalities who inhabit it. I love everything about this country of my birth.

I am excited about a party that I have invited to. At this party will be two young Mossad officers. One is the brother of Tati, a good friend from school; the other man is the friend of Tati’s brother. The brother is several years older than his sister, but I did see him from time to time when visiting her home, as friends of younger sisters do. I had always had a crush on him, but I was younger then and naturally, he completely ignored me. I am a young woman now so perhaps he might pay me a little more attention for once. I dress carefully and well, and apply my makeup expertly. My hair falls in soft, loose curls around my face. My best friend, who was also invited, picks me up in her car. We laugh and joke on the way, and enter the doors of the home where the party is being held.

There is music, wine, and a table filled with wonderful appetizers. I grab a glass, and pretend to take a sip, for I need my wits about me. I nibble on a plump olive on a skewer. I look around the room and spot Tati.

“Tati, isn’t it a beautiful day today?” I greet her. “And you look beautiful as well,” I add honestly. With her dark hair and eyes, and the light blue top she is wearing, she truly is a lovely girl. I gaze around the room as if looking over who is there.

“See anyone interesting?” I ask her with a slight smile. Like me, she has looked the room over. I have spotted Tati’s good-looking brother and his equally good-looking friend.

“We-l-l-l,” she says, drawing out the syllables, “there is that young violin player who is third chair in the symphony”. I look where her eyes are directed, and see a nice-looking young man there talking with another man.

“Well, what are you waiting for?” I whisper. “Let’s go meet him and his friend.” I hope that as we cross the room, Tati’s brother will notice us. I am reluctant to go up to him myself, recalling a few embarrassing incidences from my teen years where he had responded to my interest by treating me like a stupid kid.

Hours later, my strategy bears fruit. Tati’s brother walks across the room and approaches me. “Aren’t you Misha?” he asks. “I know I know you.” He has been “out of town” for three years so hasn’t seen me for quite a while.

"Yes, I'm Misha. And you are Beni? I remember you too."

We start talking, and as the evening goes on to the late hours, we realize that we enjoy conversing with each other. Finally, I am the one to end our conversation. "It's late, and I have to go to work tomorrow," I say regretfully. "But I have enjoyed talking with someone who enjoys the same things I do."

"Let me drive you home," he offers. I know that the girlfriend who drove me to the party left an hour ago.

"Thank you. You are a true gentleman." I smile and we leave the party together.

Tati is ecstatic when we meet the next day during our lunch break at a nearby park. She can't stop talking about the young musician that she spent several hours chatting with the night before and is already dreaming of having a very special relationship with him. Close to the end of our lunch hour, she finally stops raving about the musician, gives me a sideways glance and says, "I saw you spent a long time talking to Beni. What did you two have to talk about?"

I give a little laugh. "Oh, this and that. We both like art, and architecture, and botanical science," I say.

"Well, he talked with you longer than I've ever seen him talk to a girl before."

I look into her eyes, to assess her reaction to this. She seems pleased, so I can't help blushing and looking down with a shy smile.

A year later, Beni and I are married. We live in a condo near the beach in Tel Aviv, and we love to take walks on the beach whenever opportunity permits. Over the next few years, I will have three children with him: Abigail, Benjamin Jr. and Samuel. Unfortunately, Beni is killed in action while the two boys are still very young. As sons of a deceased Mossad agent who show promise, Benjamin and Samuel are recruited by the Mossad when they are adults.

The Jesuits hate Israel and the Jewish people, and thus have invested a lot of time and effort attempting to infiltrate its military and intelligence organizations. They have spent decades building cover identities for its agents that span several generations, creating a pool of 'sabras' that would be welcome in any military, intelligence, political, economic or spiritual role in Israeli society, given the right credentials. It would not be possible to infiltrate the Mossad and many other Israeli agencies otherwise, as these agencies are extremely cautious in their recruitment, and they forbid their agents from forming intimate relationships with individuals whose backgrounds cannot be completely traced and vetted as being safe for Israeli interest. During the time period described in this memory (and it won't surprise me if this was still true), in order to prevent their agents from being seduced or otherwise hoodwinked by spies or assets from other countries or agencies, Mossad agents were trained to identify even subtle seduction and were also forbidden to reciprocate any interest shown by members of the opposite sex. All romantic relationships had to be clearly initiated by the agent himself and reported to the Mossad, and they were encouraged to only form relationships with women they had already known their whole lives.

The need for impeccable multigenerational cover identities in Israel provides yet another example of why Jesuits program their people with presentation parts who only have memories and awareness of their lives with their families in their respective countries. Misha, my Israeli presenter, could pass perfectly as a sabra who had grown up in Israel and whose family had been in Israel since its inception.

Misha was completely unaware that her interest in Beni, or her behavior during the party was the result of programming, or that her years of befriending his sister was on orders from the fathers. She was just as unaware that this programming was based on detailed intelligence on Beni where even what she wore to the party and how she styled her hair was calculated to be what he would find attractive. Misha also did not know that her reluctance to approach him was actually a strategy to keep him from having to avoid her because of the Mossad stricture against reciprocating romantic interest. Instead, she completely believed that she was feeling shy because of her embarrassing experiences of him showing her no interest at all when she was a teenager. Furthermore, Misha did not know that her still being a virgin at 23, or having only had a short dating relationship a couple of years ago, was not as she believed the result of natural modesty, shyness, or her rather proper upbringing under a strict aunt in a conservative community, but rather, because Mossad agents would only be allowed to marry virtuous maidens. Like the other presenters who are unaware of other parts within, Misha was completely unaware that the cult presenter was watching through her eyes and monitoring every step of the mission to entrap Beni, wearing her like a mask or pair of gloves for the mission. Most of all, she did not know that the two sons she believed were conceived through a loving relationship with Beni were actually genetically-enhanced babies that had been implanted in her in a lab, or that his accidental death when she was pregnant with her second son was actually an assassination.

When these memories came forward, I felt incredible sadness and self-disgust that I allowed myself to be used in this way against a nation who did not deserve this type of hatred – no nation does. I met parts inside who were incredibly loyal to Israel, who loved this land and had felt a deep sense of peace there despite the regional unrest and constant threat to its existence. But I also had parts who hated all Jews. Their hatred was created during early childhood when the fathers pretended to be Jewish and abused them horribly. These programming scenarios were similar in many ways to the anti-Christian setups done to me as an infant and very young child. I was horrified to realize that these feelings existed, and that in essence, I was hating myself, for I have Jewish DNA. It took time, tears and choosing to forgive myself and others, and to process the rage, pain and torment of the abuse memories, to help these parts that hated to understand that hate is never a solution to abuse. Then came the grief, the betrayal, as I realized that the "Jews" who had taught me to hate the Jewish people through their horrendous abuse were actually the fathers I loved, pretending to be Jews just to teach me to hate.

I hated that they had taught me to hate, a hatred that has existed generationally within the Order (and the Catholic church) for many centuries. It took time, but I eventually came to embrace my own Jewish roots. It also took time to come to a place where my Jewishness was no longer a point of further amnesia and dissociation (as self-hatred will create dissociation). I am deeply grieved to see the rise of anti-Semitism around the world today, for this is simply part of the occultic agenda. Why would the occult hate the Jewish people? Because according to scripture, the Jewish race is where Jesus, the true Messiah, came from, and will be the people to which He first returns. There are prophecies in the parts of the Old Testament read by the Jewish people (Tanakh) about the true King of Israel (Messiah) returning through the east gate of Jerusalem, which I believe (and the occultists also believe). Their hope is that by destroying the Jewish race, or at the least, turning them away from their true Messiah by offering a false one (the "Light of the World") they can grieve God's heart, for He deeply loves the Jewish people, with whom He made lasting covenants that will endure throughout the centuries. Satan hates God, and therefore, hates the people that God loves, and so wants to wound God by wounding and turning away His people, the people called the "root" by the apostle Paul that gentiles have been "grafted into". So, missions against Israel have a special importance with the Jesuit Order, and their first general (the one just below the Superior General) oversees missions within Israel, helping to coordinate them and plan with others the strategies that will be used.

Chapter 16 Nephilim Project

It is six months later, and I have been called to one of our facilities in southern Poland where we have a project to bring the Nephilim – the product of sexual relations between a human being and a spiritual being – back to earth. Almost two years ago, a viable male Nephilim fetus, born prematurely at seven and a half months, has been raised in the Polish facility in an old isolated monastery. The birth mother, weakened while carrying the fetus due to the spiritual oppression, died during the birth in spite of new support strategies being tested (such as having two others with high spiritual ability help to surround her and "take" some of the oppression). I and other trainers have been visiting frequently to assess and learn what such creatures need. One chilling fact that we have learned is that it required human blood to be mixed in with its formula in order for it to grow. This was not new information to us as the ancient knowledge supposedly preserved from Atlantis and other cultures already informed us of this. Nonetheless, it was chilling to have it confirmed in front of us.

As this baby grew, it did not look fully human. It was taller than normal for its age, with elongated limbs, and was very pale in color. Its personality traits from earliest infancy were quite different from fully human babies. This little being liked violence; it did not have the natural antipathy to it often seen in human babies. We did not have to overcome a natural human reluctance to kill. In fact, we quickly realized that our training efforts had to focus on bonding it strongly with several human beings, and preventing it from killing indiscriminately by teaching it instead when and how it was okay to kill.

As I walked onto the grounds of the monastery, the father over this facility, Father Andreas, greets me. "I'm glad you're here," he said. "I want you to see something."

He leads me down a path behind the monastery worn over the centuries by many feet. Here was a barn for the cows and goats and a large chicken coop for the chickens that provided the facility staff with fresh eggs. As we get closer, I suddenly stop. Scattered in a heap next to the coop were the bodies of dozens of chickens. Each one had its head snapped off. The heads were strewn over the yard. Some looked like if they had been chewed on. I looked at Andreas, surprised.

"Lat got out yesterday afternoon on his own. He went to the chicken yard, and did this." Andreas tells me. He looks over the yard, shaking his head slightly as he does so.

I am shaken. Normal children do not do this. Even human children who have sociopathic or psychopathic traits do not kill in this violent way at two and a half years old just for the love of killing. I have no profiles, no databases, to teach me what to do in a situation like this. I am in new territory, like Andreas and the other fathers.

"What should we do?" he asks me.

I have no idea. "I want to talk to Lat," I finally say. I realize that I need more information on what happened from the child himself. He is sitting at a low table in the secure nursery that is two levels under the monastery building. Few toys are in the room, in which the walls have been left their original dull grey. We have learned that he has little interest in the usual attractions of early childhood. Lat's snack, I can see, is fresh raw hamburger mixed with cooked. The fathers have been trying to get him to get used to eating cooked meat. At this point, he hates cooked meat and will only eat it if it is drizzled with fresh blood.

"Why did you kill the chickens?" I ask him.

Lat uses his mind more than verbal speech to communicate with me. "I liked the noise they make when I killed them." To this tiny child, the chickens were not pets or providers of food, but a source of amusement. "I didn't want them to die so fast," Lat communicates.

To my horror, I realize he did not mean he didn't want them to die. Rather, he was sorry that they died too quickly and so ended his amusement all too soon.

I leave the room. Taking Andreas and two other trainers from the facility with me, I call up the training council and Mattheo by sat-link conference on a highly secure channel protected by biometrics. I describe the incident, and then ask, "What should we do?" This child could be very dangerous as he grows larger and stronger. He will likely not limit his amusement to chickens. We would be fools to not take caution now before he grows any older.

"I think that this child had insufficient socialization and bonding to humans," says Mattheo. We all nod our heads, agreeing.

"So, what do I do with a remarkably strong and healthy child that is basically without conscience, one that has only one real human bond, to Andreas? He can control him, but not forever." I ask the question that is in all of our minds. The implications for the future are dreadful.

"You will have to put him down," Lizzie says quietly.

We are all silent a moment. One of the first Nephilim to be born, a child treasured as a product of a century of hard work, and it must die.

"I agree," Mattheo says regretfully. "We can't risk more deaths, including our own deaths, as it gets older."

"I agree," I say. "But let me study him and collect a bit more data first. Maybe the information I can get will help us improve things next time." We were committed to this project, in spite of its risks.

"Go ahead," Mattheo tells me. "But don't get hurt yourself."

I nod in agreement. Over the next week, I assess and try different interventions with this unusual toddler to see what might work, and what doesn't. Because I have strong theta skills, I can sense the toddler's glee when the twice daily ritual at the facility is done. Its glee seems born not out of spirituality, but an innate malice towards human beings and a deep enjoyment of their deaths. I then, for the first time, start to really wonder what we are bringing into the world. The immortals have assured us it is good and necessary to bring about these half-human creatures, but deep in my gut, I sense they are wrong. Of one thing I am sure: this toddler is not "good" in any sense of the word that I am aware of. In fact, it seems to be the opposite.

Lat submits surprisingly docilely to the numerous brain scans, being rewarded with raw beef liver each time. We spend hours talking. He enjoys this, since I can use theta skills to communicate, which is easier than speech at this young age. The problem is that he also delights in putting horrifying thoughts into my mind as we communicate, thoughts which cause me to turn white upon which he squeals with malicious delight. Lat doesn't enjoy playing with inanimate objects much. He can already read but is not interested in books or creative pursuits like drawing or coloring either. He hounds me to get more chickens to replace the ones that died. And he knows that I know why he is asking. His perception and intelligence are unfortunately focused on whatever would cause me distress when we are together. His physical health and strength are also beyond ordinary and his theta ability is extremely advanced for his age in comparison to human children. I silently thank all immortals that we have never taught this child to use its theta ability to kill and that we had the sense and caution to not go into that aspect of his training. We know this child would have been killing much more than chickens if we had – and that he will teach himself all too soon to kill humans. I shudder at the thought of what a tantrum by this child would look like as he got older, if he was denied something he wanted.

We add the week's information to the meticulous records obtained by Andreas and his team since the child's birth. Then the time comes. It will have to be put down. I know that I cannot be in the room as this child would be able to "read" the intent using his theta connection with me, and would try to kill us all or escape. So, Andreas and several of the other fathers go into the room. Andreas has brought in a small bowl of raw bloody lamb liver and organ meats. This is Lat's favorite meal which Andreas has poisoned. He gives a dose that is much larger than would be required for a human child of the same size, to ensure that death will be quick, and hopefully painless.

It is not. The toddler becomes violently ill, struggling as though with an almost superhuman power to live. Andreas finally has to inject Lat with a sedative combined with more poison; it takes ten times the normal dose until the child finally closes his eyes, and stops breathing. I watch all of this from a video monitor in the next room. When the child is dead, I come back in. I feel a chill, and something like darkness in the room, a darkness that seems to hover there, before it finally seems to rise and leave. We are all emotionally drained by this experience. Father Andreas is weeping silently. He had loved this child, dangerous as it was, and feels that in some way, he has failed by not being able to teach the child not to kill.

"You didn't fail," I tell him later that evening. "We still don't understand how these children think, or learn, and you have no way of knowing what to do – or what not to do." But as I say these words of comfort, I realize that I, also, felt a failure as well. For I also do not understand these little half-human beings, not enough to prevent tragedies like this.

The next day, Father Andreas puts in a request with his bursar for more chickens, and I leave the monastery to return to Rome. Lizzie, Simon, and I will return in a year when another nephilim is born after eight months in the womb, and as a result looks more human. We continue our work to develop effective strategies for bonding these beings to human beings which they inherently despise and enjoy destroying, and to teach them to control their lust for killing.

The job as a trainer was often difficult and dangerous in part due to projects such as described in this chapter. We were doing things that were prompted by Satan and other demonic beings, things that should never occur. Our attempts to mate human beings with spiritual beings to birth hybrids seems to in fact mimic a key factor in provoking the destruction of the world by the great flood, according Genesis 6:1-8. We called the creatures "nephilim", the word that the Bible also uses to describe these beings. We mouthed the words that the Nephilim project would advance civilization and we were heavily programmed to believe in this ridiculous lie, but listening to the demonic is always, always a very bad idea, as this chapter shows.

The Nephilim project is one of three huge reasons why several years later, I will choose to leave the Jesuit Order. Deep within under my programming and indoctrination, I realized that what we were doing was an atrocious, unspeakable degree of evil, and that we were creating beings not only with no love or care for mankind but also an enthusiastic commitment to mankind's destruction. Deep within, I knew that even if those who were occultists could not destroy the world (see Chapter 17 for more details on this agenda), then these beings, when old enough, would have no trouble in doing so. This chapter shows the deep deception that those of us trapped in the occultic world and beliefs of the Jesuit Order were vulnerable to: we could not see how evil and destructive the things were that we were doing, and at moments when that realization flashed through our consciences and minds, those thoughts were immediately suppressed due to our mind control and lifetime of programming.

When these memories first came forward, I was racked with shame and anguish. "How could I have done these things? How could I have been part of bringing this type of horror into the world, help to unleash this type of destructive being on creation?" The simple answer, which is no excuse, is "I was programmed to believe, since I was in the womb, that what I was doing was right." The reality, as this chapter illustrates, is that even in spite of this programming and mind control, when confronted with sheer, unfettered evil, I still recognized at a deep level that "this is wrong". And this caused me to begin a process of questioning the events and people who had assured me for a lifetime that obeying Satan and doing what he asks is "ascending" and becoming "better." As the years passed and I was tasked with more and more evil, it was getting harder and harder to deny that every idea of Satan that I had seen executed during my lifetime in this group showed the reverse: that he actually wants the destruction of human beings, and does not care about giving humanity a "hand up". Instead, he would like to see us create "hell on earth". The programming facilities, Nephilim projects, and CERN all certainly are types of hell.

This is why I have chosen to leave this former belief system, and choose to believe in the God who created heaven and earth; a God who loves mankind, a God who in His wisdom forbids the kind of activities that I am describing as I share about my life as a Jesuit Father. I believe that we are within a last generation before Jesus returns to earth (I don't know when, but believe it can't be long), because of the sheer evil that is being done by men and women who are enslaved to the demonic. I believe that in His mercy, God will stop this type of activity, and not allow it to continue unchecked. I am grateful that the Bible shares that God's kingdom is unshakeable, and that HIS kingdom – and NOT the hellish, destructive kingdom of the occult – will reign forever. I know which kingdom I want to belong to, and this is why I left the Order eventually.

Chapter 17: Head Trainer

I am now in my mid-20s, and spend plenty of time in the main programming facility in Rome as a trainer. This facility has been my real home since I was an infant. Working here feels natural, despite how each day opens and closes with rituals done to Shiva at sunrise and sunset. In our worldview, she is the god who destroys mortality in order to allow immortality to ascend from within. We call on her to help with programming which we claim is a means of controlling a person's mortality to make complete obedience to Satan possible, which in turn makes immortality and reaching for the greater good possible. None of us dare to admit that the 'mortality' which makes a person resist abuse, murder and exploitation of self and others is not 'weakness' or 'folly' but in fact, it is our precious human conscience. (Note: the Jesuit Order depicts Shiva as female, despite Shiva being male in Hinduism).

I just have been asked to run this facility because Mattie has been reassigned to lead the facilities in Poland and East Germany. I cringe at the thought of the added responsibility but "no" is never an option in the Order. Hopefully, in a few years, this position will be handed over to another of the many talented trainers in the Order. I am grateful that Mattie will still remain highly involved, shuttling between the three locations as needed. My work involves overseeing the other highly skilled trainers who continuously evaluate, revise and implement the programming and training plans for the babies, children and adult agents. We are also developing the plans for the upcoming group of new babies. While every of batch of babies is special, we are really excited about this group because the oracles have prophesied that they will bring in the long-awaited Light of the World (dubbed by some as the "antichrist"). Not just that, but they also comprise the Generation 12 and Generation 13 series of genetic enhancements. These babies are expected to be significantly brighter and stronger in every way than the previous generations.

When the babies are born, two in particular catch my interest. Both are girls, one with blond hair and light brown eyes, and the other has black hair and black eyes. They have fiery temperaments, able to hate and love with equal passion, and from their first day, they are extraordinarily responsive to any show of affection or abuse. I fall in love with them from the first day I see them. I carry them one at a time in turns in a sling for a few hours a day, even when I am working in the labs, in order to create a strong bond between us. This is a new training protocol we are instituting with many of the G12 and G13 babies who are showing signs of being very strong thetas. The trainers believe that the extra attachment will help to prevent these children from using their abilities to maim or kill those who train them as they get older. We are careful as well to ensure that each baby has sling time with at least four trainers on regular rotations to increase the likelihood that there will be a trainer present capable of controlling the child. This is important as each father has multiple roles and many duties. If only one or two fathers are bonded to the child and they are away from the facility on a different job when the child has a crisis, it could create a difficult situation. The sling time will also help to counter the traumas that these infants must endure to develop their theta skills.

While the new protocol is ostensibly for improving training, in my heart, I am delighted to be permitted to be more nurturing than I had ever been allowed to be before. I am sure that the other trainers feel the same way. As I watch the other trainers embrace this new protocol, I realize that we will have to be careful that we do not end up favoring these babies over the older children that we had not been allowed to attach as deeply with.

Besides carrying babies in slings, my days are divided between observing and providing feedback on the ongoing programming of the children, programming the children that have been assigned to me, and reviewing recordings of sessions and reports. The programming (trauma-based mind control) reports and sessions often overlap with training (education in various skills) reports and sessions. This work is interspersed with endless meetings with the other trainers to discuss the progress of each person being trained and programmed. We use numerous sources of information to evaluate the progress: reports generated by the programming and medical AI, human intuition, direct observation, the programmed subject's self-reports, and so on.

We all work together as a team to ensure that each child is receiving the best programming and training that we can give, mutually valuing one another's suggestions, insights, opinions and ideas. I might be "head trainer" here, but I would be nothing without a good team, and we all know it. We are also all mentoring younger students, who are learning to become skilled trainers themselves, just as we were mentored. Life in the facility consists of programming, mentoring and relationships between those working there, and if someone has an issue with how things are being done, or a suggestion for how to improve things, I welcome them, as we all do. We well know that one individual should never make all of the decisions. The best strategies are created with the back and forth, and lively argument, that mark leadership meetings in the various councils of the Order. The only time this give and take that promotes sharing new ideas is squelched is when Satan is personally present, and dictates a new order. Then, the other trainers and I must meekly bow and either agree, or ask a carefully couched question to highlight concerns about potential negative effects of the order on the children, but couched oh, so carefully, in order to not appear to be directly questioning his demand.

After a training council meeting, I go into Lizzie's office. "I'm tired," I tell my sister. "I wish we could take a break and go sailing." I look up at the ceiling, and close my eyes. "I guess I've just put in too many hours this week."

"We all have," Lizzie says. She looks and sounds tired, too. "This new batch of babies is very energetic, and seems to have a lot of theta skills already. They need lots of nurture, too, to balance it."

"You're right," I agree. "What do you think I should do about Melisandre?" I am asking about a young female infant who is developing rapidly. I value my sister's opinion, and ask her and Mattie frequently for advice with the children who demonstrate capabilities beyond that demonstrated by previous genetic generations. The children from G12 and G13 are smarter than me, and I need some thoughts from others on how to approach these highly intelligent babies with precocious theta skills.

I think of one precious little baby who is easy to love, and who already is a handful. The day before, she had used her theta skills to knock down a trainer who had made her angry, at a time that was unexpected – months ahead of normal. I agree with Lizzie's assessment, but I wonder if lots of love will be enough with these babies who are already being taught to kill just by using their minds. It makes me and the other trainers decide to provide even more extra nurturing and bonding time. We don't want to die suddenly of a heart attack in a few months from a toddler who is furious with us. These babies are capable of being very dangerous. We know we have to direct their rage away from us, and towards the correct targets: themselves, or those we want them to kill. At times, it feels as if we are walking a fine tightrope.

I fleetingly wonder how long Mengele would have lived if he had been working with these super theta babies. Not long, I think to myself, 'They would have dropped him like a toad during the first month.' Somehow, the thought gives me a perverse sense of pleasure, then I feel a bit uncomfortable. For while I am not Mengele, I know that at times as a trainer, I use painful and harsh methods. I feel a quick flash of guilt and wonder if I, one day, will be dropped like a toad by one of them, and that perhaps I do indeed deserve such an end. I push the thoughts aside, and look at my schedule for the rest of the day.

A Question from a Child

I am 30 years old. Several of the children we are raising in the Rome facility are my genetic children. These children actually have more than two parents, as we combine DNA from several individuals for each child in our genetic program. I love all the children in the facility, whatever our degree of biological relationship. One child, however, Althea, is special. She has dark eyes, black hair, and is incredibly perceptive and intelligent. I secretly call her my daughter in my heart, but I am, as all good trainers are, careful to treat her the same as I treat the other children. She is one of the first children from Generation 13. The oracles have indicated that this generation, and especially this child, will have a huge impact on the future. But this child is a challenge. She is constantly asking very difficult questions, and many of the trainers dread the task of keeping up with her.

When Althea is three years old, she challenges us in a way that we will remember for years. This child asks for a meeting with the training council, consisting of the 12 head trainers for the Jesuit Order. She says that she has an important question for us, and I can sense the deep earnestness of her request. As it is the end of November, the entire council is already in Rome, close by or on the way back, for our year-end meetings regarding the training and programming going on across our facilities in various countries. I arrange for Althea to ask her question at the beginning of our first meeting.

As we sit in our council chairs, this little three-year old comes before us and asks a question that floors us, "Why do we all fear and obey Satan? Wouldn't our lives be better if we just stopped doing that?"

Her question is greeted by a thunderous silence. None of us has a good response to this question. In fact, this question strikes at the heart of all our own programming, which is based upon a terror of disobeying Satan and obeying every single command in word and spirit. Finally, Mattie responds, "That wouldn't work. He would torture and kill us, or force others to torture and kill us if we did that."

"Not if we all agree together not to obey him. Then he couldn't force us to hurt and kill anyone," the child, Althea, replies with flawless logic. Again, silence greets her.

Althea is courageous. She stares at each of us with bright inquisitive eyes, a child surrounded by adults, genuinely curious about how we will answer her. After all, her question makes perfect sense to her.

"This is a spiritual question, one for the mages," Jonathan mutters. "Let's call them in, too." He wants to fob this question off on another leadership group, and not take responsibility for having no answer. After all, if we have no good answer, we will look like fools before this child.

I text the mage council, telling them there is an emergency meeting in the Training Council room and that their presence is requested ASAP. Six show up within a half hour, including the three top mages, and we share with them what is going on.

Althea stands curious and unafraid before both councils. When prompted, she asks again, “Why don’t we all together agree to stop obeying Satan? Why do we let him bully us and tell us what to do? Wouldn’t our lives be better if we just stopped doing that?”

The mages are absolutely shocked. No one has ever openly asked this question before, and certainly no child has. Despite my programming, I am rooting for my daughter, but also realize that this question could end in a very slow and painful death for her. The Jesuit Order is predicated upon obeying Satan, and booting him from this position of ultimate authority is…unthinkable. It goes against everything we have all been programmed to believe. It is the one thing we are all terrified of even thinking. Yet this three-year-old, traumatized and programmed since her days in the womb, is saying these things out loud. To all of us.

The head mages consult together, muttering and hemming. One finally speaks. Even before she opens her mouth, I can tell from her and the other mages’ body language that they have no satisfactory answer either. “This child is much too young to understand spiritual realities fully and her question comes from this ignorance,” the head of the mage council, a woman named Janus, declares. “What on earth have you been doing in her training and programming? Obviously, you” – she points at the training council – “have failed her utterly in not addressing this type of childish immaturity.”

My sister, Lizzie, who is one of the 12 head trainers, takes Althea out of the room and returns her to her classes. We all sit silently, no one daring to voice our thoughts, as we wait for Lizzie to return. When she returns, both councils immediately begin discussing what to do with Althea, and how to teach her the “wisdom” of fearing and obeying Satan that her “wiser” elders have learned both from their experience, and the experience of the centuries. Despite the sheer busyness of this time of the year and the long agenda the training council originally had for this meeting, dealing with Althea now took precedence; Althea’s brief question and simple logic unraveled not just our programming, but also the very foundation of life in the Order. If this was the kind of thinking that our brilliant new generations were capable of, then we needed plans for addressing the problem.

After sketching plans for programming away such ‘childish folly’ from Althea and assessing the other children for such concerns, I leave the room, unspeakably saddened. The Christmas decorations seem three shades duller than they were just two hours before when I had walked down the hallway towards the meeting room. I knew that my daughter’s questions were excellent. I hear my own voice, betraying my own programming, deep inside my head echoing Althea’s question, “What if we all do stop obeying Satan? How might life be different for those of us in the Order?” I keep these questions unspoken, and hidden from my own programmers, deep inside.

This event shows that children do question things, despite the constant indoctrination, enculturalization and programming. Althea showed exceptional courage and insight. She saw and dared to state the truth that we were slaves to Satan, and that life would be better if we stopped listening to him. How sad it is that questions like this are squelched, punished and “programmed away”. How I wish we could have asked the same question, and acted on her advice to all stop obeying him together. In spite of being “leadership” we ourselves were all mind controlled and programmed, and were slaves of Satan as surely as if we had golden rings in our noses that he could pull on anytime he wished. This was the sad reality behind the spirituality of the Order, then and now.

Prenatal Programming

It is early morning, and I steel myself for my rounds in the areas of the facility in Rome dedicated to prenatal programming. Such programming is based on exploiting the fetus' emotional and physical dependency on the mother. Cult researchers discovered in the late 30s and 40s that the fetus can be reliably conditioned to obey if the mother is the one giving the commands, and the one punishing and rewarding the fetus. They also discovered that a fetus will take actions against her or her own instincts (such as allowing himself or herself to be electrocuted without trying to wiggle away) to save its birthmother from pain or death, or to keep the birthmother from getting angry at it. Prenatal programming involves tremendous trauma to the women and child, so this is the aspect of my job as a trainer that I hate the most.

The prenatal programming section is defended by several layers of security. Every inch is monitored by cameras and microphones. Pressure-, movement- and heat-sensing devices in strategic places also contribute to security. No birthmother has ever escaped the facility. The majority of the rooms here are perfectly soundproof with no windows; the birthmothers have no hint of what a programming session for the fetus involves until they are experiencing it themselves. I greet the programmers and students who have been on night shift with the birthmothers. We have a brief meeting; all is progressing as expected and they have nothing significant or concerning to report. I take another half hour to review with two students the files for the three birthmothers I will be working with today. This is longer than I usually take as these students are only 9 years old and it is their first year of being mentored in prenatal work.

Our first subject for the day is the mother Cerine and the fetus Fiona who is 26 weeks old. Fiona has shown herself to be remarkably resilient: her heartrate and blood pH usually returns to normal 30% faster than average after a trauma for a fetus of her age, and she is able to tolerate higher than average levels of pain. Just as importantly, she shows signs of being highly programmable: she obeys Cerine and the programmers very quickly, typically dissociates into responsive rather than catatonic states, and responds to cues and triggers consistently and correctly with the desired behaviors that she was previously taught. The fathers are very hopeful that Fiona has what it takes to accept and survive her prenatal programming, and so be one of the new Jesuit babies born in the coming year.

Cerine greets me enthusiastically when I walk into the lab. To prevent the fetus from developing an aversion to the programmers' voices, all the birthmothers are programmed to feel great affection and trust for them, and to dissociate any negative feelings from being tortured by them. I smile at her and watch carefully as the two 9-year-olds gently and quickly help Cerine to position herself comfortably on the programming table. They then strap her in, and attach the monitoring devices and other devices to her and Fiona.

I feel a slight pang that I quickly suppress as I insert a needle into the womb through one of the semi-permanent tubes left in the birthmother for passing objects in and out of the womb. Fiona has already learned to allow herself to be hurt upon command by the birthmother, and also whenever the birthmother shows distress. Today, we will be introducing her to the next stage of her training: instead of just passively allowing herself to be hurt, she has to learn to actively inflict pain on herself when ordered to. I hit a button on the side of the table that causes the needle to light up inside the womb.

At my cue, Cerine states firmly into the microphone that transmits her voice clearly into her womb, “Go to the needle.”

The fetus, anticipating pain, hesitates. She already knows from much experience that needles, clamps, electric probes and other foreign objects in the womb cause horrible pain.

I give the birthmother the verbal code and hand gesture for ‘bad baby’ i.e., punish the baby. We usually accompany oral cues with hand signals because we believe that even though the fetus cannot see outside the womb, his or her synchronicity with the mother means that he or she will be more responsive to the signals later in life.

I give the birthmother the verbal code and hand gesture for “save me”. Immediately, Cerine screams, “Save me from the pain!” She is in severe distress, since she also feels the shocks that feel like fire running through her abdomen. She continues, “The only way it will stop is if you obey! The only way it will stop is if you obey!”

I hold my hand up in the pause signal. Cerine falls silent at once, and the student stops the electric shocks. For several moments, there is no discernable activity in the programming room, other than Cerine’s gasping pants as she tries to recover her breath. I watch on the monitor to see if Fiona has stopped quivering. It is critical to give a fetus of this age a pause so that it does not just go into sheer panic or overwhelm and be unable to obey the next command. Sheer panic and overwhelm is useful for causing dissociation, but today’s goal was not to teach dissociation, but rather, conditioning the fetus to actively hurt herself. Within four weeks, the fetus will be considered developed enough that the pause will no longer be given. Instead, she will be expected to hear and response to a second command to obey even through the pain and distress of being punished.

Again, on cue, Cerine states firmly, “Go to the needle!”

We all hold our breaths for a moment. Fiona is extraordinarily responsive, but most fetuses do require several rounds of torture before they will capitulate to actively hurt themselves. However, she wiggles her tiny arms and legs, swims hard towards the brightly lit needle, allowing it to pierce her upper arm. She quivers in pain and distress, opening and closing her tiny hands.

I immediately withdraw the needle as the birthmother starts rubbing her belly and cooing, “Good baby, good baby, you obeyed me, I love you so much. Always obey me instantly and I will always love you.”

Once again, Fiona has started her day with another experience of associating instant obedience, even to a command that brings pain, with maternal love and comfort, and any hesitation to obey with severe pain and rejection. Through many hours of such experiences in the womb, this lesson will be retained at an unconscious level as a foundation to that individual’s lifelong mind control by the cult.

After the programming session is over, I assess both the birth mother and fetus for their physiological and emotional responses; the other members of the programming team are doing the same for the birth mothers and fetuses they are working with. Over the next five minutes, heartrates for both return to normal, and the birth mother is given an excellent meal before she is given permission to spend the rest of the morning in the recreation area of the prenatal section. In the afternoon, this programming session will be repeated to help Fiona deeply absorb this lesson.

"You did well," I tell Cerine. "I will see you both tomorrow."

Prenatal programming reflects the knowledge the Jesuits gained from Mengele that the birthmother herself should be heavily involved in programming the developing child. Because of how deeply connected to and dependent the fetus is on the birthmother for survival, safety and attachment, he discovered that beliefs and emotions instilled and modeled by the birthmother go very deeply into a fetus's psyche. In other words, programming installed by a birthmother is much harder for that person to question and break later in life. Since his discovery, the Jesuits have used the birthmother as a fetus' first and most beloved 'programmer'. As a foundation for a lifetime of mind control, it is the birthmother's voice that gives instructions to the developing fetus. Most importantly, the birthmother conditions the fetus to obey her by cooing in love if the fetus responds as desired, and berates, rejects and punishes the fetus if she or he does not.

These birth mothers are young women around 18 years old. They are obtained from other occult groups, generally the smaller, and less wealthy and powerful ones. The Jesuits pay these groups well for selling them healthy, already dissociative female toddlers. Not all the children are bought, as some are given to us in exchange for favors, services or protection. The Jesuits raise these children in another isolated facility where they are trained and programmed to be able to help program their fetuses, and to believe that becoming a birthmother is the greatest joy and privilege in the world. The programmers do a final careful assessment before selecting women for each batch of babies, looking for mental and physical resilience, how well their programming has taken and the young woman's commitment to the new world order. The mages also assess the women spiritually, seeking guidance from the 'immortals' as to which women should be carrying the next group of children. Those who are rejected are either sent to CERN to carry the genetic experiments there, or reassigned to be used as human subjects in our other labs.

While it is not described in this chapter, the birthmother also trains the fetus to obey the voices of the programmers, Satan and other spiritual beings. They speak into microphones hooked up to tiny speakers placed in the womb. Depending on the program to be installed, the birthmother pleads with, bargains with, orders, or requests that the fetus obeys programmers' voices just as he or she obeys her. She similarly trains him or her to obey "Satan" and other "spiritual beings" (usually the programmers dressed up as these creatures). The birthmother is put through many scenarios to 'prove' to the fetus that she and the fetus are completely dependent on the programmers and Satan for safety, attachment, purpose and wisdom, and that instant obedience and complete trust (believing everything that they say) is essential.

According to my memories, the programming to make the baby obey the programmers and spiritual beings in the same way they obey the birthmother is installed over the second trimester. During this time, the programmers and 'spirits' also spend time loving, comforting and rescuing the fetus and the birthmother in order to create a deep bond. The second trimester bonding between fetus and the programmers is critical because as the pregnancy progresses into the third trimester, the birthmother is put through increasingly, incredibly brutal torture that results in her eventually being unable to speak to or comfort the fetus. As her mind departs due to the continuous inhumane torture, the fetus experiences complete abandonment by the birthmother. At this stage, the fetus' only attachment figures that remain are thus the programmers and the 'spiritual beings'. The birthmother is killed at birth, which is intended to bring the child's sense of abandonment and grief regarding her to a peak, accompanied by a complete emotional dependence on her remaining attachment figures.

However, starting on the first day after birth, an adult female programmer acting tender and loving combined with recordings and AI generated 'deepfakes' of the birthmother's voice in the womb is used to deceive the baby into believing that Satan and the programmers have the ability to give him or her time with the birthmother. Naturally, they can only do so if the baby is completely obedient and diligent. This gives the baby very strong motivation to work hard and obey the programmers. Throughout a Jesuit agent's life, core parts that are fetuses and very young infants are called up in programming studios designed to look like the womb or the infant nursery, then are given nurturing time with the 'birthmother' as a way of reinforcing the person's commitment to their programming. In fact, the birthmother's voice speaking particular codes is typically a core system access key for members of the Jesuit Order, and the birthmother's voice, along with Satan's voice, can be 'used' to give system wide instructions. The programmer who plays an individual's 'birthmother' typically is among that individual's primary programmers, since this role gives them access to the person's deepest core system.

In Jesuit programming, the birthmother is also therefore a very important internal controller with the authority to 'punish' or 'reward' the core system and other systems. During a child's first year, the programmers will induce the child's system to 'create' parts who are internal birthmothers that maintain the child's programming through internal punishment and reward. This dynamic between parts replicates the conditional love experienced in the womb, perpetuating the belief that disobedience equates rejection, grief, pain and loss, and obedience equates love and security. This internal birthmother is also taught to report any anomalies or problems in the systems to the external programmers. The system's 'big secret' kept away from the core systems' awareness is that the birthmother has already died, and that the cult is just using her image and voice to manipulate and control them.

Healing my prenatal programming therefore involved grieving some of the most painful losses and betrayals that the youngest parts of me had been through. It felt completely unbearable and overwhelming to face how my birthmother had betrayed me in the womb and taught me to be a slave. She had been wrong. She had lied to me. It felt no less unbearable to face the fact that my birthmother had died, and that all these years, the deepest core reward that my system worked for – to be held and rocked by my 'birthmother' – was a complete farce. It felt at first as if I could not survive the pain of it. I prayed for God to hold me through it, and for His help to hold and comfort these littlest, most profoundly wounded, exploited and confused parts of me – the very foundations of my systems and mind control. As I held the parts who looked like my birthmother, I had to acknowledge just how much, all my life, I had just wanted a mother's love. Not only had it been stolen from me, but they had used my need for my mother's love to manipulate me.

As I grieved how my birthmother had failed to protect me and processed my rage at her betrayal, I realized something that shocked my system: my birthmother was only a frightened, helpless teenager. She was not this powerful being that my entire world had been dependent on, and I had never ever been powerful enough, despite what she told me, to 'rescue' her from her pain by complying with the programming. I, too, was merely a frightened, helpless child. We were both in the hands of foolish perpetrators who hardened their own hearts in their own fear in order to continue obeying Satan. There was nothing different she could have done, just as there was nothing different that I could have done. We were both prisoners. Compassion for myself and her started to come in. This was accompanied by the deepest sorrow and regret for my own role as a prenatal programmer, for all that I myself had done to birthmothers and their fetuses, first when I was a student in training, then when I was a programmer myself. It was an even harder journey to forgive myself and believe that God would forgive me. I hope that by sharing the information in this chapter, along with my other publications on prenatal programming (see my book It's Not Impossible, and my blog www.svalispeaks.wordpress.com), that it might help others who have been harmed by such wickedness to find some validation and healing.

Programming my presenter children

I am 27 years old, and I am in the main programming facility in Rome. On the third underground level, the other Jesuit programmers and I have set up a studio that looks just like Jean's (the French presenter's) living room. It is sophisticated enough that the summer 'sunshine' that come in through the wide windows overlooking Jean's 'side garden' seems absolutely real, as does the faint smell of flowers wafting in from the garden. Instead of my white programmer's coat with my hair pulled back in a bun, my hair is loose around my face which is how Jean usually wears her hair at home, and I am wearing her clothes. In the observation room, the programmers on the team will monitor the session in the 'living room' through strategically placed microphones and cameras. They can communicate directly with me through a small speaker placed in my ear.

In another room that leads right into the 'living room', one of the children, Joseph, who is programmed to be Jean Paul, Jean's three-and-a-half-year-old son, is being prepared for the session. Father Francis, one of his other primary programmers, tells Joseph's internal White Rabbit part to fetch Jean Paul from the French section of the internal Wonderland, and bring him up the rabbit hole. After a few seconds, the White Rabbit lets Francis know that Jean Paul is now at the top of the rabbit hole. He thanks the White Rabbit then informs the shell controller, Andromeda, that the French shell is needed. When Andromeda confirms that she has put the French shell in place, Francis tells Athena, another shell controller, to take Jean Paul from the top of the rabbit hole and lock him into the French shell. Then Joseph, who is the Jesuit cult presenter, submerges and Jean Paul, who only knows about an ordinary life in France, is now fronting in the body. Father Francis lets us know that Jean Paul is ready, and we begin the session.

The door into the living room opens. Jean Paul walks in. He squeals with delight to see me already sitting on the floor, with several of his favorite toys scattered around me. He runs over to me, and I greet him using the voice and body language of Jean, his mother. We start an exuberant game with his model motorbikes and trucks, racing them around the rug as I chase them all with a large bright green plastic dinosaur in each hand. However, my mind is not really on the game. Instead, I am closely observing Jean Paul's reactions to three ritual objects on the rug. Two are made of polished ebony set with gemstones, and are about the size of a spatula. The third is smaller but still conspicuous, a bronze bracelet clearly inscribed with occult runes.

To be more precise, I am observing to see if he has a lack of reaction to these objects. He has just completed several weeks of intensely traumatic programming to train him be totally 'blind' to any cult-related object in his environment; the goal of today's session is to assess how well Jean Paul is carrying out this program. So far, he is doing well. He acts like the objects are not even there, stepping on the bracelet as he swerves away from me to keep the dinosaurs from capturing the truck, and rushing over both wooden items without any attempts to slow down or avoid them. Three objects of similar size, color and materials, but without any occult significance, have also been placed on the rug. Using the dinosaurs, I deliberately steer the child towards these items. His response to these items is remarkably different: he avoids them, swerving around them or stepping over them, rather than just running into them or stepping on them. Again, he is doing well.

Based on his behavior so far, the programming of this presentation part, Jean Paul, is running correctly to remove his perception of any occult-related item around him. The other programmers are watching closely from the observation room, in case I fail to catch any subtle cues of him having moments of noticing the items, or failing to 'not see' the items quickly enough. After this behavioral assessment, we will also be asking Jean Paul's internal presentation controller parts to report if there were any moments when he had noticed them. We play for another 45 minutes before I move on to a different method of testing.

"Oh, it's so hot, Jean Paul, isn't it?" I say to him, dropping both dinosaurs and flopping down on the rug next to him.

"Yes, mama!" he replies with a huge grin. He loves what comes next.

"Don't we need something cold, Jean Paul?"

"Yes, mama!" he giggles.

"And what would that be?" I ask him earnestly.

"Ice cream!" he yells, smacking two of his trucks together in his enthusiasm.

"Exactly!" I reply, matching his excitement. Then I pull a frown and gesture at the toys scattered on the floor, "But look at this mess. Remember, mama always says that there is no ice cream until the rug is all picked up."

"I can pick it up so quickly!" he assures me, still grinning. He is absolutely right that he can – Jean Paul has been programmed to have an active, confident and cheerful personality.

"That's good – but remember you have to pick everything on the rug up, or we can't go for ice cream. That's everything, Jean Paul."

He gets to work at once, hauling his toys over to toy basket at the corner of the room. In less than ten minutes, he announces proudly, "All done, mama!" He looks at the rug then at me, beaming.

I see that he has done well: the three ritual items lie untouched on the rug. Indeed, Jean Paul cannot see them. I pick him up and cuddle him close. "Little Rex Two, listen to me," I use Jean's voice to call out the part in Jean Paul's subsystem who is in charge of him 'not seeing' occult objects. I coo as I rock him tenderly, "You did so good. You kept Jean Paul and mama safe today, I love you so much, you did so well today. Nothing bad could ever happen to us when you are here doing your job. I love you so much. Thank you for keeping us safe."

Programming the non-cult presenters to believe their memories of a single, non-cult, ordinary life entails programming them to also deny, fail to notice, and forget any experience and evidence of the cult side of life. This chapter describes one memory of how as a parent and cult handler for Jean Paul, I assessed if his programming to not see occult objects was running correctly, but did not describe how the programming was installed. Most basically, installing his programming to 'not see' had involved these steps: (1) calling out Jean Paul to front in the body; (2) placing interesting looking occult objects in his environment to draw his attention; (3) severely traumatizing him using these objects when he noticed them, and telling him that if he 'didn't see' them, he would not have gotten hurt; (4) continuing the trauma while telling him that the torture would stop only if he never ever saw these objects; (5) intensifying the trauma to the point that Jean Paul dissociated and created parts who would be able to 'not see' occult objects. After careful checking that these parts indeed reliably prevented Jean Paul from 'seeing' the occult objects that the programmers had originally used to draw his attention, these parts were then taught to generalize to other occult objects and recognize an extensive range of them as things to 'never see'.

"Blindness" to individual occult objects is the first stage of the programming to make the presenters oblivious to any occult activity. Subsequently, these parts will be conditioned to not be able to see even full-blown rituals occurring in front of them, including ones that their own parents and friends are participating in. This program is one of several programs for instant amnesia and denial to all cult activity that the Jesuits use to control the presentations who live 'ordinary, non-cult' lives. All such programs are contingent on putting the presenters through numerous scenarios of the terrible things that happen if they notice or remember any cult-related experience. This is complemented by numerous scenarios of the good things that happen when they do not perceive and/or completely forget any cult-related experience. The terrible scenarios typically involve the family getting hurt, and/or rejecting the child.

In the second paragraph, I describe how the programmers call out the presenter part Jean Paul by giving instructions in conversation style to the White Rabbit and the shell controllers to make the narrative clearer. This is one way of ensuring the required parts are fronting, and it is used so that the programmers can actually talk with the Alice in Wonderland and shell controller parts during the sessions. Programmers can also use a series of codes that function as shorthand for the same instructions, so that they can switch parts more efficiently, especially in an emergency or when time is limited. Other parts, not named in this chapter for brevity, are also involved in the sequence to bring the non-cult presenters to the surface.

This chapter also shows my Jesuit presenter Luce, the programmer, masquerading as Jean to assess Jean Paul's programming through a playful mother-child interaction. I had similarly acted as "Jean" while we were installing Jean Paul's programming to not see. It is a common strategy in occult groups and mind control agencies to have a parent act as the child's presentation programmer, so that the parent's very face and voice themselves become unavoidable triggers for that child to deny or forget the cult in daily life. It serves to remind the presenters at the subconscious level that they risk everyone getting hurt or rejecting them if they do not continue not knowing, forgetting and denying. If the parent is not used as the presentation programmer, then typically, grandparents, aunts or uncles, older cousins, close family friends – anyone that the presenters would have frequent contact with in family settings – are used. Nonetheless, Jean herself, as the presenter mother, had no memories of programming and assessing Jean Paul, as she was not the one who was doing these things to him, but rather, Luce was.

In Jesuit programming, when the presenter parents speak particular phrases to the child, make the child watch tv shows, hear songs, play games or participate in other activities, such as going to church, that are triggers for the children's presentation programming, these parent parts themselves have no idea that they are giving a trigger that is tied to that child's dissociated experiences of trauma, punishment and reward. Instead, the presenter parent parts will be consciously thinking the activity or phrase is harmless, fun, educational, healthy, age-appropriate, discipline-building, etc. For instance, in Jean Paul's specific case, the two plastic toy dinosaurs were one of his reminders and triggers to forget occult objects; during the traumatic installation of the 'don't see' program, he was put through many virtual reality scenarios of his toy dinosaurs turning into huge, bloodthirsty tyrannosaurus rexes that chased and ripped him and his mother apart if he saw occult objects. On the other hand, if he was 'good' and didn't see the objects, the toy dinosaurs would turn into big friendly green cute t-rexes who would give him and his mother wonderful rides and plenty of ice cream. Neither Jean or Jean Paul had any awareness that the toy dinosaurs had any other meaning to either of them, although Little Rex Two, Luce and other parts in both of them understood.

When the child is young, the parents are responsible for making sure that inside their house and yard, there are objects, such as teddy bears, Rubik cubes, daisies, toys from cartoons, anime t-shirts, etc., and even the colors the rooms are painted in and so on, that are reminders or triggers for the scenarios that punish or reward the presenters for disobedience or compliance with their programming. Parents are also responsible for making the child watch tv shows, hear songs, play games or participate in other activities, such as going to church or to a specific preschool, that are triggers as well. Once the child is a tween or teen, they will be programmed to themselves appear to be selecting books, video games, tv shows, hobbies and so on out of their own preference, but in fact will be selecting what they have been programmed to, and these will be triggers in similar ways that the teddy bear and other favorite childhood items they have now outgrown. For instance, as Jean Paul grew older, to continue using dinosaurs as a trigger, the big green plastic dinosaurs were replaced with smaller, less childish, and expensive to-scale model dinosaurs, one of which he kept on his office desk even in his adult years as a memento of childhood.

My memories of being a programmer are among the memories that break my heart the most. It turns my stomach to recall we programmers manipulated "Jean Paul", "Little Rex Two" and other parts in the Order's children to disavow, deny and mistrust their own perceptions, and to instead replace their own instincts and experiences with programmed scripts and lies. When I was still a programmer, I had believed that if I did not program a child, then he or she will be useless to the Order, and so be killed; while I hated what I was doing, I also truly believed that this was the only way to save the children's lives and give them something of a decent future. Nonetheless, as these memories first came forward, the parts in me who were the mothers felt great hostility towards the parts in me who were the programmers. Healing has involved grieving, processing the shame and guilt, self-forgiveness, forgiveness between parts, and facing the fear and the lies that I had internalized in my own programming to become a programmer. I can never, ever take back or undo what I did to children and others in the group when I was a programmer, but I hope that by sharing information on cult culture, programming and healing, the information will be helpful to others on their healing journeys.

I am 31 years old, and have been hired as a secretary at a large international corporation, to fill in for one who took maternity leave. I am in my UK presentation – Trixie - for this role. In Trixie's mind, she has decided to go back to work for a few months now that her children are in school. The other employees like her, and she enjoys going out together once a week after work for a beer and to socialize, joking and making sharp comments about the people who work there. But after working there for several weeks, one night, Trixie stays late to finish up some work. When the other staff are all gone, I (Luke) switch out and Trixie submerges.

I leave my desk and break into the room that contains the company's mainframe. This company is one of the first to computerize its files, and the fathers want digital copies of all its operations and its computer systems. While this room and the hallway leading to it is protected by surveillance cameras, I do not worry about them as teammates in the 33 have already ensured that my presence would not show up on the recordings. As a caution, however, before entering the hallway, I had changed into a gloved black jumpsuit and covered my head with a black balaclava with googles. As I had made it a habit to carry a large handbag to work every day, I had no problem carrying this gear into the office that morning. I remove a special external drive from a pouch, and plug it into the mainframe. This company is one of the first to computerize its files, and it will provide the fathers with lots of information about the company's finances, operations and staff. The drive has been prepared with a special program that copies everything on the mainframe while erasing any history that copies have been made. I have no concerns about leaving evidence of my presence since my balaclava and gloved suit is made of special material designed to be cool and comfortable, while preventing the wearer from leaving fingerprints, skin cells, hairs, and other DNA material behind.

I return to my room, and put the drive back into its bag, hidden inside a box of Kotex and other feminine items, and leave. Trixie, my UK presenter is totally unaware of what has transpired in the last hour. Because of the Alice in Wonderland programming, from her perspective, she has not left her desk once in the past hour except to very briefly go to the bathroom. On the way home, I stop at a grocery store to pick up a sweet treat for my children as promised for having to work late today and missing our usual cosy after dinner reading time together. At the restroom in the grocery store, I pass the drive over to Mary Margaret, one of my closest friends and a top member of the 33. Again, Trixie will have no memory of this brief interchange with Mary Margaret who will have delivered the external drive in person to the fathers by the following day.

My temp job ends two weeks later, and no one ever suspects I have done this. I am well-liked, and there are many expressions of sorrow that I will be leaving, but I explain that I have another temp job lined up. I do, but it is not the job that they think.

While it is not possible for me to vouch for the accuracy of this recovered memory, I know that it occurred while I was mind-controlled and believed that I had no option but to obey the orders I received if I did not want the Order to destroy the people I loved the most. The years of trauma-based programming also made it difficult for me to even imagine that there was any other option. But knowing how controlled and terrified I was did not relieve any of the anguish, guilt and self-hatred that erupted when I started to remember these and worse memories of missions. I did not want to be the person in these memories, but the reality is, I was. To get in touch with my parts meant hearing their histories, which included events such as that described in this chapter. These parts had never known any other life. Since infancy, they had been tortured, abused and carefully taught how to carry out assassinations, industrial espionage, and other criminal activities.

I have asked God's forgiveness for the things I did in my past. I deeply regret that I can never ask those who I acted against for their forgiveness. One reason among many that I chose to leave the Order was that I could no longer stand being this type of person, someone capable of acting in these ways. Deep inside, something in me rebelled against this lifestyle, in spite of the years of programming and conditioning. It was bittersweet to gain knowledge of my past – the relief of parts finally being able to share what they had done, and to process their own deeply submerged guilt and sadness – while realizing that these parts were "me", that I did these things. I remembered being officially classified as a "government weapon" at the age of 12, due to my training. Now, I was remembering how those skills were used, and the grievous effect it had on others and myself. Only running to the mercy of God, asking His forgiveness, and receiving it, helped me through the oppressive guilt and shame that came, and helped me to then turn and embrace the parts of me that held these memories, and to help them heal.

Chapter 19: Adulthood in the Presentations

Growing up: Getting Married and Having Children

I am now an adult in my various presentations or cover identities. In all of them, I am married or have a partner, and children. Each presenter continues to be unaware of any other life besides the ones they have in their respective countries. Four of my presentations are supposedly Illuminati: Jean in France, Gertrude (Trudi) in Germany, Beatrice (Trixie) in the UK and Elsa in the USA.

Jean (France) is married to Yannick. I (Jean) met Yannick on the way to classes at the university when I was 19, and we both love cycling and hiking outdoors. We have three children: Tammi, Jean Paul, and Alyssa.

Gertrude-"Trudie" (Germany) is married to Alan, an Irish man with red hair, grey eyes, and a droll sense of humor. We (Trudi and Alan) now have two daughters and a son: Althea, Bel and Timothy. We fight a lot, but also make up quickly. We also raise miniature Doberman pinschers, and I work as an administrative assistant for a large corporation.

Beatrice –"Trixie" (UK) is very happily married to Phillip, a childhood friend. Here we (Trixie and Phillip) have two boys and a girl: Phillip, Jr., Jan, and Leon. I am a stay at home mother, after having worked as an executive secretary for years, much to my mother's chagrin and my great delight at her discomfiture. Phillip works in finance and makes enough money to allay my mother's fears that I will end up homeless. Phillip's high salary is the only thing about our marriage that I actually dislike, since I can no longer upset my mother, who spends her spare time planning my children's schooling and careers. I avoid seeing her and never let her spend time alone with my children, remembering how she sexually and physically abused me.

In the USA, I (Elsa) marry Chuck, a Navy man. It is a loveless but respectable marriage. We have three children, Sandra (note: pseudonym), Mary and Sammy (note: pseudonym). Mary was adopted when she was two months old and is the same age as my biological daughter, Sandra. As my mother and stepfather had been abusive, I am determined to give my own children a far happier childhood than I had. My joy in being a mother makes up for the perfunctory relationship between my husband and I.

All my husbands and partners are Jesuit infiltrators like me, with the exception of Chuck, who is actually Illuminati. Yannick, for instance is played by Simon and his lookalike brothers, and Alan is played by Conner and his lookalike brothers. Similarly, all my children are Jesuit. They are our next generation of infiltrating the Illuminati. As mentioned in the earlier chapters, each 'person' in the family, including the children, is actually played by several genetic siblings who have presenter parts programmed with the same cover identity. Four presentations might seem a lot to manage. However, the Illuminati assume there is only one set of twins, and that those twins cannot be in a European presentation while in the U.S., or in Germany while in France, and so on. The need to be in only one Illuminati presentation at any one time, combined with there being several identical-looking people capable of playing each role perfectly, means that it is remarkably simple to schedule Illuminati presentation time for each agent without adversely affecting the time we need to carry out other jobs.

It is part of human nature to not see what we do not suspect, so the Illuminati and other organizations never noticed that the children who are Jean or Trudi were actually more than two genetically identical individuals taking on the cover identity in regular rotations, allowing these individuals to also do other missions and tasks elsewhere as needed. Further simplifying scheduling, by the late 70s, the Jesuits had infiltrated the Illuminati in positions that enabled them to falsify the location of Jesuit agents when necessary. For instance, if we needed all the children playing Jean to be elsewhere for a week in April, we were able to make the Illuminati in Germany believe that she was in America, and have the Illuminati in America believe that she was in France, or with a powerful sex trafficking client who wanted complete privacy. This technique was only used when absolutely necessary, however, as it carried a higher risk of the Illuminati noticing that something odd was going on.

My non-Illuminati presentations are Katrina (Trina) in Amsterdam, Miriam (Misha) in Israel, and Gina in Italy. As Katrina-"Trina" (Amsterdam), I am bisexual and my partner is a woman, Barbara. We adopt three street children. The two of us pour out the love we ourselves never experienced in our childhoods on these children, and try to keep them out of trouble – a time consuming task – while maintaining our own careers. I follow in my Uncle Lou's footsteps as a lawyer whose business is deeply entrenched in the criminal underworld. Barbara runs two very successful pubs and a hotel in the nicer parts of Amsterdam – and a host of smaller establishments in the seedier side of the city. Both jobs are embarrassingly lucrative, and we easily make enough to contemplate sending our children to elite Swiss boarding schools when they are old enough.

As Mariah –"Misha" (Israel) I found love very young, but was met with sorrow early as my husband Beni died three years after a wedding by the sea. We have two sons, Benjamin and Daniel. In another three years, I was incredibly blessed to find love again, with a civil engineer, Barak, and have a daughter, Abigail.

As Regina–"Gina" (Italy), my very wealthy parents had been affectionate and kind but unavailable emotionally. My mother was a talented cellist who did not get adequate care for depression and bipolar disorder, and committed suicide when I was 12. My father was often gone on business, and had multiple affairs while I was growing up. My greatest support came from my oldest brother, Antonio, who helped me through my stormy teen years. In fact, I credited to Antonio my good fortune in finding a husband, Francesco, a loving man who put family first. He had introduced us just as he was finishing his undergraduate studies at the Sapienza University of Rome. Antonio told me that he had been watching Francesco for the past three years and that I couldn't do better than him. Francesco completely adored me and our three children, Bella, Antonio, Jr.(Toni), and Mattheo. I feel like the happiest years of my life had begun. The wealth from both sides of the family makes vacations easy. Each year, we do ski vacations in winter at the best Swiss resorts, and summer vacations at the beach in luxurious resorts, picking a new warm location each year such as the Bahamas, Mexico, Spain, Greece, South Africa, and so on.

All spouses or partners, and children, in these three presentations, even the three 'street children' that Katrina and Barbara adopted, are Jesuit. As Katrina, Misha and Gina are not Illuminati presentations, all three cover identities need to be maintained simultaneously. Time in each country for each person playing these identities is carefully scheduled to prevent gaps or absences that could be noted by others, and to prevent conflicts between the multiple duties that each Jesuit agent, child or adult, has. Scheduling Gina and Francesco, however, is really not quite as complicated as many of the wealthy Italian families themselves are part of the occult world. They have varying degrees of mind control themselves and occasional oddities in their own comings and goings. Friends, business partners and acquaintances thus generally pay little attention to unusual absences, as long as their own interests are not affected, and as long as they do not feel that their relationships are being slighted or neglected in some way.

Similarly, we have a degree of wriggle room for scheduling Katrina and Barbara, since being involved in illegal businesses easily involves unexpected absences that people are naturally discreet about. We take care, however, to ensure that the correct gossip is circulating among the brokers and other criminals in Amsterdam about either person's whereabouts and activities whenever it becomes necessary for us to leave their cover identities unfilled for a period. Scheduling Misha, however, was indeed extremely complex. The highly sensitive and volatile nature of the intelligence situation in Israel, and the criticality of ensuring that this cover was perfect so that "Benjamin" and "Daniel" could be recruited by the Mossad when they grew up, meant that there had to be absolutely nothing that could raise suspicion. Any gap or issue would potentially not only hinder our infiltration of the intelligence community in Israel for Benjamin, Daniel, Abigail and Misha, but would also affect any Jesuit agent that they were associated with.

This overview of my 'ordinary', 'non-cult' presentations shows how even as I grew up, my life experience continued to be fragmented and divided between different 'identities', with each identity only having a small part of the picture. My presenters experienced varying degrees of happiness and contentment in their careers and domestic lives. This is similar to how, when I was a child, the cult ensured that there was a spread or variation in degree of happiness and love or abuse across the different presentations. None of my presenters, however, were programmed to be emotionally or physically abusive, or negligent, to their children, a small mercy for which I am glad; all of them were programmed to be loving mothers. However, while the children who played the roles of being my presenters' children did not experience maternal abuse or neglect when fronting in these presentations with me, the requirement that there be a diversity of family experience across presentations means that they did experience abuse and/or neglect in some of their other presentations. It has been extremely painful for my presenter parts to realize that while their children had been happy with them, this happiness was only a very small part of their lives, and their precious children had experienced abuse in cult settings and while in their other families. Being a good mother was a deeply cherished value and purpose for my presentations as adults; realizing that they had not been able to protect their children, and had fostered their false beliefs about their lives, has been very difficult.

Maintaining presentations or cover identities involves not only presenting a seamless, unquestionable narrative to members of other groups or non-cult people, but also involves ensuring that the presenter parts themselves completely believe their own memories of a single life. As the person grows up, to keep presenter parts under such persistent mind control, the programmers continue to use the amnesia and denial programming, Alice in Wonderland, shell programming and other relevant presenter programs done in early infancy and childhood (see book one, Never Give Up and my book It's Not Impossible for brief descriptions of parts of the early childhood programming). All these programs continue to run over the person's life time, and hidden child parts within the presenters will typically respond to the same triggers as when the person was biologically a child. However, in adults, presenter programming is extended and strengthened by tying it to beliefs, desires, and scenarios that reflect key adult milestones and responsibilities. The terror of the overwhelming pain of realizing that one has not been a good mother and failed to protect her children from a terribly abusive cult is usually a very significant way that adult desires and responsibilities are used to enforce presenter amnesia programming.

For the presentations who had been given loving relationships with their spouses or partners, it was just as devastating to realize that their marriage was a sham, a programmed script, and that they and their spouses all had 'marriages' in other countries. I (the various presentations) felt heartbroken and betrayed no less than an 'ordinary' person would if she discovered that her husband or partner had been cheating on her. It was equally horrifying to realize that I myself had marriages in other countries with other spouses or partners. Both realizations made me feel like my whole world had been upended, and that I no longer knew anything about myself.

It has taken tremendous persistence and a desire to know the truth to question or give up the palliating scripts that I (any of my presenters) had been a good mother who had given my children warm and safe childhoods or had been the cherished wife of a faithful man, and to face the truth that we were all part of a brutal and exploitative cult that worshipped Satan. As part of healing and dismantling my presenter programming, I (all the respective presenters) have had to face my terror of knowing the truth, and grieve my failure to protect, my compliance with the programming for so many years, and the loss of what I had believed I had – a happy, normal family. What has helped on this very difficult journey of rejecting the lies and integrating the truth back into my histories is knowing that in the end, following the truth and getting free will benefit my children and loved ones far more than continuing to deny reality or letting the programmers continue to tell me what to believe.

Monitoring my children's presenter programming

I am 31 years old. Gertrude, or Trudi, my German presentation is fronting. I (Trudi) am driving my son, Timothy, home from his soccer class for three-to-five-year old boys run by the local soccer club. He loves soccer, even insisting that I tuck his soccer ball into bed with him every night. Naturally, he dreams of becoming a professional soccer player. The easiest way for me to persuade him to eat vegetables he dislikes is to remind him that soccer players needed to be strong and healthy.

When we get home, he pops out of the car cheerfully, grabs his bag and runs towards my husband who is tidying the edges of the flowerbeds. Alan gives his son a big smile, and tosses a mini soccer ball at him, one of the balls that is always lying around the lawn instead of being put away in the basket in the front entrance hallway, no matter how often I remind Timothy that balls belong in the basket when they are not played with.

Without missing a beat, Timothy throws himself into the air in a front flip, timing it perfectly so that as he comes back down, his right foot meets the soccer ball and propels it right back at Alan. Timothy is not supposed to be able to do a front flip, let alone be able to combine a front flip with being able to kick a soccer ball accurately back to someone else. While this child's Jesuit cult presenter and Illuminati cult presenter have been taught and required to practice such athletic skills, the ordinary, non-cult day presenter, "Timothy", has been programmed to never display these skills. In other words, Timothy was disobeying his presenter programming, breaking with the profile he had been assigned to only be able to run and jump as would a 5-year-old who has never had any gymnastics or martial arts lessons. Timothy's confident grin falters when he is met with a stern look on Alan's face. He looks back at me, and fear crosses his face as he is met with an equally stern look.

At the moment we observed Timothy performing the front flip, we had switched from our presenters Alan and Trudi into our cult parts, Luce and Conner, who are Timothy's programmers and handlers. Both of us give him the hand signal that means "bad!" I go over to him, take him by the hand, and lead him silently into the house. When we are in the master bedroom, I shut the door and put Timothy on the chair that Alan uses at the desk in the corner of the bedroom. It looks like an ordinary chair, but it is actually much heavier than other chairs of similar appearance. The heaviness makes it more stable when it needs to be used for restraining the children. I take straps from a hidden shelf at the back of the closet and strap Timothy firmly to the chair with the Velcro ends of the straps. They are wide and made of a very soft and slightly elastic fabric so they will not leave any marks on his skin.

Instantly, I begin screaming in pain, and fall down onto the floor, moaning between the screams, “You’ve hurt me so badly, Timothy, by breaking your profile! The pain is killing me! I feel like I’m dying! Don’t you love me anymore? Don’t you want me to stay alive? You know that breaking your profile will cause me, and your father and sisters to die!” Conner comes in and enacts a similar drama, rolling on the floor pretending to be unbearable pain.

Horrified, Timothy screams, “Mama! Papa! I love you, I don’t want you to die! It was an accident, I forgot! Please don’t die!” Tears are streaming down his face as he sobs hysterically.

“Then why did you break profile?” Alan and I ask him in tandem. “You know that doing so will kill us. We are dying from just the emotional pain you caused us.” I have taken a vial of fake blood from a secret spot in the room, and break it in my mouth, so that blood is streaming out of my mouth.

“I didn’t mean to! I swear! I’m sorry! I’m sorry!” Timothy is hysterical.

“Who is sorry?” I ask him quietly while giving the hand signal for ‘truth’ which in this context is a command for the presentation controllers to confess or report which parts in the presentation had made the mistake of allowing Timothy to do the front flip. “Who was responsible for this sin?”

Timothy’s hysteria stops abruptly as Andromeda, one of his presentation controller parts comes to the front to answer the question in a monotone: “It was Shell F3.4.27 Franco.”

I nod and thank Andromeda, then say, “Franco may have failed, but all of you are responsible for Timothy and the safety of the entire family. When one of you fails, all of you fail.”

Alan hands me a small helmet that had been sitting on the hidden shelf at the back of the closet. The visor comes down over the eyes. This visor is actually a screen that can play videos and is molded to fit closely over both eyeballs so the person feels like they are immersed in the videos. Alan has already selected the right videos for punishing the presentation for breaking with their profile. I give Timothy the codes for cuing his entire presentation system out to pay attention to the videos, including the shells, the Alice in Wonderland parts, the parts that represent Timothy’s family internally, etc., then place the helmet on his head. They all view a video of Timothy and his family dying in extreme pain due to his presenter programming failing, and his shell shattering because he did not stop the action that was not part of his German profile. Alan and I attach electrodes to various parts of Timothy’s body. These electrodes deliver extremely painful but non-lethal shocks to his body, synchronized to the videos. When the videos of the shell shattering are played, the shocks are delivered to his whole body. When the videos of his arms and legs being chopped off are played because he displayed a physical skill that he shouldn’t have, the shocks are delivered to his arms and legs. Timothy screams and screams, but we have no concern about being heard by the neighbors because the room itself has been designed to be almost soundproof, and the nearest neighbor's house is many yards away.

The punishing video and shock sequences last about ten minutes, which the programmers consider well within the safety margin for a child of Timothy's size and health. I click a button on the helmet's remote which switches the video to one showing the spiritual being over the presentation controllers chiding them for failure but promising them that if Timothy promised to not fail again, then he would be given a second chance, and that he and his family would not die. Timothy cries out several times, "I won't fail again! I promise, I promise!" His voice changes slightly several times as he repeats this cry; as his programmer who is familiar with the voices of his different parts, I can hear that the shell parts, and several other presentation controllers are making the same promise.

I remove the helmet; Timothy is shaky and looks at us in trepidation.

"Do you all really promise?" I ask.

"Yes! Yes!"

"Then you have saved us." I lean over, gathering him in my arms as Conner quickly and quietly releases the straps. "I know you love us and you won't fail again." I rock him, wiping his tears away, Conner hands me a replenishing drink that I gently make Timothy finish. It looks like an ordinary juice box from a supermarket brand, but has electrolytes and other nutrients in it, and was specially formulated for use after a stressful event like this one that involves electroshocks. We all sit quietly together for another few minutes, reassuring him of our love and faith in him. When he seems to have completely calmed down, Conner and I then put all of the equipment away. We give him the codes for the presentation controllers to go back inside, and for Timothy to completely forget what just happened.

Our job being done, Conner and I switch back inside, and Alan and Trudi emerge with no memory of the previous twenty minutes. Alan's and Trudi's Alice in Wonderland programming ensures that instead, they completely believe that they spent the last twenty minutes chatting with Timothy about soccer practice that day, and plans to go play soccer tomorrow with his cousins. Once again, we are just a normal, happy family. "That's enough talking - let's get ready for dinner," I tell Timothy, giving him a hug. "You've had a busy day today, with soccer practice. I'll bet you're hungry now."

"I'm starving," Timothy grins. "Can I have extra noodles tonight with the meat?"

I smile and tousle his hair. "I don't see why not. Now go wash up, and we'll eat in five minutes." Timothy is acting completely within his presentation profile and we all go to get ready to enjoy one of our favorite dinners. As Trudi, watching Timothy scampering out the bedroom to go wash his hands, I am hit with a sudden wave of unspeakable, overwhelming guilt and shame. Tears flood my eyes – then I blink. The guilt disappears. I shake my head, confused, then the confusion disappears. I go to the kitchen to prepare the noodles. Many years will pass before I remember the guilt and shame again, or understand it.

It is a few months later, and I am in the UK, fronting as Trixie, my UK presenter. I have a four-year-old daughter, Jan, who has long brown hair and big hazel eyes. She is a happy child, who enjoys making jokes and getting into mischief from time to time. Her two brothers, Tom and Phillip Jr., dote on her despite the small age gap between them; she loves being the little princess of the whole family. Jan watches the Disney movie, The Little Mermaid, three times a week. Ostensibly, she does so because Ariel is her favorite princess and she loves singing along with all the songs in the movie. However, the real reason is that The Little Mermaid is a trigger for Jan's presenter programming to never be able to talk about the cult (represented by the merkingdom under the sea in the movie) when she is in the non-cult world (represented by the prince's castle and town in the movie), just as how in the movie Ariel had to give her voice up to Ursula in order to leave the ocean and come to land where she could not talk at all.

Usually, at 2pm on the designated days, she comes to me and asks me to put on her Little Mermaid video. Today, however, she is engrossed in coloring a picture. I am surprised and ask her, "Jan, don't you want to watch your favorite movie?"

To my surprise, she replies, "I don't want to. I want to finish doing this."

Upon Jan's refusal to watch the movie, Luce, my programmer, takes over and Trixie goes inside. Still using Trixie's voice because it is important for the parents to be the child's handler, I tell Jan, "Sit down and watch Little Mermaid; I'm putting the video on now," and accompany the calmly-spoken command with the hand gesture to obey.

Jan shakes her head and says with a touch of impatience, "I want to finish this first, mummy." This is a serious breach of her presenter programming, both in terms of ignoring the 'obey' hand gesture and her making something other than watching the movie a priority.

I go into the next room to inform her father, Phillip, of the situation. I address him as Matthew, his Jesuit presenter who is the programmer; immediately his presenter part Phillip submerges and Matthew emerges. I also call her brothers in from the garden. The three of us enter the living room where Jan is still coloring her picture. Matthew and I give a sequence of hand signals to Jan's brothers, pulling up their presentation controller parts, and casting them into a state of distress.

Simultaneously, we begin screaming and acting as if we are in terrible pain. Jan has been especially programmed to be Daddy's girl, so Matthew takes the lead in this reinforcement session for her. "I'm…dying…" he croaks, "Jan, you're killing me. You didn't obey your mother…and I can't live with disobedience like this." He looks pale, falls to the floor, and his eyes are closing.

"Daddy, Daddy, don't die!" screams Jan in terror.

On another hand signal from me, her brothers take electric wands I have given them, and they begin shocking their sister over and over. It is set to be painful but non-lethal. "Bad Jan! Bad Jan!" they tell her, over and over, just as they have been programmed to do. "You killed Daddy because you were bad, bad, bad!" While Jan is not physically restrained, deeper internal controllers in her system, who have been programmed to believe that Jan must endure the punishment in order to eventually save her family, keep her from even thinking of trying to escape the room or her punishers.

I have crushed some ampules of fake blood, and hold out arms that are dripping blood. "Your…disobedience…is killing me," I say faintly. "All the life is draining out of me." I slowly begin to collapse towards the floor.

"No, no, noo-oo-o-o!!!" Jan is completely hysterical now, screaming and crying. "Don't die! Don't die, Mommy!"

Matthew gets up, takes the video-playing helmet and places it and the accompanying electrodes on Jan; he has set it to run the videos and shock sequences designed to punish the presentation system for direct disobedience to a handler's command. The video emphasizes to Jan, the Alice in Wonderland parts, Andromeda and others, the terrible things that happen when someone disobeys their presenter programming and a command to obey from a handler. The four of us watch as Jan shakes and screams, until, finally, a long eight minutes later, we hear the various parts in her presenter system promising the spiritual being that they would always obey, and never disobey.

Matthew removes the helmet and looks into her eyes. He lets her catch her breath before asking, “Do you all really promise?” She assents, and we all give her big hugs and tell her how much we love her and believe in her. Matthew puts her on his lap, holding her close as he gives her the restorative drink.

I look around at all three of my children and say, “Remember to always obey. We can only be safe if you obey. Your daddy and I can only love you if you obey. We can only love each other if we obey.”

After Jan has calmed down, we put the programming equipment back into the hiding place in a locked box under our bed. Matthew and I cue the presenter controller parts in all three children to go deeper in, and for their presenter parts to completely forget the last fifteen minutes. Matthew remains with the children, but I go to the bedroom and record an oral summary of the event into our special secure communication device, then transmit it to the programming team at the main facility, with a note that I will be bringing Jan in tonight to the regional facility. For any part to defy an obey command is very concerning, and I believe that Jan needs a full assessment and retuning of her presenter system; the afternoon’s punishment was only a stopgap measure.

I go back out to the room where the rest of the family is, and smile at everyone. Job done, Matthew and I, Luce, switch back inside and the presenters, Phillip and Trixie emerge. Jan gets up off the floor, pushes her crayons and coloring book aside and says firmly to me, “Mummy, I want to watch my movie!”

“You really love the Little Mermaid, don’t you?” I laugh.

None of us remember what really happened in the last twenty minutes; none of us even notice that the clock has skipped twenty minutes.

The two memories in this chapter depict how the adult programmer parts in the parents monitor the children’s presentation programming, and immediately punish any deviation from their presentation programming in dramatic and painful ways. The deviations are detectable in three main ways. First, the presentation part uses physical, intellectual, social or spiritual skills that he or she is not supposed to have, or shows preferences or a temperament/personality type that is different from the one he or she programmed to have. The cult programs each presenter with a specific profile, i.e., a designated set of skills, and a particular temperament and set of preferences. For instance, my American presentation, Elsa, was programmed to be unathletic and clumsy, and poor at math; but my French presentation was programmed to be athletic though much more interested in arts than sports. Trixie’s daughter, Jan, was programmed to be very friendly as “Jan” in the UK, but was programmed to be extremely shy when she presented in France as “Louisa”. “Breaking profile’ thus easily shows the parents that the child is not complying with their presentation programming.

Second, the non-cult presenters are programmed to obey hand signals and specific commands by the handlers, as all parts are. Any refusal to immediately obey commands, triggers or hand signals is a clear flag to the parents and siblings that the child is not following their presentation programing. All disobedience to direct commands by handlers is taken extremely seriously, and will result in remediation at a proper programming facility, as soon as possible. While the non-cult day presenters are expected to obey triggers, cues, hand signals and cult commands given by the parents or handlers, the degree of instant obedience expected to ordinary parental requests will differ according to the family's overall profile. That is, to mimic normal family life, the presenters are often not programmed to obey their parents perfectly when they are doing non-cult things. For example, as Elsa, if I gave my three presenter children a command in German to get ready to go to an Illuminati training activity, they would immediately stop their play with no complaint and go wait in the car. They would not even pause to go to the bathroom on the way to the car without seeking explicit permission from my husband or I. If they did not, they would be severely punished by my husband's or my cult parts. However, if I told them in English to pick up their toys earlier than usual because a guest from church was coming for dinner tonight, they would complain and argue for a while before reluctantly obeying, then doing a poor job at picking up. Elsa would then just be exasperated and pick the toys up herself.

How much normal childish disobedience is allowed a child in a non-cult presenter family setting depends on the cult's designated profile for each family; in the families programmed to be abusive, the presenter children may be expected to obey instantly or be punished. These punishments, however, unlike the programmers' punishments described in this chapter, will not involve programming tools, or be dissociated and forgotten, since they are an actual part of the family's conscious narrative. It may also depend on the child's designated role in the family. The 'golden child' or favorite child may not be punished for disobedience, but the 'scapegoat' child might be expected to obey or face instant punishment from the parents. Again, this disparate treatment would be within the conscious narrative of the family, and differs from the programmers' punishment which the family will dissociate and forget. In such a setting, if the 'favorite child' tries to intervene in the 'scapegoat' child's punishment or share in her chores, then the favorite child may be punished by the programmers for deviating from her programming to be a spoiled brat callous towards her siblings.

The third way that deviation from presenter programming is evident is when the child has memories of the cult, or of other lives in other countries, that he or she is not supposed to have. Neither memory described in this chapter reflects memory bleedthrough, but it is also taken very seriously when it happens.

While the memories illustrate the parents as being the ones who responded to Timothy's and Jan's disobedience, all members of a family are usually cross-programmed to monitor each other's presenters, and to punish and report any failure to obey the programming. Even children as young as four or five years old can be trained to detect any anomalies in their parents' or older siblings' presentations and to report them to the cult, whether by a phone call or in-person conversation at a cult event or back at the cult facility. Older children – tweens, teens and adults – can take an active role in punishing other family members' failure to fully comply with their presentation programming, behaving exactly as the parents did in this chapter. In other words, in a mind controlled, programmed family, everyone is each other's 'handler' or 'controller'. I am aware that the familial cross-handling applies to the Jesuits and the Illuminati and several other more organized occult societies; this may not be the case for all cults that use mind control.

Additionally, by the time a Jesuit child is five years old, his or her system is fully trained to self-perpetuate the presenter programming, and to monitor the presentations and report any anomalies (departure from programming directives) back to their programmers, and their presentation parents. If one parent is not Jesuit, the child is programmed to not report to him or her, but only to their Jesuit parent. In general, the shells are tasked with telling on the child if they use social or physical skills that the presentation is not supposed to have. For instance, if a presentation is programmed to be clumsy and unathletic but wins a footrace while playing with a neighbors' kids after school, the shell will report this. In Wonderland, Mnemosyne (Alice's "mother" in the program who controls what she believes) internally will question presentation parts to see if they are getting any bleedthrough memories – including dreams - of other presentations or the cult, and will report accordingly. This continues throughout adulthood, and each act of self-reporting to the programmers is heavily reinforced by punishment and reward. The shells and presenters are programmed to believe deeply that the only way they can be loved and show love, is to obey their programming. They also believe that any failure of their programming is the result of a 'lack of love' for family members, and will result in the death of these family members if it continues unchecked. This is why when the parents or siblings are punishing a presentation for disobeying their programming, they will usually pretend that they are dying or in horrible pain.

This chapter also illustrates how non-cult ordinary day presenters, at least in the Jesuits and the Illuminati, the parents themselves, are completely amnesic to their acts of enforcing their children's programming. Even so, all through the years of presenting in my non-cult cover identities in various countries, I experienced moments of guilt, shame, fear and depression regarding my children's lives, and the occasional niggling sense that they were not safe. But if I tried to grasp these feelings or understand them, they would disappear (amnesia), or the thoughts would come that I was feeling this way simply because of my own childhood insecurities (denial), or I would feel a sudden assurance that everything was ok (delusion). That is, my own extensive Alice in Wonderland programming kept up my own ignorance of what was really going on, though I could never fully consistently dissociate the heartbreak and shame of hurting my children. My refusal to remember or understand was based on programming to believe that if I did remember, the cult would torture and kill my children. This threat was strongly installed in my presenter mother parts through many extremely realistic set-ups and virtual reality sessions when each child was an infant that if I remembered, that infant was tortured and killed. As a mother, I was then offered a "second chance", the infant was "resurrected", and I made vows to never remember in order to save my child's life.

The Alice in Wonderland programming ensures that no presenter lost time or gaps in memories in the weeks or months between presenting in different countries, because they were in Wonderland watching videos of the life they believed they were living in real time. Similarly, staged events in studios set up to look like a room in the presenters' house, virtual reality and even simple videos are used to give parts the 'memories' of significant life events (e.g., high school graduation, first puppy, first communion, etc.) and more mundane or regular events (e.g., going to school, helping children with their homework, attending weekly worship team practice at church, going to work each day). Four hours of videos or staged events can fill gaps of months or years if necessary, since each presentation is programmed to believe that the videos, virtual reality or staged events are their actual memories. This chapter shows that the Alice in Wonderland programming also covers smaller gaps in memories for the presentations. When the parent goes back inside Wonderland, at the behest of an internal programmer and Mnemosyne, they will either be put in a 'time pause', or told what to believe to cover the brief time lost. Their programming to completely believe everything that Mnemosyne or other designated internal parts tell them has the same effect as experiencing a staged memory or watching a video.

I am 32 years old. It is 2 am, and Chi Council is meeting in an opulent room in the Vatican. This council is composed of adult members in leadership in numerous areas within the Jesuit Order. None of the lights have been turned on, and there are not even candles, because the dark, destructive Chi system parts can only bear the very lowest levels of light. The council members greet each other with a nod, and our meeting begins with numerous rituals that lavishly demonstrate our worship and loyalty to Satan. After a sufficient number of sacrifices, bowing and hailing are done, Satan enters the room in his hideous, black form. We go flat on our faces to honor this being to whom we give our complete obedience.

With a growl, Satan indicates that the council members are to get up and take their seats at the large, round black table. He stands at the head. Over the course of the next three hours, we discuss numerous detailed plans and strategies for the destruction of the world. From a group of nuclear explosions that occur in a chain reaction, to seeding the atmosphere and clouds to create worldwide storms and droughts that would cause worldwide famine, to the use of chemicals and bioweapons that would destroy entire cities and even nations, plans that have been developed over years are discussed, and the merits and disadvantages of each are considered.

But there is one large elephant in the room that no one, including the malevolent being at the head of the room, is willing to discuss: the fact that plans like these have been in place for centuries but we have not been able to implement them. The reason is simple: there is another being, whose name is not mentioned in this room, who has stopped the acts of destruction that would kill all mankind, time and time again over the years. Weapons capable of creating global devastation have been available for over 200 years, but our plans have been foiled time and time again. The work of this being is categorized as “interruptions” and “anomalies”, for Satan and the members of Chi council would never acknowledge that the source of the “interruptions” and “anomalies” is actually God, or that He has the power to block even the deepest, darkest plans of this secret council.

So, while plans are made, and implemented to the degree possible, the council knows that this destruction is a matter of patience, and long-term planning. The oracles have prophesied that when the coming world leader is in power, then great destructive forces and suffering will be unleashed upon mankind, to a degree never seen before. So they plan, and wait, and hope that he will come in their lifetime. For they know that this coming leader will be completely in agreement with their plans, and will help them to unleash them to a greater degree than before.

There is a dark, destructive secret held deep in the systems of the mind-controlled, programmed members of the Jesuit Order. In daily life, the Jesuit cult presenters are committed to bringing in a new world order of global peace and prosperity. They are indoctrinated to believe that the Antichrist, whom they call the “Light of the World” or “He Who Is To Come” will accomplish good things for mankind. My cult presenter Luce, or Father Luke, has, as everyone in the Order has been, heavily conditioned to believe that the pain, destruction, torture and illegal activities engaged in are a “necessary” and temporary evil, which is the price of gaining this great goal. However, the Jesuit cult presenter has no idea that another system with different goals exists deeper within – the Chi presenters or ‘dark host’ who is dedicated to the destruction of mankind. Luce is as completely unaware of and amnesic to the Chi system as the ‘normal, non-cult’ parts are to life in the Illuminati or in Rome.

The Chi system represents the individual's commitment to Satan's real agenda for mankind and the world: its complete destruction. Within the Order, the highest level of occultism is not Luciferianism that seeks the ascension of mankind, or Satanism which elevates the worship of evil and the enslavement of mankind, but rather, Destruction, i.e., Satan's followers are to destroy all of mankind. Not just the 'sheep', or the 'non-elite', or the 'common people', or the 'useless eaters', but ALL of mankind in an act of final rage and destruction. This core level system is convinced through years of intense conditioning to hate every human being that walks on the earth, including their own self. To prevent self-harm, they are taught that they must not destroy their "mortal shell" (human body) that they are encased in, because it, too, is a temporary "necessary evil" for accomplishing Satan's plan. To create the amnesia between Chi and the rest of the system, these parts are taught that they must hide from other parts because the other parts are 'mortal' and so will fight them to preserve the human race. Similarly, the Jesuit cult presenters are taught early that that Chi system parts are an 'evil within' that must be walled away and 'forgotten', lest they ever escape to destroy the world.

The programming of Chi system parts begins in the womb when the fetus is taught to blame all mankind and 'mortality' for its pain and abuse, and so the only way for its pain and abuse to stop is that all mankind be destroyed. This system of fetal parts never knows anything but pain at the hands of human beings, including the birth mother, and is constantly rescued from pain by Satan or the 'immortals' (programmers in costumes). The birthmother herself drives this lesson deeply into the fetus' psyche by telling the programmers to electrocute the fetus while explaining ragefully that this is because she is 'fallen' and a 'mortal' who has 'forgotten to ascend' and that she 'just can't help herself but cause pain'. Thus, primary fetal rage at the abuse is harnessed and manipulated and directed away from the real abuser (Satan, the programmers and the birth mother) and towards all mankind. This system not only performs the spiritual function of enslaving the person to Satan's true desire, but also provides a psychological outlet for the person's rage at the abuse; the programmers believe that the provision of such an outlet is critical for the person's overall system stability, emotional and mental resilience and long-term functionality.

Chapter 21: Readying a Global Secret Army

I am 30 years old and a team of Jesuit fathers, of which I am one, is meeting with a delegation from China in a suburb south of Beijing. The delegation from Beijing is interested in a proposal that the Jesuits have put forward: we have offered to help them develop a world-class training facility in one of their underground facilities in order to create an army that will be dedicated to bringing in the long-expected leader that their own prophets and wise men have told them will come soon – within a generation or two.

After an hour of murmured polite greetings and talk, Simon, the Jesuit first general, starts the discussion that led to our being here. "We would like to create a vast underground facility in your country in the northeast," Simon says.

"It will look like this," he continues, and clicks a button that displays a blueprint of the proposed facility, and another button that creates a 3-D hologram image of what it will look like once constructed. "Both your country and ours would together provide sufficient zygotes and birth mothers to develop an initial prototype group of 100 based upon the best of our genetics research from the last 25 years."

At this point, Simon clicks to display a video that shows a group of older teenaged soldiers performing military exercises extremely well. These teens are well-muscled and in some of the maneuvers displayed, show excellent critical thinking and strategic skills in various simulated situations. When a large holographic image of a blond, blue-eyed man appears on a screen above the room they are in, the soldiers all salute with complete adoration in their eyes. In one exercise, the holographic image gives the command to one soldier to kill the comrade next to him, and unhesitatingly, the soldier obeys.

"As you can see, our initial prototypes, developed in an underground facility in Poland, have been quite successful," Simon continues. "If you agree to our proposal, we could together develop and train 100,000 special soldiers over a period of thirty years. We of course would share our genetic and other technologies with you, and implement them in the facility, at only a third of the cost to you, with the Order taking on the other two thirds of the cost. You will end up with a state-of-the-art training facility that will be completely hidden, one that will ensure your position as a world leader in the coming order."

Simon pauses, and then says, "Our delegation would like to hear your thoughts on this, including any concerns you might have, or suggestions for improvement. We value your insight and skills as professionals, and would like to give you plenty of time to think about this, to come up with possible drawbacks or benefits that our team has missed, and also welcome your ideas on what working together might look like if you like this idea."

I add, "Perhaps we could meet in a month, to allow you time to discuss this among yourselves, and also to approach us with any concerns or suggestions you might have?"

Our Order recognizes that the members of the Chinese delegation are highly skilled professionals, and we respect their thoughts and suggestions as peers. If this facility is to be successful, we will need their input and will need to agree to implement their suggestions. Conner makes this point clear: "While we are proposing the construction of this facility, and the development of these soldiers, this will truly be a joint project. We will provide your teams with equal input and authority with ours, with the proviso that our head trainers will also be present on the training council over it, and the top trainers be given final say on decisions made, five from your team and seven from ours." We want them to know that although this is a Jesuit facility, their trainers and professionals will have a voice that is listened to.

At the end of a month, with further meetings and negotiations, an agreement is made. Beneath the ground, within an hour's drive of Beijing, an underground facility will be developed, a facility that will be completely modern, with the majority built at Vatican expense, with the proviso that our methods and our trainers will be in charge, but with extensive peer help and administration from the Chinese trainers. Our contract states that the Chinese trainers will be able to review and give suggestions regarding what is being done at all times. All parties are satisfied, and the Beijing facility will become a reality within five years. It will be connected to Beijing by underground tunnel, and the provinces of China, along with other countries surrounding China, will provide the infants and birth mothers that will be used to create a literal army of soldiers trained to have completely loyalty to the coming world leader.

These soldiers will never leave their facilities. They will never experience life in a family setting, or have contact with others who are not part of the occult world. Therefore, they are not programmed with non-cult presentation parts who are amnesic to the cult. Instead, they will have specialized loyalty programming to this coming leader, and will be programmed to be willing to lay down their lives for his sake. We have created virtual reality programs based upon the painting of "The Light of the World" that are a fair simulation of what this world leader will look like, for we believe that he will be coming soon, indeed, if the oracles are right in their predictions.

It is eight months later, and the fathers and I are meeting with a delegation from Russia in St. Petersburg. It is winter, and the temperatures are sub-freezing, in a snow-covered landscape. Our goal is the same as when meeting with leadership in China: to build an underground training facility, and there to develop soldiers and military sub-captains who will not have the complex presentation programming seen in agents who must be hosted and present in various countries or identities. Instead, just as in China, these soldiers will be raised from birth to respond with unshakeable loyalty and obedience to images and videos of the coming world leader, and to view him as a father figure and deep attachment bond for their systems. We present this plan to the Russian leaders, and after three weeks of discussion, they give their response, and agree. For Russia also wants to play a leading role in the coming order, and wants to help build the army that will usher in his rule. Just as in China, the soldiers will be programmed to speak and understand a variety of languages, and to comply with complete love and obedience to any requests that this coming leader will make. The army for the new world order is building, as the Jesuit fathers and I make plans to visit Africa, the United States, South America, and remote areas near Nepal in the near future for the same purpose.

There are numerous underground training facilities around the world, with new underground facilities built after the success of the initial ones. What makes the programming done in China, Russia and the other countries mentioned unique is the fact that this new generation of soldiers will have programming to obey the leader of the new world order, and the trainers do not bother to put in presentation programming for other countries or identities, since these soldiers will never leave the facility until it is time to take orders from the coming leader. These facilities have above ground areas as well, but the grounds are all carefully hidden from public view, whether above or below ground, with blackout of any satellite coverage (which intelligence in countries around the world is aware of and programmed to not take note of). These soldiers comprise literally a completely dedicated army of thousands upon thousands being programmed in this way, and represents the belief by the Jesuits and other countries around the world that the coming world leader will come upon the scene soon – very soon.

Part 3: Trying to Get Free

This section describes several major events in my life from 1985 to 2000, including my failed attempts to leave the Illuminati and the Jesuit Order due to threats to my loved ones. Nonetheless, this was also a time where I encountered God again, and had the hope and desire to follow Him and leave the cults reinfused into my heart.

Chapter 22: Infiltrating the Healing Community

I am 28 and am fronting as Ana, my Illuminati cult host. Regional head programmers, their assistants and other programmers in charge of sub-regions or special projects, and regional council leaders from the USA and several European countries, myself included (due to my role as a second-tier programmer in the western region of the USA), are attending an important Illuminati meeting in Germany. Public attention to the existence of abusive organized occult groups, and ritual abuse had been garnering momentum in the USA due to books such as Michelle Remembers, and cases such as the McMartin preschool trial. While these situations had been publicly handled by rational debunking and polite ridicule by 'experts', the Illuminati remained concerned about the fact that now there exists a small but growing number of professional therapists, counselors, and Christian prayer ministers, who were taking survivor stories seriously.

Despite the lack of understanding of programming by the secular professionals, their focus on building a therapeutic alliance, and on trauma and its resolution, had resulted in surprisingly effective therapeutic work for some survivors. Similarly, while Christian inner healing ministers generally had little expertise in trauma or developmental psychology, their accessibility (typically free of charge or requiring only a small donation) combined with how they could facilitate a person's encounter with a loving God in non-religious, non-judgmental ways (if they were highly skilled and loving without a religious spirit), also resulted in remarkable healings for some survivors. Through both the secular and faith-based healing communities, despite the growing controversy (fomented by the cults) regarding ritual abuse, 'recovered memories' and DID, survivors were starting to find validation and support. Therapists and prayer ministers were also starting to share with each other within their respective communities about what they were learning about helping cult survivors. These surprising events have put firmly before our faces the need to assess the weaknesses of our current strategies for preventing non-cult input from modifying or disrupting our members' programming, and to come up with better ones.

Today's meeting focuses not on how to make 'ritual abuse' seem like nonsense to the general public, or how therapists and prayer ministers could be convinced or intimidated into not helping survivors. Rather, the focus is on how to prevent a programmed individual from engaging with any information and/or relationships that would foster the resolution of their trauma and programming; this is why many programmers are present. In this and previous meetings, we throw around phrases like 'preventing unauthorized changes to programming', 'reducing vulnerability to external modifications', 'preventing unauthorized access to the system (of parts in the person)', 'increasing system security', and 'inadequate system resilience to external stressors'. We never use words like 'healing' or 'freedom', or phrases like 'how to prevent our member from healing' or 'how to prevent our member from escaping'. Such words would be too honest, highlighting how wrong it is to mind control and exploit human beings, and how people still want to be free even after a lifetime of programming from infancy.

Marion, the head programmer over the UK, is first to speak on the topic at today's meeting. She is the most senior of the twelve programmers assigned to go for professional counseling and Christian inner healing over the past six months in the USA to gather data; these programmers will be presenting their findings and recommendations for discussion. Top programmers had been chosen for this job because their expertise could give them useful insights when observing how their own system of parts responded to therapy and ministry. All present at the meeting had received hardcopies of their reports at the beginning of the meeting and had been given time to go over them. A collated version of the reports approved for sharing will be sent to the national Illuminati leadership and trainers' councils in various countries a week after the meeting.

Marion presents a very concise summary of her time receiving prayer ministry, then begins to share how the ministry impacted her system. "When Joanna prayed that her God would remove anything that was hurting Gatekeeper 24," Marion relates, "she (the gatekeeper part) saw a golden light come towards her. A hand reached out from within the light and touched the guardian's talisman from around her neck, saying, "This is hurting you. May I remove it?" The Gatekeeper agreed. When she did, the hand gently removed the talisman. Then the guardian had to unwrap itself from Gatekeeper and it left. Gatekeeper immediately felt lighter, cleaner and more clear-headed, and she could feel great love coming from the light."

I force myself to refrain from shifting uncomfortably in my seat. It was not so much that the Christian's prayer had the power to initiate the interaction of a powerful 'loving light' with a gatekeeper part that bothered me, as much as it was the clear statement that the guardian was hurting the gatekeeper part. All my life, I had been indoctrinated and programmed that the 'guardians', 'watchers', 'immortals', 'demons', 'gods', 'wise ones', 'ancient ones' – all the different words we used to describe the demonic forces we engaged with in our rituals and programming – were 'good' and were 'helping us'. I had also been indoctrinated and programmed into denying the pain and distress they were causing me. I look around at the serious faces of my fellow programmers and the Illuminati leadership, suspecting that they, too, might be hiding the same discomfort.

Marion proceeds to highlight several more moments that were most relevant to us as programmers. She then states what she believes to be the very simple pattern underlying her parts' 'unauthorized and disruptive' interactions with God whom the Illuminati at times, ironically, call 'the Deceiver'. She said, "The Deceiver offers parts what they think they really want – 'truth', 'love', 'no more pain', 'hope', 'freedom'." Her last few words are spoken with a touch of sarcasm, and she continues, "and parts in the system will at times believe the Deceiver, especially the young ones." When she has finished speaking and answering questions, she summarizes her recommendations in one straightforward sentence, "Stop parts, especially young ones, from trusting the Deceiver."

I can't help but wonder what Marion's part had indeed experienced with the Deceiver, that he could with a single question and brief encounter, compel parts who had years upon years of indoctrination and conditioning to distrust the Deceiver, to trust him and actually try something new. Somewhere deeper inside behind Ana's awareness, Luce, the Jesuit cult presenter who was observing the meeting, feels a twinge of sadness at an unbidden flash of memory of the true love she had experienced at 14 years old from the Christian God.

The other eleven programmers share their reports in turn, each finishing with their recommendations for preventing therapists and inner healing ministers from causing cult survivors to question their indoctrination and degrade their programming. When the last presenter has spoken, their recommendations are listed on screens around the room for easy reference. The recommendations are replicated and organized thematically across three lists that reflect the main areas of vulnerability noted by the twelve programmers: (1) parts who seemed most curious about and/or receptive to therapy and prayer ministry input, (2) spiritual, social/interpersonal/attachment needs and self-actualization needs that successful therapy or ministry seemed to be fulfilling, and (3) the most frequent cult philosophies or propaganda that successful therapy or ministry seemed to be debunking.

We begin earnest discussion of new programs and programming strategies based on their experiences, recommendations and problem areas highlighted. All of us realize the criticality of designing new anti-healing and anti-God programs that would barricade our members from therapy and prayer ministry. As infants and young children naturally cry out to God when they are in distress, the Illuminati were already doing anti-God and anti-Christian programming as a standard procedure on their youngest members. For years, members who had Christian fronts in their non-cult daytime lives also already were given programming to ensure that church attendance, prayer and other Christian activities did not interfere with their mind control and cult loyalty. We were now seeking to develop comprehensive and robust programs specific to the confidential, intensely personal and intimate, healing-focused nature of interactions between therapeutic professionals, inner healing ministers and their clients.

I contribute insights and suggestions to the discussion with the right mix of confidence and humility as befitting an up-and-coming programmer adroit at asserting herself without offending those higher up the hierarchy. Several of my comments are received extremely well. Little do I know as Ana that my contributions did not emerge out of my own skill or discussions with the USA Illuminati programmers. Rather, the Jesuit fathers, who were seeking to have me promoted up the programmers' ranks in the Illuminati, had already programmed me to say exactly the right thing at these meetings. In fact, five of the twelve Illuminati programmers who spoke today were Jesuit infiltrators who had already shared their data and recommendations with Rome. The meeting lasts an exhausting seven hours, and we close with sketches of new programs to develop and test over the next few years.

A week after the collated report is sent to the trainers' councils and leadership councils in the USA and other countries, I receive an invitation to join a special international commission tasked with designing, testing and implementing new anti-therapy and anti-prayer-ministry programming. Our focus, for now, would be on programming adults for resisting therapeutic and Christian contexts within the USA, followed very closely by the UK, then the other countries in Europe.

This chapter relates one small piece of the multi-pronged strategy that the Illuminati (and other organized occult societies and mind-control government agencies) used to control the public narrative about ritual abuse, mind control, and programming, and subvert any potential harm that public knowledge of such things might cause their agendas. According to my memories, the early 80s to the early 90s involved periods of intensive infiltration of the healing community by cult agents posing as survivors wanting to heal in order to carry out data-gathering missions. As related here, the information was then used to improve the cults' anti-healing programming. Such missions continued over the next two decades, with the cults updating anti-healing programming to adapt to new trends or progress in knowledge in the secular professional mental health and faith-based healing sectors.

But why even bother with sending agents to check out these healing modalities and investing vast amounts of time and resources into creating and installing new programs? Why not simply order members to keep away from all prayer ministry and therapy, considering the extraordinary amount of control the cults have over their members' daily lives?

A few reasons stand out. The first is pride: it was tremendously offensive to the cults to observe that their years of programming and indoctrination were vulnerable to change by a therapists' or prayer ministers' kindness and belief in that person's desire and potential for free thought, self-mastery and non-manipulative love. It was just as offensive and untenable to them that there was really a God who could free people from the demonic guardians integrated into programming. The second primary reason was control: just ordering people to keep away from therapy or inner healing ministry would be tacit acknowledgement that they were effectively dangerous to programming. It would demonstrate to cult members that programming could be resolved and its hold over an individual broken, even in adulthood. This would threaten the cults' control over their members. The final primary reason was a measure of scientific curiosity: the programmers and cult leaders did genuinely want the better understanding of the mind, brain, body and spirit that was afforded by exploring how programmed individuals responded to therapy and prayer ministry, and to use this knowledge to advance methods of control.

In addition to improving their control over their members' programming, the Illuminati and other groups also sought to increase their control over the mental health and Christian healing sectors. There had always been a very strong degree of cult infiltration of research and practice in fields like psychiatry and psychology; this period saw an increase in the number of cult agents with the appropriate credentials assigned to front as psychologists, psychiatrists, counselors, clinical social workers or Christian ministers. These agents were specifically trained to use their front jobs to identify and punish survivors seeking help, and to discourage survivors from finding help. Like how the front, non-cult daytime presenters of the agents who posed as traumatized survivors needing help had no idea that they were actually on a data gathering job for the cult, these mental health professionals and clergy were usually completely amnesic to their dissociated cult life and cult assignments against their clients.

Chapter 23: The Memories Begin

Three years have passed. As Elsa, I have continued working with the international anti-healing commission to design and test effective ways of countering therapy and inner healing ministry. The last few years of very hard work on this, and other training and programming initiatives have led to another promotion: I am now the head trainer of the Western region of the USA, and take the trainer's chair at the regional leadership council meetings. My pride in this increase in status is soon swamped by the unrelenting river of work.

The international commission has initiated another project to test the latest anti-healing programs designed for use with therapists and prayer ministers working in the USA. The local project team is led by Jonathan Meier, and comprises the first and second echelons of programmers in the USA. Since some of the programs are designed to counter Christianity, a spiritual issue, two mages are also on the team. I am one of seven programmers assigned to field test the programming using our own systems of parts. Two of us are male; the rest are female. All of us have non-cult, daytime presentations who have been churchgoing Christians for many years, with nice families and respectable jobs. The team puts the relevant parts in the seven of us through the anti-healing programming. These programs are based on terrorizing parts through twisted scenarios of typical experiences in receiving prayer ministry, Bible verses and stories, and of heaven and hell. The early childhood programming to hate and blame God, to mistrust strangers (anyone not from the cult), to fear memories and any changes to programming, and to report deviations and unauthorized thoughts back to the programmers, is also retuned and enhanced to be triggered by any attempts to heal while receiving ministry.

All of this is extremely traumatizing. I leave each programming session feeling sick to my soul. I hide my reluctance from the rest of the programmers, putting on an earnest face as we discuss what we might expect to learn from the seven of us being programmed to engage with Christian ministers and gather data. Somewhere deep inside, I hate the fact that we are seeking to improve our control, and block our members from receiving help and finding freedom. But I am too afraid and indoctrinated to resist. Our programming takes place over six months, in between my other duties, and all too soon, it is time for me to begin my mission: Elsa, my American presentation, will be allowed to begin having memories and attempt to heal through Christian and secular professional help in order to assay the effectiveness of her anti-healing programming.

I am 32 years old, and am in my American presentation, Elsa. I have been working as an ICU nurse for the past eleven years, and have three children, one which is adopted. My oldest two children, Sandra and Mary, are five years old, and my youngest, Sammy, is only one years old. Since I was 25, I have been diagnosed with "endogenous depression" because my counselor could not figure out why I was so depressed, considering that I did have any trauma or major difficulties in my reported history. My husband, Chuck, too, had been struggling for years with oppression and depression. His anti-depressants are not working well to control his chronic anxiety and intermittent despair. Chuck is not a feely-weepy kind of male, nor does he ever 'spiritualize' things, so I am very surprised when he tells me after work today that he is going for deliverance with a minister at a large local megachurch.

The recommendation comes from a man we respect at our little church within the same denomination, and Chuck feels that he is indeed anxious and unhappy enough to want help. I wonder vaguely if he would be considering making the appointment if the person recommending deliverance as a solution had been a woman. The thought crosses my mind that I have nothing to lose if I give it a try myself. I would love to be 'delivered' from my depression which I was always feeling guilty about having.

"Maybe I should go for deliverance, too," I tell him. "I think I could use it."

"Oh, no, you're fine," he insists. What he doesn't realize is that somehow, deep down, I know full well that I am not 'fine'. This knowledge has always sat in some deep area of my belly. I am getting tired of ignoring it. In spite of what my husband says, I make an appointment with the church office for deliverance.

The next afternoon, I drop by the church office to fill in the ministry request and personal history forms. The church secretary is friendly, which helps me to feel a little less nervous about doing this. It takes about fifteen minutes to fill out the forms, put it in the manila envelope provided, and pop it into the letter holder by the side of the pastor's office door. I have to work at the hospital this evening, and rush home to change into scrubs and drive to work.

The next morning, the phone rings me awake. I grope for the phone, hoping that it is not a call from the hospital. A voice I don't recognize asks if they are speaking to Elsa.

"Yes," I respond.

"How soon can you get here?" the man on the phone says. "I am on the deliverance team, and I think we need to see you as soon as possible."

"I have to work tonight, but I have tomorrow off," I tell him. "But why so fast? I thought it would take weeks to get an appointment."

"Normally, it would. But you checked off every trauma that indicates severe occultic activity, and we think it would be good not to wait."

"What occultic activity?" I ask, bewildered. I have no idea of what he is talking about.

"We'll talk about it tomorrow," he says.

Wondering what I might have gotten myself into, I agree to come in early the next morning. The next day, the church secretary brings me to a small room off the main church foyer. I shut the door behind me for privacy, and look at the man sitting at the table. In front of him is the questionnaire that I filled out two days before.

"Hi, I'm Neil," he says, as he rises and shakes my hand. "Sit down wherever you like." He indicates the chairs around the table. I feel nervous, not knowing what to expect. While I have not seen any movies about exorcism – they seem much too scary to me – I have seen trailers of films on TV and wonder if my head will start twisting backwards, or I will start vomiting, during the "deliverance". I hope it is quick and not too painful, but I am feeling panicky, expecting the worst.

I sit several seats away from Neil, and he slides the questionnaire towards me. "I wanted you to see the symptoms you checked," he says in a kind voice.

I look down at the papers with growing disbelief. “Sexual abuse”-check. “Hearing chanting and calling upon spirits in my head” – check. “Abuse by animals”-check. “Seeing torture of animals or people”- check. “Incest”-check. Everything, every single trauma on the sheet has been checked. But I don’t remember checking them, because in my mind, none of these things ever happened to me.

“I don’t understand, I don’t remember checking any of these,” I say.

“That’s okay. Why don’t we start out with prayer, and maybe we can try renouncing some of these things, just in case. Are you okay with that?”

I nod yes, and Neil slides a sheet of paper to me, and then prays, renouncing any involvement in occult activities. “Why don’t you say the same prayer, it’s on the sheet I just gave you, so you can read it out,” he suggests.

“Dear Jesus, please forgive me if I have been involved in any- “ the words are barely out of my mouth, before I suddenly get up, and run screaming into a corner of the room. “Why are you saying you love me, if you are hurting me?” I cry out in anguish. “Why are you hurting me? Why don’t you love me?” The sobs are coming out, uncontrollably, nonstop for two minutes.

Suddenly, as if a tap has been turned off, I am quiet and looking up at Neil, although trembling like a shaking leaf in the wind. “What the hell was that?” I ask him. “Am I losing my mind?”

“No,” he answers. “But I wonder if it is possible that there is some trauma there.”

“Absolutely not!” I tell him, angry. “My life was just fine!” I get up and leave, angry, without making another appointment.

At home that night, I am washing the dinner dishes, when suddenly I see my supposed biological father in America sexually abusing me. In the memory, I am three years old, and he is pulling me out from underneath the living room couch where I am hiding, by my legs, as I scream. He sodomizes me, and it hurts terribly. It is as if a terrible nightmarish video is playing inside my mind.

“He had no right to do that to me!” I yell, as “Crack!” I break a dish. The fragments scatter into the sink below. I scream “You bastard! You bastard! I hate you!” Crack! Crack! Two more dishes break as in my rage, I thunk them across the sink divider.

My husband rushes into the kitchen, my daughters following him. “What’s wrong?” he asks. “Why are you doing this?!”

“Leave me alone!” I yell. I run into my bedroom, lock the door, and begin hitting the bed with my fists. I am filled with rage at this remembered violation of my body. An hour later, spent, I go back into the kitchen and clean up the mess I have made, and finish washing the dishes. I wonder if I have just made all of this up, because I have never remembered anything like this before. But where did the emotion come from? I silently ask myself. I have no answer.

It is the next day, and this morning, when I woke up, I heard chanting in my head. The video inside my head is playing again, and this time, there are people in black robes and hoods swaying and chanting, in a darkened room lit with flickering candles. I see a stone table at one end of the room, and someone is holding a dagger. On the table, I see a body tied up. I scream, feeling overwhelmed. Shaking and panicking, I pick up the phone and with trembling fingers, I dial my own pastor at the church office where he works weekdays.

"I am seeing people in robes, chanting in my head," I tell him as soon as he comes to the phone. I am head of a Bible study at his church, am also on his worship team, and considered a faithful, active member. "Am I going crazy, having a psychotic snap? What is this?" I fill him in on visiting once with the deliverance team minister at the larger church in our denomination, and what has happened since.

"I have never heard of anything like this," my pastor responds. "But I will be there in an hour."

True to his word, he drives over and prays with me. But his prayer doesn't help. I still feel panicked and overwhelmed. And the terrible videos in my head are still playing, getting worse. It looks and sounds like some type of horror movie, except I never watch horror movies, they are too scary to me. What is worse, I am seeing myself in these videos, chanting along and holding a knife.

"Make it stop!" I plead, my eyes looking beseechingly at my pastor, a figure of spiritual authority in my life.

"I don't know how," he says helplessly.

For the next 24 hours, my life feels like a non-stop panic attack. I call in at work, and then call Neil on the phone number he had given me when we met two days before. When he answers, I say, "This is Elsa. Help!"

"What's going on?" Neil asks. I tell him.

"I'll be right over," he responds. Two hours later, he is at my home.

"What do I do?" I beg. "How do I make this stop?"

"Let's pray, and ask Jesus," he says. Because of the lack of help my pastor's prayers were, I am doubtful, but bow my head. Neil prays, and then I start to pray. "Dear Jesus, please help-"

"Stop that! You can't do that!" the voice is yelling, coming out of my mouth, but I am not the one thinking or talking. I feel as if I have been pushed back to the back of my own head, and listen in horror as someone or something else is speaking through me. The thought flits through my mind that my worst fear has come true. I am possessed, and I am going to hell.

But Neil is calm. He doesn't act upset, or as if he is in the presence of evil. Instead, he asks a question that is unexpected. "What is your name? Why did you come out just now?"

"My name is Belial," the voice speaking with my mouth answers. "And I can't let her say that prayer."

"Why not?" asks Neil, still unconcerned about my obvious possession.

"Because I am a witch, and witches don't pray to that person you were praying to," she says angrily.

I am stunned. Witch? What witch? What does this mean? I feel like a bystander, shoved aside by something stronger than I am, using my mouth to talk. And why isn't Neil casting this, this terrifying… thing, out? Why is he calmly chatting with…it?

"I understand you are just doing your job," Neil says. "What do you think if she does pray to Jesus."

Belial screeches at this name. "I would have to hurt her, badly," she says. "I don't want any of my power going, and she could mess this up."

Neil then asks if she has any friends inside. This thing answers, "Of course. There are many."

I wonder how many demons are living inside of me. For this is the only explanation I have for what is happening. Not only am I possessed, I am very, very, badly possessed.

After chatting with Belial for a time, to my utter shock, Neil asks her if she would like to become a Christian. I wonder, How can a demon become a Christian? What kind of nutty person is Neil? But instead of screeching and sending curses his way, as she was doing earlier, she cocks her head and says, "I'll think about it."

Suddenly, I am shoved forward, and can speak again, and Belial is gone, I have no idea where.

"What is going on here?" I ask, bewildered and feeling a bit spacey. It as if my head has been dunked into ozone for a time, and I have trouble thinking clearly now.

"Oh, you're back," says Neil. "That was Belial out. Do you remember anything?"

"Yes!" I say, panicked. "I heard everything you both said. What is this?? Some form of psychosis?"

Neil pauses. "No, I think you have dissociation, and this was a part of your mind I was talking with."

Now, I know Neil is crazy. I am not dissociative, I am sure. He is just sucking up to demons, instead of casting them out the way a normal person would.

"Can I give you something to read?" he asks.

He goes out into his car, and brings back a book that discusses demonic deliverance, by someone named Anderson (not the same Neil that has been praying with me). It is called The Bondage Breakers and I promise I will read it over the next few days. That night, before I go to sleep, I hear voices talking inside my head. One sounds like "Belial" who was talking to Neil earlier. "Boy, we are in for it," I hear as I am starting to fall sleep. "We aren't supposed to come out like that."

I read the book, which I don't really understand except there's lots about bad things happening that let demons get a foothold, and the need to pray against demons. I have been praying like crazy, I am willing to do anything that will help. My panic levels are still high, though. Nothing takes the panic away, not even when I am at work. Good thing I am really good at my job, or the panic could become a real issue.

Neil meets with me the next Saturday during my weekend off. During this time, I meet another voice that comes out and speaks through my mouth. Her name is "Gatekeeper" and unlike Belial, she decides to become a Christian relatively quickly. After that, she talks to me inside my head, telling me there are many others, that she is a sort of doorway or guardian over them, deciding who goes in or comes out. I wonder if I am really losing my mind at this point.

When the memories first started to come, as the American non-cult presentation, Elsa, I was beyond terrified and confused. This was the very first time in my life that I had ever had any memory of abuse or violence, whether by my biological father or by a group of people in black robes. The worst that I was aware of prior to this week was my mother's emotional neglect and distance, and my stepfather's verbal and emotional abuse. It is hard to even put into words how terrifying it was to first get these memories. I think that it is so important for survivors to be kind to themselves, and for supporters to show compassion and patience, when they are struggling with the terror and confusion that abuse and ritual memories can bring, especially new memories.

As this chapter describes, the memories initiated several programmed responses designed to hinder healing. First, I experienced flat denial, as seen when I left Neil's office after our first appointment in anger, claiming that there was no trauma in my life. When I had an actual memory – my biological father raping me at 3 – that came with the commensurate emotions, my denial took the form of wondering if I was just 'making it up'. When the first ritual memory emerged and the panic ensued, instead of realizing that I needed understanding and healing for that experience, the 'help' that I asked from my pastor was just to 'make it stop'. This is also a form of denial where the underlying logic is, "If it goes away, I will be ok again." I did not realize at that point that I had never been 'ok', and 'making it stop', i.e., re-dissociating the memory and so denying the pain and trauma, would never be the path to making things ok. Flat denial seemed completely rational within my worldview as a non-cult presenter because I had never had such memories before. After all, if it was true, shouldn't I have always known about these things? How could anyone actually forget such horrors?

Next, as I returned to Neil to seek prayer for the increasingly horrifying ritual memories, and started to have clear and explicit encounters with my own multiplicity (Belial and Gatekeeper talking to Neil, Gatekeeper talking to me; hearing other voices inside my head), I deny the dissociation. I fall back instead on an explanation that I had been programmed with that fit seamlessly with my Christian worldview: I must be possessed, and these 'voices' must be demons, and that Neil is being sucked in by the demonic to talk with them and not just cast them out. My second fallback, that fit with my presenter worldview as a healthcare professional and person from a middle-class, English-speaking, first world country, was that, well, I must be crazy.

Both explanations hindered healing by causing more terror and confusion, while discouraging me from exploring the actual memories or the fact that I was dissociative. These explanations also mislabeled the memories and parts as problems to be 'fixed', rather than as experiences to heal, or coping mechanisms for an overwhelming life. Furthermore, labeling parts as 'demons' or 'signs of craziness' set up conflict between myself and the parts carrying the memories or who were speaking up. The internal conflict took energy that would have been better used on internal cooperation and healing.

Basically, at this stage, as programmers, we were testing if these three strategies – flat denial seemingly validated by prior amnesia, memories/parts being a sign of demonization, 'memories/parts' being a sign of craziness – would be enough to hinder any genuine engagement with healing work regarding clear and concrete memories of ritual abuse, for presenters with a Christian narrative.

The panic, while being a natural response from me, the previously amnesic daytime presenter, to the sudden horrors in my head, was also an anti-healing trigger itself. I had been programmed to subconsciously associate the panic with two sets of scenarios that I had experienced in the Illuminati programming studios. First, because I had believed that these voices were parts of my mind carrying true memories instead of realizing they were lying demons to be cast out, I had become completely deceived and was now in hell. The conscious panic was a reminder of how I had felt when I was in 'hell'. In the second scenario, because I erroneously believed that I had Dissociative Identity Disorder and real experiences of cult abuse, I had indeed ended up completely crazy. The conscious panic was a reminder of how I had felt when my family had to institutionalize me in a mental health institute where I was tortured relentlessly by other crazy patients and evil doctors. Both of these scenarios fostered sheer panic, which in turn, naturally prevented any thoughtful and self-compassionate curiosity or listening prayer regarding the veracity of the memories or the dissociation. As Elsa at that point, I had no idea what programming was or that I had been programmed. Instead, I attributed my panic solely to the fact that I was suddenly getting these incomprehensible, horrifying memories.

I am grateful that the prayer minister who worked with me had at least some knowledge of dissociation and deliverance. I was already feeling bad enough without being treated harshly or religiously, and due to my programming, would have been all too willing to believe Neil that parts were demons had he made that claim. He was courteous and empathetic towards Belial and the Gatekeeper. He did not preach at them, browbeat them with scriptures or common Christian platitudes, force them into decisions or tell them what to do. He asked questions, gave his thoughts gently, and offered more information.

Since then, I have heard so many stories of poorly-trained and ignorant deliverance ministers who are controlling, harsh and judgmental, and/or label dissociative parts "demons". Such behavior frankly constitutes spiritual or Christian abuse of the survivors, and should never happen.

I am angry when I look back at this week of terror and confusion that I as Elsa was put through. It was cruel to use me as a test subject for learning how to stop others from finding freedom. While my sudden awareness of cult memories and attendant emotional responses were all 'programmed' and ordered by the cult, my emotions – the pain, horror, terror, confusion – were completely real to me. These were the true feelings that I have always had, since I was a little girl in the cult, feelings that I had to dissociate away for the programmer's convenience and control. In this sense, much of the 'real me' was still present in this cult project to test programming which I eventually used as a platform for a genuine attempt to leave the cult. In other words, no matter how programmed a person is to not heal, they can still genuinely try to heal and leave the cult. The programming does make it harder because of the traumas involved, but it does not make it impossible.

I am also deeply sorry for my complicity as an adult in my own abuse and control, and the abuse and control of others. I recognize that this complicity was built on a lifetime of fear since I was in the womb, but the things I did were still wrong and hurt others. I more than regret working on projects to improve anti-healing and anti-Christian programming, and hope that this book and my other writings will be helpful now to others seeking freedom and healing, and those who support them in this process.

Chapter 24: Going Downhill

I am 33, and am back in my American presentation as Elsa. My presenter programming ensures that I believe that the couple of months over the past year I had spent the USA stretched seamless over the whole year. I remain unaware that I had spent time in other countries in other identities focusing on very different things, or that I am an active, highly trained, adult member of a cult that practices mind control of its members. Similarly, I remain unaware that I have genetically identical same-age sisters who at times took the role of 'Elsa' when I was in my different identities in other countries, or carrying out jobs directly for the cult.

As Elsa, the memories and symptoms of trauma are starting to feel like they are out of control. The dreams and the flashes of scenes in my head keep coming. I continue to find long entries in my journal that I don't remember writing. I am starting to realize that maybe some very bad things happened when I was a little girl. The nightmares at night are increasing. The worst thing, though, is that the more I pray, the worse I feel. Now I am getting really scared.

I am desperate. I want to see a psychiatrist, a licensed professional, someone with experience that goes beyond praying with people. After many calls, I make an appointment with one who works as a consultant with the county court system. His job is to conduct court ordered mental health assessments of defendants. This sounds good to me; the courts would not hire a psychiatrist who doesn't know what they are doing, I tell myself.

Two weeks later, I meet with the psychiatrist. He seems like a nice, pleasant man. I tell him about the nightmares, the scenes flashing through my mind, the voices talking. I take a deep breath, and ask him if he thinks it is possible that I am dissociative.

"Absolutely not," he tells me. "I have worked with many people who are dissociative, who have MPD (note: 'multiple personality disorder', a former term used for DID), and you are much too functional to have that diagnosis. You would not be able to work as a nurse, or be a mother to your family; you would be completely nonfunctional if that was the problem."

"Then what do you think is wrong with me?" I ask. I am desperate to know.

"I'm not sure, but you could be having some kind of trauma reaction, maybe repressed things coming forward."

I cringe when he says, 'repressed things coming forward'. The last thing I want is for my memories to be real.

"What do I do?" I ask, since this doesn't give me a clue about how to feel better and stop the panic.

"Well, take lots of rest when you can, maybe do something relaxing, like gardening, and try not to think about all of this too much."

Bloody hell, as if I want to think about this; I have been begging him and others to make it stop! I think.

I give this man another chance. At my next appointment, I tell him about my paternal grandmother taking me as a very young child of three to visit her friend who is a doctor. In my memory, the doctor leaned over me, and told me, "Don't worry, little girl, I won't hurt you."

He lied, and in the office, I scream and wail as I abreact the memory.

"Maybe you have PTSD," the psychiatrist says.

I go to the library, and check out several books on PTSD and its treatment. Each one of the books is more helpful than the psychiatrist, and I decide that I am not going back to him. I pick up the phone book to search for another professional.

I am also meeting once a week with Neil for deliverance and prayer. Numerous parts are coming out, and as quickly, go back in. I am very, very resistant to deliverance and having parts talk to me or others. Outside sessions with Neil, the memories keep coming, almost in a flood at times. When I journal, I start noticing that my handwriting changes dramatically at times, with warnings in a childish lettering such as “Stop talking to us, bitch!” and “I could kill you and you would never know, if you keep putting your nose into our secrets!” Warnings that seem to hold ominous threats of harm. But I don’t tell anyone about this journaling. They would think I was crazy. I wonder if I am.

I start swinging between denial and the possibility that my dreams, flashbacks and mysterious journal entries might be true.

I meet my new therapist. She is a Christian counselor who specializes in trauma therapy; I am hopeful that she will be able to help me. I share with her what had been happening over the past year.

“Oh, it’s normal to lose time, and not remember things that happen when you are upset,” she tells me. “And you aren’t the only person to have tough things happen, it happens to everyone. When I was two, my big brother pushed me down the stairs, almost killed me, and laughed when I was bleeding and screaming at the bottom of the stairs. And he used to kill animals in front of me, to make me cry. This happens to us all.”

I stare at her with huge eyes and am silent for the rest of the session. She continues to chatter on about not “blowing things out of proportion” that “everyone experiences”. That night, I tell my husband that I will not see this therapist again, and tell him why.

“You are just avoiding getting help,” he tells me. I disagree. I don’t want abuse normalized by my therapist.

I go through two other therapists. One is downright scary and wants to hypnotize me during the first session (I refuse), and the other is clueless about trauma. Then, I find a nurse practitioner, Heather, who seems to understand what she is doing. She spends two hours with me during the first session, getting to know me, and doesn’t act like I am crazy. Instead, she starts teaching me basic skills like grounding, containing things, and slowing things down. By the end of the session, I want to hug her. Many of her clients have dissociative identity disorder, then called MPD or multiple personality disorder, while others have varying degrees of PTSD due to trauma. She gives me a book to read by someone named Jim Friesen that talks about understanding MPD and its causes.

While I don’t think I have THAT problem – after all, a respected psychiatrist has told me it is impossible at my level of functioning – I read the first five chapters of the book and on a whim, decide to draw a house of my inner world as Friesen suggests in the book, just for fun.

The drawing I create shows a house with three levels and a basement, filled with people of varying ages. Tiny babies and toddlers tied into various torture devices and in boxes that look like coffins are in the basement, teens are on the third level, and lots of people in black hoods with knives fill the second level, to dozens of ordinary looking people on the top level, or what the outside world sees, with a door opening out to the outside world. Without knowing it, I have drawn a first crude system map. I break out in a sweat, terrified, when I look at it. Who and what are all of these people I drew? And why are there little babies and toddlers there? What does this mean? I have no idea.

I show it to Heather at my next appointment, and she says, “I think it is possible you have dissociation.”

I cannot work as a nurse anymore. Due to the overwhelming panic, I switched at work, lost time, and almost gave the same medication twice to a patient, not remembering I had just given them their meds. I catch myself in time, but I am deeply shaken. The next day, I give notice at work. I cannot and will not endanger others with my "problem", whatever the cause might be. I go onto workers' comp, and explain to the hospital liaison why I am not working, giving them the names of my psychiatrist and nurse practitioner. I fill out tons of paperwork and go home. The panic continues as I slog through each miserable day, trying to find a way to make it stop.

As Elsa, it truly felt like things were going downhill, and that nothing – not prayer or therapy – was helping. I was very glad at first that Heather was teaching me the skills to manage the memories and posttraumatic symptoms, but after a couple of weeks, it seemed that my memories and symptoms constantly overwhelmed my attempts to manage them. Losing my ability to work was itself terrifying and affirmed my fear that I was losing my mind. Things getting worse with prayer also affirmed my fear that I was somehow being misled by the demonic. My 'the more you try to heal, the worse it gets' program was running very effectively.

The messages that I received from most of the mental health professionals I reached out to only increased my fear and confusion. However, I did reject the second counselor's attempts to normalize my memories and symptoms. I knew that something was wrong, even if I couldn't yet accept that my memories might be true, or that I might be dissociative. It was easy for me to accept the psychiatrist's claim that I couldn't be dissociative if I was functional. Neither of us understood that I was functional because I was dissociative! Furthermore, other than the flood of memories and emotions, I told myself that I had none of the classic symptoms of dissociation. For instance, all of the clothes in my closet were similar. I never found mud on my shoes that I couldn't explain. My car never mysteriously had less gas in it in the morning than the night before. My sophisticated presenter programming (e.g., Alice in Wonderland, etc.) prevented any awareness of time lost or gaps in memory, and ensured that my temperament, behaviors and preferences remained consistent. I never deviated from my presenter profile. With pretty profound denial, I told myself that I never looked or sounded dissociative, ignoring the fact that I had seen my handwriting change many times in my journal, wrote journal entries that I didn't remember, and seemed to have other personalities in me pop out and talk with Neil. That everyone around me – my husband, best friends, children and closest colleagues – never noticed that I was ever 'different' reinforced my notion that I was not dissociative. I had no idea that they, too, were dissociative and mind controlled.

During this period, more than the actual content of the memories, it was the unremitting panic that made me feel absolutely wretched. It would not be an exaggeration to say that the constant panic was mental and emotional torture. This panic was, as described in the previous chapter, a programmed barrier against healing and internal communication. It was also the result of fearing punishment given by the other programmers between every appointment, or after any instance of remembering the cult or unauthorized communication between parts. The punishments – usually electroshock, stretching, spinning, being lowered into a pit filled with insects or snakes, gang rape, rape by animals and other forms of torture that leaves very little or no visible marks – were applied during meetings with the Illuminati programmers who were my colleagues on the anti-healing project.

At these meetings, as Ana the Illuminati programmer, I would show Elsa's journaling and drawings to the team for analysis and discussion. I and reporter parts inside would also share our insights and observations regarding how and why different parts were responding to attempts at remembering and healing. As I was carrying recording devices (unknown to Elsa) on me to all my appointments, we would also listen to and discuss the actions of Elsa and other parts at these appointments. We had placed two hidden cameras in Neil's office. These videos were reviewed in excruciating detail. My colleagues closely interviewed different parts in the system to ensure that they were disclosing everything that would be relevant to testing and improving our latest anti-healing programs. In particular, they wanted to know what parts who did try to heal were thinking as they did so, and their explanations for their actions and hopes. After each battery of comprehensive system assessments, all parts who had engaged in the healing work would be called out for punishments, then all parts who had remained 'good' would be rewarded. For instance, because Elsa was still in denial and refusing to talk with the parts who reached out to her, she was frequently rewarded with temporary cessation of the panic for a few days, and extra time to play with her children in a happy setting with plenty of hugs and affirmations of each other.

Since the goal was to assess the strength of anti-healing programming, after the punishments, my colleagues would give the non-cult presentation system, Elsa, a command to keep sincerely trying to heal. So, the miserable cycle continued: try to heal, then panic; try to heal, then panic. They observed over the year that Elsa could be pushed into a state of non-functionality by the dint of the torturous panic and confusion, but yet, she would still refrain from responding to parts talking to her, or engaging more deeply with her emerging memories. This finding suggesting that panic and confusion could be an effective barrier to healing for adults engaging in therapy and prayer ministry. The other six programmers who were field testers for the anti-healing programs were subjected to the same process. All of this made me feel sick inside, but none of us dared to do anything differently.

The content of these meetings was transmitted directly to the Jesuits via the technology we had hidden in the Illuminati facilities. I and the other Jesuit infiltrators on the team, including two of the field testers, would share our insights and recommendations with the Order. They conducted their own assessments on our systems as well. We were expected to report immediately to the Order if we started experiencing any real healing or loss of occultic power from the deliverance sessions, or any disloyalty is hinted at by parts. Mattheo and the other leaders in the Order were very pleased about being able to gather information useful for improving our own anti-healing programs.

Nonetheless, there was much that my Illuminati colleagues and Jesuit brothers did not know: I truly, truly wanted to heal and to be free, and this project was only making me determined to really try. Sometime over the past year, Ana and several other parts inside had started to secretly use the information gained to consider breaking their programming, healing, and escaping the cult. All their assessments failed to reveal this fact because parts were cooperating to lie to both cults, and put forth the correct readings for brain scans and other tests. This was a sign that despite being active in the cult and running our anti-healing programming on a more surface level, at a deeper level we were already defying our programming to be unfailingly loyal and compliant. It was terrifying to consider freedom, but I was so tired of a life of being hurt and controlled, and of hurting and controlling others; I was coming to a place where I knew that I just would not be able to do it anymore. The hint that freedom might be possible, the growing knowledge that I was gaining on how to address mind control and the fact that there were people out there who cared enough to want to help – all this combined to give me just enough hope to want to try.

Furthermore, my own encounters and the encounters of the other field testers with a kind and loving God during a few prayer ministry sessions was creating hope. While we were constantly being reprogrammed to discard and doubt these experiences, and to pray to other beings or internal parts even when the front parts were apparently praying to 'Jesus' or 'God the Father', it was unmistakable at times that He could and did want to help. He was not condemning us despite our duplicitous data-gathering mission, and our history of satanism and violence. My heart had been always been stirred by the stories I had heard of God showing his love to cult members. Now that I had been experiencing moments of His love for myself, I wanted to be free and know Him more.

"Well, what do you think, Danny?" I burst out. "I've had a hell of an assignment the past few weeks; trying to make the leadership in San Diego and the leadership here happy, and everyone has their own agenda. The only one they don't care about making happy is…me." There, I've said it. I've actually shared what I really feel, dangerous as this is.

I then ask Danny, my beloved brother, the one who understands me best of all, a question of my own. "Danny, don't you ever wish, that things could be…different?"

He looks sideways at me. "How do you mean, different?"

"That we all could have more times like this, and not because we desperately need R & R, or are checking out what someone is privately thinking." I look into his eyes, knowing that much as my brother loves me, he is under orders, too.

Danny bursts out laughing. "Of course, we all feel that way," he says. "But most of us don't have the courage to be quite that direct." My brother is nothing if not honest, too, one of the things I love about him.

"What if we do?" I ask him. "What happens to us then?"

He looks troubled, as he stirs the fire with a stick. "I don't know," he finally answers.

I wonder what he will tell Mattheo about this conversation.

I get my answer the day we come back. Mattheo reiterates that I will be working in the main facility for a year, and administrating the training school for our six- to twelve-year-old children as well. The other leaders have decided that spending extra time with the children at the facility, the children I love so much, will help keep my heart – and my loyalty – firmly attached to Rome. I love hearing the laughter of the children as they come down the hall, calling out "Father Luke!" with delight, rushing to greet me. I take a special interest in one of the classes now in its fifth year in the school. This class has the brightest group of children the school has ever seen, and they all have exceptional theta skills. I am the primary attachment figure for several in this class, and am helping to mentor the others. I hug the children, and listen with genuine interest as they tell me about what they are learning, and about some of the new projects they are planning.

Additionally, besides my strategic roles as a general in the Order and occasional jobs as a 33, I remain busy as a programmer and scientist. Paralleling my work in the Illuminati, using the data stolen from different occult groups and our own data, I collaborate with Mattie and two others to improve the Order's anti-Christian and anti-healing programming. Every story that comes in of cult members receiving help from God during prayer ministry sessions shakes my denial of God's goodness. Every story of parts trying to think independently when confronted with curiosity and genuine human kindness during therapy shakes my belief in the insidious power of trauma-based mind control from infancy. But I hide my longing for God, truth and freedom close to my heart, and continue being the 'perfect' Jesuit father.

After a year of extreme busyness and extensive checks of my systems by my programmers, Mattheo and the other fathers are convinced of my loyalty. We decide that it is time for me to continue my infiltration of the Illuminati. Over the past year, Lizzie and my two other sisters have taken the role of Elsa and Ana in the USA. Twice a month, Elsa has been seeing Jim Friesen, a therapist with experience working with DID. She has not returned to nursing but has been teaching kindergarten and first grade at her children's Christian school. Ana has continued to hold the trainers' chair on the Western regional council, and has been working hard as an Illuminati programmer. In the programming studios, I undergo updates to the memories of my Elsa and Ana parts so that we can seamlessly slip back into these roles upon reaching the USA, with no gaps in our timelines, and no memory of Rome.

This chapter shows how well the Jesuits understand the importance of love, attachment and belonging for maintaining loyalty. We did truly love each other in the Order, even though our love was constrained by the constant need to control each other in order to fulfill Satan's agendas. Nonetheless, the love and belonging, parceled out under the conditions of total mind control and the subjugation of our own consciences to carry out inhumane acts, could never really meet my human needs. Rather than increasing my loyalty and decreasing my desire for a different life, this year only increased my desire to be free. The moments of encountering God's love while posing as a survivor wanting to heal had reminded me of what true love really is. However, I did not know how I could possibly pay the price of leaving. I knew that if I tried, Satan would take out his vengeance on my loved ones. They themselves, out of their own fears and conditioning, would reject me and obey Satan's orders to crush attempts my follow God and be free. I had experienced this when I was 14 years old, and I was, at this point, convinced that I could not take that risk again.

Chapter 26: Project Alexis

During the year in Rome, the Order had started a critical new project that the Jesuits called Project Alexis. Its overarching goal is control over every aspect of society globally and to this end, the project has three areas. The first area is security: the assignment of a digital ID to every human being on earth, and developing the capabilities for monitoring each person with hardware and software. The second project area involves the digitalization of all financial transactions around the world. While this is the early 90s, the technologies to implement this have been developed and tested secretly for many decades, and only need refining. The third area is behavioral, seeking to use mass media technologies to reshape social conduct and norms globally in order to prepare the way for the new world order.

One means of tech-mediated social control the project focuses on are subliminals. These have been fed to the public through television since the 1950s. The coming phases involve an exponential increase in reach through new technologies to be rolled out every few years: cell phones, personal computers, the Internet, video games, online games, and more. In the future, everyone will have access to a constant stream of interactive information through many types of technologies priced to be accessible to a very wide swath of the population. We are therefore now preparing the subliminals that can fully exploit the coming technologies for widespread dissemination. Our social goal is unspeakably wicked; the subliminals are designed to shift perceptions and beliefs – albeit slowly, for human beings are slow to change – to bring about dark agendas: racism; anti-Semitism; the desire for a new world order; the desire to get rid of the 'nuisance' of paper and coin currency and go digital; the longing for a courageous world leader who will bring peace; the desire to break down the previous norms of decent sexual behavior; the acceptance of every form of sexual deviance, including pedophilia and bestiality; an acceptance and admiration for lawlessness; and complete breakdown of the family unit and any sense of underlying religion or morality.

The third area of tech-mediated social control is the purview of myself and the other trainers, since we are the experts on human behavior. Other important team members include the fathers and students talented in the skills needed to develop and test the technologies to be used. A large portion of our work is dedicated to designing the characters who will be the speakers for the new world order: Alexis (female) and Alex (male). The images of Alexis and Alex are composites of many nationalities. We are testing several variations of the images on people from every nation on the earth, and every age group, to see which ones engender the most trust and acceptance. At the same time, we are trying to engineer their voices. Again, these voices are composites of how different peoples in different regions speak, and have been synthesized carefully together with the aim of stirring a sense of harmony, balance and security in the listeners. These voices are tested again and again for acceptability and trustworthiness in different populations across the world.

The plan is that over the next few decades, Alexis and Alex will continually feature in visual and aural subliminals globally, telling and showing people that the new world leader will take care of them, and that all will be well when he takes power. This will condition people around the world to trust the 'Light of the World' that Satan has promised us would come soon, when he rises to take global leadership in a time of international unrest and crises like global famine and plagues. During the unveiling of the Light of the World, the subliminals and media directly featuring Alexis and Alex will also be used to reassure those who are afraid and overwhelmed what to do, and why they should not fear the changes occurring in their nation or the world.

My work on Project Alexis is another source of sorrow and regret. I hate how the Order and the other occult societies have used underhanded techniques to influence people, and diminish their rights and choices. It has been hard for me to believe at first that God could forgive me for such wicked work, but I have since learned that He really does. The deployment of subliminals over television and the Internet is one reason why I very rarely watch television and minimize my use of online devices such as my cell phone and laptop. It is also why I think that children and teenagers in particular should have as little exposure to online devices as possible, and that online gaming and online classes should not be their primary source of entertainment or education.

I do note that subliminals are limited in their ability to influence: they cannot acutely transform a person's personality, character or values, or "program" them in the manner that this term is used in mind control. For instance, a person raised to value honesty and hard work will not suddenly start to resent having to work from 9-5, five days a week, even after 20 hours of watching MASH reruns on TV. Their ability to shift social values is contingent on many hours of exposure of over many years, paired with an absence or lack of counter-input from society, family, school, and the faith community. For this reason, the occult societies have also accompanied subliminal with strategies to shift social values and norms in more explicit and blatant ways: social movements, movies, TV shows, music, video and online games, books and comics, education curriculums spanning kindergarten to graduate programs, legislation, religious reforms, and more.

Chapter 27: Leaving the Illuminati

Another year passes and I am 39 years old. In the Illuminati, as Ana, I continue working on Jonathan's team for testing and improving the anti-healing programming. By all appearances, in my case, the programming and the adjustments we are make to it are working well: Elsa and other parts try very hard to share memories and heal, but remain severely constrained by denial and horrible panic. None of them disclose any high security memories or information, i.e., the truths that Elsa is an active and competent adult member of an organized occult society, and that her ritual abuse did not happen only when she was an infant and toddler. Jim Friesen, her current Christian therapist, seems convinced that Elsa is sincerely trying to heal.

"Looks like you might be off the hook soon," Taurus, another programmer on the team, comments after we review my data at a meeting in spring.

My heart sinks slightly at his statement. A few of the other field testers had already stopped going for therapy or prayer ministry as we were satisfied with the findings from their experiences. Unlike them, though, I did not want to stop. My desire for true healing and freedom has continued to grow. I know I need to be allowed to keep trying to heal.

"The data has been at a saturation point for the past twelve weeks," I reply. That is, we were not finding or learning anything new for three months because my system seemed to have settled into a steady and predictable balance of trying to heal and self-punishing for healing according to programming parameters. "But it would still be too soon for me to stop."

The team waits for my explanation. While I am not the project leader, the team respects me because I am the head trainer on the Western regional council in the USA.

I continue calmly and clinically, "We have not been able to completely stop Elsa from having unauthorized nightmares, or from having times when her panic increases when she looks at her children. Both of these things should not still be happening." I look around at my colleagues, "We should not stop my testing until we have controlled these two situations."

From the head of the table, Jonathan frowns at me. He has resented me for many years because I do not pander to his ego, and I have called him out many times for unnecessary cruelty. Jonathan is a gifted programmer but he is no team player. I can see that he is tempted to say "no" simply out of spite. However, he is concerned about getting the best outcomes from the project, and so is reluctantly considering my recommendation.

Freya, with whom I've always had a good relationship, speaks up. "Exploring how to control these situations will likely involve subjecting your system to a significant amount of additional stress." In other words, finding out just how much more scientifically applied torture would be needed prevent the unauthorized nightmares or patterns of panic without destabilizing the rest of the system.

Jonathan smirks a little, and I wish that it was acceptable to slap him.

"I trust that this team would be able to manage the stress on my system," I say, then reiterate my main point. "The two situations more than strongly suggest there are still weaknesses in the programming that we need to understand and resolve."

The frown returns to Jonathan's face, and I know I cannot say more. Something in his expression tells me that he is troubled by my recommendation. I suspect his instincts are telling him that there is more to my desire to continue 'trying to heal' than merely testing the programming, but he has no evidence with which to accuse me.

"Fine." Jonathan decides. "We'll keep Elsa 'healing' for two more months, focus on controlling her dreams and panic, then you're off. It will be more useful to have data from other subjects now."

The two months pass tumultuously for Elsa. She continues seeing Friesen twice a month, and trying very hard to heal while parenting and dealing with panic. The programming team works hard these two months to figure out how to inflict enough self-perpetuating pain and terror on her system to stop unauthorized dreams and panic. As Ana, I am experiencing a different kind of panic as I secretly struggle to come up with plans for leaving the Illuminati with my family, and finding healing for us. Deeper inside, as Luce, I am torn between wanting to leave the Jesuits, and fearing the price of doing so.

By the end of the two months, the Illuminati programmers have managed to reduce Elsa's dreams somewhat, but she still panics at times when she looks at her children. Jonathan orders me to stop testing my anti-healing programs. The team, to my frustration, is in agreement with him. Some of them, I suspect, frankly feel a little sorry about the amount of torture I am receiving. Others genuinely feel that it would be more useful to test with other subjects, then use the knowledge gained from them to circle back to me for adjusting my programming. To close my field test, the plan is to program Elsa to believe that she has 'healed' and 'no longer needs to work on this stuff from my past', then reinitiate the full amnesia barriers around Elsa so she no longer hears parts or gets memories. I flatly refuse, and the meeting ends very poorly.

That evening, I receive a call from Rome over our secure devices. Another Jesuit infiltrator in the Illuminati has called a men's meeting at church to keep Chuck out of the house for a few hours so I can speak freely as Luce. The faces of Mattheo, Mattie, Lizzie, Conner and a few other leaders and close friends show up on my computer monitor, since the capabilities for this type of interaction has been available for many years within the Order. To access it, I enter codes to access a hidden hard drive with faster processing speeds and memory on my simple 'home computer'.

"What is going on, Luce?" Mattheo asks. "We had not discussed or agreed that Ana would defy Jonathan on this matter." He gives me a scrutinizing look; all the fathers on the call do. Unlike the Illuminati, the Jesuits know that I had once become a Christian, and had tried to truly heal and abscond.

"Ana can't stop now." I am trying to give as much as the truth as I possibly can without bringing the wrath of Satan and the fathers down on my head. Mattheo and the others know me so well that the larger the portion of untruth in my responses, they more likely they are to detect that I am dissimulating.

"We need to more rigorously test the Illuminati anti-healing programming over a longer period of time because any weakness in these programs has the potential to negatively affect our infiltration and control of them," I point out very truthfully and continue, "If the Illuminati systems in any of our agents heal because their anti-healing programs have flaws, then their Illuminati system may discover the Jesuit systems and programs deeper within and so compromise us."

Chapter 25: Back to Rome

Four weeks after Elsa, my American presentation had to stop working as a nurse, I am back in Rome as Luce, my Jesuit presenter. As usual, to keep the Illuminati from noticing my absence, my sister Lizzie fills in for me as Elsa. She, rather than one of my other genetically identical sisters takes over for me this time, since she herself is a very skilled programmer and could continue to give us good data from the Illuminati anti-healing projects. It is a relief to be back home, and to have a break from Elsa's constant panic and the exhausting, torturous cycle of attempting to heal and punishment. Nonetheless, my growing desire for freedom makes me feel a little on edge. I know it will be harder to hide this desire from others in the Order, because of how well they know me, and their deep access to all parts of my system. I had been successful in hiding it so far, but I can't help but remain a little anxious that I might end up revealing how much I really want help to stop my programming and escape their control.

While I can't think of any hints that I might have given the fathers that my commitment is wavering, a conversation I had with Mattheo and Mattie the day before has heightened my concern.

"I'm worried that testing the Illuminati anti-healing programming is wearing you out," Mattheo had said, "You are not going back to America for a year. You need a break. Lizzie and your sisters can fill in."

Mattie, my best friend and primary programmer when I was an infant and young child, adds somewhat incongruously and bluntly, "Remember what believing the Jesus shit did to you when you were 14." I well remember those traumas that occurred after I first believed in Jesus. But even deeper, buried deep inside, is also a knowing that this Jesus offered me the only real love without strings attached or manipulation, that I had ever experienced in my life.

Before I start back to work in the Rome facility, Mattheo has my twin brother Danny and I take a 3-day vacation together. I know that this vacation with the person I love most on earth next to Mattheo is not a reward. Rather, it is so that Danny can assess how the "healing" work in America has impacted my systems, and to discover if I am thinking of escaping. Mattheo's sharp, discerning eyes have picked up subtle signs of restlessness in me. I am frustrated because I am unsure what these signs that Mattheo has noticed are, but I am glad to spend time with Danny. Mattheo has another reason for this time with my brother: he wants us to renew and re-forge the already strong bonds of love between us. There is no greater cure for "restlessness" than the deep desire to be with those we love most. Danny will remind me of how much I love him and others in the Order.

It is beautiful on the lake in northern Italy where Danny and I sail together to an isolated, pine-covered point jutting out on its northern side. We are laughing, because this brother who looks identical to me other than his short goatee beard, slightly broader shoulders and tapered waist, has a wonderful, wicked sense of humor. He is filling me in on some of the latest events at the facility.

When we approach the site we will camp at, we fall silent, overcome by the beauty that surrounds us here. That night, as we roast bread and cheese over a camp fire, we talk about ourselves. "How have you been, really?" Danny asks. "I've been worried about you. You've lost weight, and your eyes look stressed."

I point out another concern, “They have not been able to establish why Ana continues to have unauthorized nightmares and panic, or fully control it. We know this means that her systems are somehow keeping something hidden from the team, or that the parts themselves really do not know why their programming is not running perfectly. If the Illuminati can’t ensure that the amnesia and other programs are running correctly in their agents with fronts parts who are trying to heal, and they can’t even assess them properly, then these agents may compromise our infiltrators. For instance, one of them might not respond correctly to amnesia triggers we give and so notice that a file in their computer system has been changed, or that there are a few different individuals fronting as a particular Illuminati agent”.

We discuss these two and other concerns I raise. All through the conversation, Mattheo, Mattie, Lizzie and Danny observe me very closely.

Mattheo pauses and looks evenly at me. “I love you, son.” His eyes brim with gentleness and love. He then speaks firmly, “Give glory to God.” This is a command to tell the truth that I had been programmed with since infancy.

“Tell me the truth.” Matteo continues explicitly. He goes to the heart of the matter with this terse question, “Why do you want to continue on this project?”

My chest squeezes and tears spring into my eyes, “Because I love Rome.” I look around at all the faces on the monitor. I have known everyone of them all my life. “Because I love you.”

I am telling the truth. I know they will interpret my statement as an affirmation of loyalty to the Order and Satan’s agendas. But what I mean is this: It is because I love you, it is because I love all the fathers, because I love all our children, that I cannot bear to be part of this evil anymore. I do not want to keep living a life where we hurt each other and do hurtful things to others together. It is because I love you that I am going to see if it is possible to try to break free, so we all might have a chance for freedom. This is for you, because I love you.

They respond, “I love you too.”

Mattheo and Mattie confer offscreen briefly. When they return, Mattheo tells me that I have permission to let Ana keep Elsa trying to heal for one more year. I hide my sigh of relief. The higher-ranking Jesuit infiltrators in the Illuminati will ensure that Jonathan will not be able to actually stop Ana, whatever fuss he makes. When the call is over, I sink onto the edge of my bed. One more year. It is not a lot of time.

Back in the USA, as Ana, I continue to field test Elsa’s anti-healing programs. I, of course, have no memory of the Jesuit cult presenter’s meeting with Matteo and the other fathers. Jonathan is furious, but I ignore his orders to stop. Elsa continues seeing Friesen, journaling and engaging in other healing work. Between sessions, Jonathan and another programmer severely torture Elsa and any parts trying to heal, and install updates to the anti-healing programs. As Jonathan is extremely offended, he is excessively and appallingly vicious in his programming work.

Lizzie and my sisters, who present as Ana and Elsa when I am doing other jobs for the Order, are very exasperated by this situation.

“Luce,” Lizzie tells me darkly one day in the dining hall when she is back in Rome after a stint as Ana and Elsa. “I will be very glad when this year is over. Maybe you enjoy being a martyr for science, but I don’t.”

I smile sheepishly at her. I think, Maybe it’ll be over sooner for you than you expect.

I am fronting as Elsa in the USA. I am talking with my therapist, Jim Friesen. He is known for working with dissociation, and his friendly and nonjudgmental demeanor has had numerous parts coming out and talking with him. I have finally started to learn to communicate with parts, and while it still bewilders and frightens me, we are journaling to each other and having internal conversations. As I start listening to parts, I also start to understand what ‘programming’ is, and that I have ‘programming’. Both Friesen and I are pleased with my progress, despite the ongoing struggle with panic.

Today I start by asking him: “Is it normal to have dreams about being shocked with electricity all over?”

He replies, “I have never heard of this before from anyone I have worked with.”

I breathe deeply then blurt out, “I need to go inpatient to be safe; I think I have a lot of suicide programming inside that would fire off if I work too hard to get information from parts inside. My systems would destabilize.”

“I have only had one client in my many years of practice go inpatient. I usually don’t recommend it,” Friesen demurs.

“Well, I need this,” I tell him firmly. “I will be your second referral to inpatient,”

At this point, I have accepted memories of intermittent ritual abuse for the first three years of life by my biological father and paternal grandmother. The memories, to my relief, indicate that the abuse stopped when my mother divorced my father. Nonetheless, my journaling and conversations with parts reveals a large, organized system of parts inside. My denial programming and amnesia keep me from noticing the incongruence between there ‘only’ being ritual abuse in my first three years of life, and my having a very complex and highly organized poly-fragmented system of parts. Likewise, I do not notice that my concern about suicide programming is incompatible with only having ritual abuse before I was three years old. None of my parts explain to me that it is highly unlikely that any programming team could successfully install suicide programming - a complex program that defies the human instinct for self-preservation – in a child less than three years old, and have this program be intact 33 years later with no retuning or reinforcement in between.

To my extreme frustration and distress, the panic continues. In fact, the harder I work to heal, the worse it gets. I can’t understand it. I am doing everything that the books and counselors say are supposed to help, and none of the techniques they recommend help. This is why I want to go inpatient. I hope that the time dedicated to healing, with supportive staff, might start to turn things around for me.

Reluctantly, Friesen tells me about a counselor he knows who has an inpatient unit for treating dissociative disorders in Texas. Over the next two weeks, I create a plan for the work I will do while inpatient for two weeks, and he makes the referral. I contact this unit to make arrangements and provide my insurance information.

A week later, I get a phone call from a stranger

“Is this Elsa?” asks a male voice.

“Yes, it is,” I reply. “Who am I talking with?”

“My name is Roland (a pseudonym), I am the husband of your friend Pamela (also a pseudonym).”

Pamela is a friend I made while in therapy for a few weeks at a trauma unit in southern California a year ago. She was working hard to heal from governmental mind control and ritual abuse. We were roommates within the trauma center, and I had really liked her. During the month we were there, we had both supported and cheered each other on in our healing work.

She had shared a pretty horrible story about her husband that occurred during a weekend pass that she spent with him. “We were driving along a road,” she told me, her large eyes blinking, “and then he told me to look inside the dashboard container. I opened it up, and there was a loaded gun sitting there. I looked over at him, and then he told me ‘feel free to use this anytime.’ I think he wants me to kill myself, because I am remembering too much.”

I believed her. Pamela had come back visibly upset and shaken from her visit.

Pamela had shared something else with me. “I went to a dissociative disorders unit in Texas,” she said, “They were the only one that had a clue and were helpful to me in my healing work.” This was the same unit that I was scheduled to spend two weeks at.

I ask Roland, “How is Pamela doing?” I haven’t heard from her in months, and have wondered if she was okay. I am also very surprised that her husband, who I don’t know at all, is calling me.

“She’s dead,” Roland says. “Those people in Texas killed her. She came up to the upper peninsula with me after being inpatient there, and she killed herself. I stepped out for a few hours, and when I came back to our cabin, she was dead. It was those people in Texas. DO NOT GO THERE. They drive people crazy there.”

I am flabbergasted. “Thank you for the warning,” I say. “I will consider what you are telling me.” I hang up the phone.

I am furious. I do not believe for a minute that the people in Texas killed her. I know, with everything in me, that Roland had left a loaded revolver with Pamela after giving her a command to use it to fatal effect. I am more determined than ever to go to Texas. For if a sleazeball like Roland is trying to warn me away, they must do something good. I do not wonder how I know, or at least, why I believe that Roland had given Pamela a command to use the gun on herself, considering that I have not come across such things in the scant information I have found on mind control and programming.

It is a week later, and I am in north central Texas. I am surprised to see people walking by at the DFW airport who actually do wear Stetson hats and cowboy boots; I thought that was all just stuff people did in movies. It seems so…country…after southern California.

“I’m scared,” I tell my husband. He has flown with me to support me. I have a huge fear of hospitals, of being locked in and never being let out. I don’t realize that this is programming to prevent my ever going for mental health care. Instead, I think there must be something wrong with me, to be this frightened.

My husband drives the rental car to the small hospital in a suburb of Dallas. I fill out the paperwork and then go through the initial assessment, which consists of lots and lots of very personal questions. What surprises me is that I am answering some of the questions with a German accent. I have never been to Germany in my life and this accent frightens me. After the intake, where I am carefully checked for physical scars and injuries as a baseline, my husband tells me goodbye. I am terrified, shaking a bit, but I bring the few items I am allowed – clothes, but no belts or jewelry or items that I could harm myself with; no journals with wire binding – and enter the unit.

The staff are pleasant, but the unit is noisy. Apparently, someone is having a yelling match with a staff member, screaming at them "You're an idiot!" and calling them names.

I quietly go far around the area where the altercation is occurring, led by another staff member who shows me my room and tells me the rules of the unit. She gives me a schedule that shows when groups meet, and tells me, "You will be meeting with your assigned therapist tomorrow in the afternoon. Her name is Julie" (note: not her real name).

The next morning, I join my first group, one about family systems. It is interesting to learn about family dysfunction and how it can impact people. I think back on my American family, and realize that they are dysfunctional indeed. Even without the ritual trauma during my earliest childhood, there is plenty to work on.

It is mid-afternoon, and I am meeting in a private office off the unit with Julie. She is young and pretty, with intelligent eyes and a kind manner. We greet each other, talk a bit about how long she has worked there, why she entered this field, and how I feel about being on the unit, then she gets down to business. What she says next floors me.

"I want to meet the people inside who run things," she says.

"You can't," I respond. "I have violent protectors who would hurt you first. My system is very guarded, and will not allow that kind of entry." Inside, I am thinking Violent protectors? Who are they? What system? What the heck?

"I don't care. I want to meet the boss inside." She is persistent.

"I can't let you. The VPs would hurt you to prevent that," my voice replies. I feel far away as this conversation goes on.

Julie keeps insisting that she wants the "boss" to come out, VPs or no VPs. She is pushing hard.

I look at her. "I don't want to hurt you," I say. "If I do what you ask, I will have to hurt you."

"Let the boss behind come forward anyway," she insists yet again.

I try, and then suddenly without volition, I grab her pencil and stab her in the chest. I am horrified, as she screams then leaves the room, asking for help.

"It's my fault, I pushed her too hard, she warned me," I hear Julie at the nurse's station, as she tells the head therapist on the unit what happened. "She must have had a psychotic snap."

I am still in the room, crying, curled up in a ball. What kind of terrible person am I, that I did such a horrible thing to someone who was just trying to help me?

A staff member comes and gets me, and puts me in an isolation room, a room that is reserved for the very unstable. But a flicker of thought comes through my head: why did she push so hard? I tried to warn her, and she just didn't listen to me. Did she not believe me – and why not?

It is two hours later, and the unit director and psychiatrist are both meeting with me. I tell them my side of the event and finish with, "I tried to warn her, I really did."

The director is kind, but firm. "Yes, you did, she told us about what happened. But we can't risk you harming someone like this."

I start crying again, and I tell them, "Then ask your therapists to listen to people when they say back off, don't keep pushing."

The clinical director and psychiatrist both look at me, and the psychiatrist says, "You are still cult active. This wasn't just three years of sporadic abuse during the first three years of your life."

I look at him without comprehension. "That's impossible. It can't be true."

"This is too fresh, your response too reactive, for it to have happened 33 years ago," he replies.

I look at both men, and being to shake. I shake as if I am having seizures, from head to toe; I feel as if I am breaking apart. "Oh my God!" I say. "Oh my God, it's true." The floodgates open as parts start giving me flashes of cult activities throughout my life. "I need some medicine for panic, I feel like I'm having a nervous breakdown," I say. "And please, tell Julie I am so sorry for what happened. I really didn't want to hurt her."

I am given medication to help calm the sheer terror coursing through my body. I am in the isolation room. I have a journal that is bound without wires, and I am journaling rapidly. It is all coming out: my cult name, my husband's cult name, my children's cult names, and what we were doing out in San Diego. For the first time in my life, I remember that I am also 'Ana'. I have also signed a contract that I will not attack any other therapists, one of the conditions of being allowed to stay on the unit. I have also been reassigned to a different therapist, a middle-aged man, one with extensive experience working with this type of trauma.

That evening, I call my husband in San Diego.

"I love you," he says as soon as he hears my voice.

"I love you, too," I reply. "But I have something I need to tell you."

I then tell him what I have been remembering, how we are both cult active, and the children are as well because of us. He listens, then says in an angry tone, "I don't remember anything like this!"

"But it's true!" I reply. "You know I'm not a liar. Please, pray about this," I plead.

"Maybe you need to leave that place," he replies.

But I know that I need time to hear what my parts inside are telling me, as I journal. I have already filled half a notebook today alone.

The next day, an EEG tech comes to give me an EEG. The psychiatrist over the unit likes to use this test to rule out any residual intracranial damage from abuse. As the tech applies electrodes to my scalp, I start shaking and then start screaming. I apologize, saying, "I'm sorry, but I can't let you do this. It's bringing something up in me that I can't handle right now." The tech is nice, accepts my apology, and takes the electrodes off, to my great relief.

I go back to the isolation room, and journal. I create a map covered with words like "alpha", "beta" "gamma" "delta" "epsilon" "theta". I have no idea of what the words mean, but somehow, I know this information is important.

I meet with the psychiatrist, John (not his real name) and apologize for being unable to have an EEG. I then show him my diagram, and ask him, “Have you ever heard of this kind of thing before?”

He looks, and then says, “No, I can’t say that I have.”

I ask, “What do I do?”

He says, “Keep writing. Maybe you will find out. Someone in there knows what it means.”

That night, a part journals that these are brainwaves, and that I have programming linked to them. I meet with my newer, older therapist the next morning. I show him the diagrams and what I have journaled about them. “My parts say I have brainwave programming,” I tell him. “How do I undo it?”

“You need to get in touch with your parts, let them share their memories, abreact the traumas.”

“How do I do that, and stay stable?” I ask.

“You need to find that answer from inside,” he replies.

I feel completely frustrated. I have no idea how to do the things he is recommending. My panic levels are at an all-time high as I journal and parts share more and more about my life in the Illuminati on the west coast. It is becoming evident to me that it will not be safe for me to go back to San Diego. If what my parts are telling me is true, my life there has not been at all what I thought it was, and I am involved in some terrible activities. There is one thing that I do know, though. I cannot continue doing these activities, and I must find a way to stop.

The Illuminati had not wanted me to go inpatient at this hospital at all. I had made my own arrangements for admission in direct defiance to Jonathan. Hence the phone call from Roland and news of Pamela’s death, all arranged by him. The Order, behind the scenes, ensured that my admission would happen as this was within the one-year period of testing my Illuminati anti-healing programming that Mattheo and Mattie had authorized. That day at the hospital in Desoto, Texas in 1996 was the first major turning point of my healing journey. Ana took the plunge to ignore the internal security, denial, and amnesia barriers in order to share with Elsa the truth about life in San Diego.

As Ana, three things led to my decision to finally break free from the Illuminati: my growing weariness with life in the cult, my desire to be free, and the knowledge and compassion shown by the unit director and psychiatrist. The ability of these two men to accurately state that my programming was fresh and there was no way that Elsa’s abuse happened 33 years ago made me feel like there was some hope to receive competent help from the unit. Even more importantly, their decision to not make me leave granted me the safety I would need to be able to keep downloading memories to Elsa and increase our internal cooperation. Without the safety and separation from other cult agents afforded by being inpatient, I knew I would not be able to establish the beachhead of healing I needed for leaving the cult. If they had made me leave according to their usual application of rules, I would not have made the decision I made on that day to start working together inside and leave the Illuminati.

I will also note that time was a factor. It was six years between Elsa first getting her memories of ritual abuse and mind control and Elsa/Ana deciding to take the step to fully heal and leave the Illuminati, and ten years between Ana first working on the anti-healing commission and taking her own steps to get free.

Unfortunately, while my Illuminati system was genuinely trying to get free, they were still completely amnesic to the group I really belonged to, one whose members I was most deeply bonded to: the Jesuit Order. Luke, my Jesuit cult presenter, was ambivalent about leaving because of the pain of previous failures to get free, and the threat to loved ones. The internal conflict and partial commitment to healing and freedom created a situation in which it was inevitable that I would not be able to truly break free at this time.

Chapter 28: Illuminati Punishment

By the end of the first week in the hospital as Elsa, I know that two weeks will not be enough. I arrange for another four weeks, and present to my therapists a plan for healing work that parts share with me. A few days before discharge, a beautiful box of 12 red roses arrives for me. With the box is a card from my husband: Please know that I love you, and am sorry for being so controlling. I will try to stop being such a control freak. I don't want to control you anymore, and will try to let go of control. Love, Chuck.

He had underlined every instance of the word "control" every time, and double underlined it two times. I show my therapist the card, and ask, "Do you think the word control is supposed to trigger something in me?"

My therapist just looks at me, and asks, "What do you think?"

"I think it does," I reply. "I think the red roses are also supposed to mean something, but I'm not sure what, yet." I wonder how to deal with this situation; I doubt that normal marriage counseling has any strategies for addressing cult triggers from a spouse.

Whatever the roses were meant to trigger, through the six weeks of hard work on healing and internal communication, I resist the pull to return to San Diego after discharge. Instead, I rent an apartment with another survivor, and go to outpatient treatment daily. Parts are creating inside round tables to facilitate communication between systems, and trying to decide what steps we should take to stay safe and build a new life. I am meeting all kinds of parts, and they all want to get out and get free. They try to plan what to do, and how to do it. When I am not in outpatient therapy, I am journaling, collaging and trying to open up every avenue of communication possible with inside parts.

The Illuminati, naturally, are furious. My extension of my hospital stay and refusal to return to San Diego, and my system sharing current cult activity and programming with the non-cult presenter, Elsa, and with the hospital staff, have convinced them that I am actually truly trying to heal and leave the cult.

At night, without my conscious awareness, I am getting calls on the phone, ordering me to come back to San Diego. There are knocks at the door as well, but I don't answer them. The door is opened anyway, and rough hands wake me up, and say, "Come back, or else your children will pay for your disobedience." I wake up with panic each morning this happens, without knowing what caused the panic. Nonetheless, parts and I continue journaling to each other, and the increasingly dire unfolding picture affirms to me that I cannot return. It also makes me increasingly desperate to get my children to safety.

A week after discharge, I call Chuck. "Hi," I say, as he answers the phone.

"When are you coming home?" he demands angrily. "The kids and I miss you."

"I know, but I don't feel safe coming back, unless you and I get marriage counseling first," I tell him. "I want you to fly out here, and meet with one of the therapists here."

There is a long pause.

"All right. I will come out on Thursday, two weeks from today," he tells me. "I'll bring the kids with me."

I am ecstatic. My husband is willing to get help. Maybe things will turn out okay. I am unaware that Ana, who understands how the cult works better than I do, is very skeptical that things will turn out ok. Nonetheless, there is nothing either of us can do to force him to bring the kids, and we can only pray.

The day comes. There is a knock comes on the door. I open it in excitement, expecting to see Chuck and my three children. But it is a policeman. He is serves me with two sets of paper: papers filing for divorce, signed by my husband, and a restraining order. With disbelief, I read the restraining order. It says I am not allowed to come within 1000 feet of my children, or I will go to jail.

I call my husband. "What are these papers, filing for divorce and a restraining order?" I yell into the phone. "What is the meaning of this? You said you would come and meet with my therapist and I today, and instead, I get – this! Why didn't you come? You promised me."

My husband responds in a monotone voice, "It's not safe there."

"What do you mean, it's not safe?" I ask. "No one is going to hurt you. I just want you to meet with my therapist, and talk."

"Those therapists aren't safe," he replies in the same monotone voice. "Come home, here."

"Oh, shit!" I say, as I slam the phone down. I realize that someone has gotten ahold of my husband, and convinced him to leave me. I now understand that this someone is the cult, judging from the monotone, flat voice he used. At this point, I do not realize that the Illuminati have started to systemically punish me by removing my money, my children, and my friends.

It is the next day. I am out of money and need to pay rent to my roommate. I go into the bank since I have thousands saved in an account that I opened years ago with my husband. When I get to the teller with a withdrawal slip, she looks into her computerized screen, then hesitates. "I'm sorry, there's no money in this account," she tells me.

"That's impossible! I have $5000 of my money in that account," I insist.

"Maybe so, but your husband withdrew the money last week," she informs me.

"But, but, that's illegal! He would need my signature to do that! That was money that I worked hard for and earned!"

The teller replies quietly, "Not if you have a joint account, he doesn't need a signature."

"You mean, he can just go in, and clean my account out like that?" I ask.

"Yes, honey, he can." The teller looks at me sadly, and I leave the bank, discouraged.

I am penniless. My social security check is late. I have been on disability for the past year, and this check is my sole source of income. I call social security to see what has happened to my check. After waiting for what seems like hours, I finally get through to a real person.

"Oh, we sent it, to your address in San Diego," I am told. "The check was cashed last week."

"But I'm not in San Diego, I'm in Texas," I tell the worker on the phone. I realize with a jolt that my husband has forged my signature, deposited the check into our joint account, and then taken the money for himself.

I tell the social security worker, "I need to update my address. Here is where future checks need to be mailed to."

In desperation, I call my mother, and tell her I have no money, and that my husband wants to divorce me, and will not let me see our children. She has never liked my husband, and sends me a check, but also a warning. “Go back to San Diego, or you will make people angry, and you don’t want that. Don’t be a fool.”

When I get back to my apartment, Danny is waiting for me. “Hi, sister.” He greets me cheerfully. Before the words are out of his mouth, upon seeing him, Ana and Elsa submerge, and Luce switches out.

We hug and he looks closely at me. “How are you?” He asks.

I had been communicating with the fathers on a regular basis in in the hospital through a cell phone I had smuggled in, unbeknownst to Ana or Elsa, but it has been a while since I have seen my brother in person. Before I respond, Tremaine emerges from the bathroom, with her hair styled and dressed like me. I understand; it’s time for a trip back to Rome and she will cover for me.

In Rome, I spend two weeks being assessed. Mattheo, Mattie, Tommie (who has the cover identity of being Ana’s biological mother in the Illuminati), Lizzie and the other trainers and leaders are very concerned about Ana’s decision to fully defect, a decision that they had not authorized. By some miracle, I manage to convince them that I, the Jesuit cult presenter and other Jesuit systems are still loyal, and that Ana’s decisions could prove useful to us. The lies I reel off to my beloved fathers, with my heart in my mouth, frankly make little sense to me. Perhaps what is convincing them in the end is the difficulty they have believing that after what happened when I was 14, I would ever consider defecting from Rome again. Perhaps the fact that not a hint of Jesuit information has been shared by Luce to Ana is helping them to believe that the problem was isolated to the Illuminati systems.

Instead of frying me alive, then forbidding me to leave Rome for five years, we come up with a plan to convince the Illuminati that Ana could be controlled, and not become a security risk. One strategy includes a romantic bond with a new handler, a ‘boyfriend’ whom Elsa would eventually marry in Chuck’s place. We have just the right Jesuit infiltrator in the Illuminati to use for this role, Father Joram, a man close to me in age. His Illuminati cover identity, Sagit, had an extensive history of handling and retrieving cult members who were trying to escape cult control (e.g., as a cult “bounty hunter”). Not only this, but Sagit’s non-cult ordinary day presenter, Jimmy, had already infiltrated the survivor community in Dallas where he had built a reputation for being a kind and sincere cult survivor himself who was trying to heal. We work on ironing out the details of the plan to make Sagit become Ana’s handler, and other plans needed to ensure that the Illuminati will severely punish yet not kill Ana.

I return to Texas with Lizzie and Danny. They remind me how important I am to Rome and how much they love me, before they give me the codes to switch back in, and for Elsa and Ana to emerge with no gap in their time lines.

As Elsa, I search for a lawyer who will take on my custody case. I have called five, and all five wish me “Good luck. I can’t take this case.” When I ask and ask why nobody will take my case, one finally tells me the truth: “Lady, this is going to be a long, drawn-out battle, one that could take years. You just don’t have the money to make it worthwhile. Nobody is going to take this on. There’s not enough money in it.”

I feel discouraged, but keep going through the San Diego County phone book. Finally, I find a lawyer willing to represent me. But I’m not sure I like her advice once I have paid her a retainer, using the money I have earned over the past few months by working as a nurse here in Texas.

"Oh, you don't have to go to custody hearings," my lawyer assures me. I don't believe her, and show up anyway, first by phone. The custody hearing is going okay, until my ex's lawyer asks, "Do you believe that your children are being abused by a satanic cult that your husband is involved in?" I am not expecting such a direct question, and the answer pops out, "Yes, I do."

The interview is immediately over.

A month later, I go to court. After hearing the transcript of the phone interview, the judge awards full custody of my children to my ex; I am only allowed supervised visitation since I am considered to be a risk for abducting my children out of state. If I take the children out of state, I will go directly to jail.

During this extremely painful and lonely month, I make a new friend, Jimmy. He is dating my roommate but we start to become good friends. I am able to pour out to him my anger and betrayal about Chuck, and my fears for my children. Jimmy is remarkably empathetic and supportive, and as a cult survivor himself, he understands my concerns about safety.

Three months later, I decide to break the restraining order to go see my children. I cannot stand the thought that they will think I have abandoned them. I call my sister, who lives in San Diego, and tell her I am driving into town in three days. Reluctantly, she agrees to have the children there so I can see them. Jimmy, my ever-supportive friend, comes with me to reduce the risk of abduction, and I am glad to have him help me with the long drive.

All three of my children are at my sister's apartment when I finally make it into town. As I enter the door, I give them a big hug, crying. "I've missed you so much," I tell them as tears run down my face. "So very much."

But my oldest daughter starts panicking. "Oh no, oh no, oh no," she says. "I have to call Daddy, I have to call Daddy. He told me to call him right away if something like this happens."

I look at my sister. My younger son is crying. I hold him in my lap as I am hugging my other daughter.

My oldest daughter is increasingly frantic. "Call daddy, call daddy, call daddy," she says over and over. I realize that she has been programmed to do this, and it breaks my heart.

My sister hands her the phone and she makes the call. "Daddy, Mom is here," she says. She is 12 years old, and her voice is shaking. "What should I do?"

She hands the phone to me.

"I will let you see them this once, but if you try to take them with you, I will put you into jail for a long, long time," he growls into the receiver.

In spite of his warning, at the end of the day, I want to take the children with me.

"Maybe I can leave and get over the border before they can get us," I tell my sister.

"Are you kidding? The police would put out an APB, and you would be locked up. Do you think they will let you see your children while you are in federal prison? Don't be stupid," she tells me. I am considering being stupid, but realize that this could traumatize them further.

Crying, I leave. I have to think of a way to see them again. They are crying as well as I tell them “Goodbye”. Jimmy and I start the long drive back to Texas. I cry most of the way, and Jimmy comforts and prays for me. When I get back to Texas, I continue working hard as hard as I can on my healing because my children need a mother who is healed and free of the cult.

As Elsa, it took me years to remember the ‘bigger picture’ of what happened during that visit in San Diego: Illuminati leaders, including my mother and Brogan, were present. When Ana reiterated her refusal to renounce her desire to be free and her refusal to be reprogrammed, they began to torture her children in front of her. This was after weeks of hearing their screams over the phone, and seeing pictures of their torture in envelopes pushed under her front door and other evidence, such as pieces of bloodied clothing left in small boxes by the door. Ana had not let Elsa remember these or show them to the therapist out of fear that her children would be subjected to worse torture if she did. Unremembered by Elsa, the children had also visited Ana a few times in Texas to beg her to return to the cult, and shown her the marks of their torture. It was overwhelming.

As Ana, I broke. I cannot describe the agony of watching my children tortured. As much as I did not want to, I gave in to stop their pain. I agreed to return to the cult. I agreed to be reprogrammed. I agree to fake-heal rather than really try to heal. I agreed to take whatever punishment they would mete out to me, if they would stop hurting Mary, Sandra and Ricky. I agreed that Elsa would not know what had really happened. When I agreed, they stopped the torture and let me hold my children. We ended this ‘meeting’ with a ritual involving all present to seal my agreement.

I am then transported to our programming facility. I learn that “Jimmy” is no low-level survivor from a local group, but is actually an Illuminati agent, Sagit, skilled in enforcement, handling and bounty hunting. I resign myself to being programmed to be controlled by Sagit, and for my non-cult presenter, Elsa, to marry and trust “Jimmy”. It is just one more betrayal – so mundane yet so painful. Jonathan sneers as he sketches out for me how Elsa will live in the fantasy that Jimmy is the perfect loving, supportive spouse, one who does all the right things: he drives me to therapy, encouraging me to heal, yet he is also the person whose job is to punish and torture me if I take his “loving suggestions” to heal. I am too emotionally exhausted and heartbroken to react to his gleeful contempt.

What I am told next, however, completely floors me. I am told that to guarantee my adherence to the limits of my anti-healing programming in the future, they will remove Mary, Elsa’s oldest daughter whom she had adopted when the was two months old, from the family. Elsa and the rest of the family will then be reprogrammed to completely have no memory that she ever existed. Mary will thus become a ‘hidden child’ that we could be with only at cult events and activities, or in our presentations in other countries.

“You bastards!” I spit at Jonathan and the other leaders there.

I look at my mother and Brogan. I cannot believe that they are colluding with this plan that would break my heart, as well as my children’s. My mother returns a cold look, “You were given many chances to come back. You made it evident that we need to take drastic measures.”

Jonathan smiles. Could I hate this man more?

“Since you did not want to return to the family, it is fitting that Mary will have no family,” he states. He proceeds to tell me that Mary will be reprogrammed to believe that she is a ward of the state who entered the foster care system at five years old because her mother was a drug-addicted prostitute who failed to care for her, and has lived with a series of abusive foster families since then. I turn my face away from them, sick at heart.

"Of course," he explains, "For any sign of unrest in you, I will personally ensure that Mary experiences extra 'loving care' from her foster family." I am not sure which is worse: the threat that my children will be tortured to death if I resist or rebel again, or the threat that they will be tortured for the long term.

Brogan, my mother and my Illuminati twin begin the reprogramming work that weekend by giving Jonathan access to large portions of my system. Prior to this, he only had access to the areas directly relevant to our anti-healing project. Jonathan and Taurus work very intensely on me for the next five days to bring me back into line.

The fear that my children would be tortured to death kept the amnesia between Ana and Elsa intact for another ten years. As Elsa, I believed that I had left the cult, was not being accessed, and was progressing in my healing. I truly believed that Jimmy was my safety and accountability from access, and that he and I were staying free together.

It was not until 2006, when my children were grown and had left home, that Ana shared with me the truth about my relationship with him and my ongoing cult activity. I was devastated when I learned the truth. My experience as Elsa shows clearly that even a survivor who is "healing", who is actively working on their memories and trauma, can still be active in the cult, and be completely unaware of this fact. The lack of awareness is often held in place by the belief that remembering would endanger those they love most, such as their children or spouse.

Notably, having multiple presentations, each with their own set of loved ones, gave the Illuminati even more leverage to use love to control me. My other Illuminati presentations – Trixie (the UK), Trudi (Germany) and Jeanne (France) were assessed to see if they had been 'infected' by Elsa's and Ana's rebellion. Since they had shown no sign at all of deviation from their programming and any attempts to heal, they were well rewarded for their continued amnesia and loyalty, and allowed to continue their happy lives in their respective countries. Jonathan and the other programmers also called these parts out and showed them videos of what happened to Elsa (the torture of her children, the loss of her children, finances, marriage, etc.), warning them that the same would happen if they ever were disloyal. Ana was also warned that if she was ever disloyal again, then the same devastations would be inflicted on Trixie, Trudi and Jeanne. It took another decade as well for these other presentations to start to remember, communicate with other parts, and come onboard with attempts to heal.

Chapter 31: Stripped

Just a few months later, I am in San Diego as Elsa for a supervised visit with my children. As usual, Jimmy, my “safe accountability” is with me. As Elsa, I am unaware that each visit lasts longer than I think, and that each visit involves Illuminati activity.

As Ana, I am fully aware of this. But even as Ana, I am unprepared for the hell that the Illuminati have been planning to unleash on me this time. According to their point of view, Ana/Elsa has been very disobedient and disloyal (an understatement, to put it mildly). Besides my recent attempt to defect while inpatient in Texas, I had been remembering and telling my therapist secrets that they didn’t want revealed, such as the name of the head trainer in San Diego that I worked under. Against orders, I had testified in defense of the nurse practitioner, Heather, who was being falsely accused of suggesting memories and unethical practice by the family of one of her clients with a history of ritual abuse. If all that was not enough, I had also given a four-hour tape-recorded testimony of how the cult in San Diego works, including where their leadership meets, how security is done, and the names of several leaders. The leadership are angry with me, to put it lightly, and they want revenge.

My mother meets me at the foyer of the facility and instructs me to put on my dress uniform with all my medals and stripes. Somehow, I do not have a good feeling about this; I had not received any notice that there was to be a formal event tonight. I get into her car. She informs me curtly that my children and Chuck are driving separately and will meet us at the estate. My discomfort increases.

The Illuminati members from San Diego are gathered on the grounds of the large private estate. Many high-ranking members are present, including the western regional council, and the U.S. national council which meets in Alexandria, Virginia. The national council chair calls me forward onto a stand. Before the gathered crowd, I am stripped of my rank. My medals and stripes are torn off of my uniform, then my uniform and underclothes are torn off, leaving me completely bare. The chair proclaims loudly, “You are nothing now. You are lower than a worm.”

He pushes me off the stand, and I fall forward into the dirt, stunned. Jonathan puts his booted foot on my head, and says, “Eat mud, worm” as he grinds my face into the ground.

Then the rapes begin. Over and over they violate me painfully with different objects. They bring in horses and dogs as well, since my defection shows I am a “whore of the worst degree” who has “strange appetites”. The leadership take turns urinating and smearing feces on me, so that everyone could see what a “traitor smells like”. For the next four days, I am publicly tortured in many ways. My humiliation is the main event and members at all levels are invited to watch what happens to someone who tries to defect, and who tells secrets. I am a public example to all.

I know they want me killed, and I cannot understand why I am allowed to live. Others present verbalize the same question: “Why isn’t she killed???” As Ana, I do not realize that there are others who have ordered that I am to be punished severely, yet allowed to live unmaimed; I am not high up enough in the Illuminati to know that the very top Illuminati leadership takes orders directly from the Order. My loyalty to Rome is still intact, creating amnesia to my life as a Jesuit, so I am not aware as Ana that Rome is protecting me from permanent injury and death.

Worse is yet to come. My children are brought out in front of the watching crowd and violently sexually abused. My ex-husband is punished, too, for not seeing what I truly was, for not turning me in sooner. He is tortured and humiliated, with sexually degrading acts, as he is asked, "Why did you let your dick lead you, and not your mind; why didn't you see what she was?" and other, similar questions.

I have been shown to be lower than dung publicly over and over, and my cries of pain at the torture of my children and ex-husband have shown to the Illuminati watching this the great emotional pain that awaits those who attempt to betray them.

After five days of public abuse, they take me to my former home in San Diego. Here, my ex and I are forced to watch my children's torture in front of me by leadership that I had formerly worked with, torture that shows how "the sins of the father fall on the children," torture meant to destroy any remaining love within my children for me, the traitor. My children are told over and over again, "You are being hurt because your mother is a traitor whore." This lasts for another three days.

My heart is broken, over and over again, and I cannot stop what is going on. I feel hopeless and sink into despair. By the time my 'visit' is over, my ex, children and I are terrified, anguished, grieving and emotionally and spiritually exhausted.

It is time to return to Texas. The Illuminati have finished having their torture fest with me and my family, and have taken their revenges both large and small.

They call Elsa back out to the front. My car is loaded with small presents, supposedly purchased while shopping there. Jimmy, my new husband, gets into the car with me. He is the spouse who supposedly was "keeping me safe" by being my "accountability" while seeing my children. In actuality, he delivered me to local leadership, keeping a close watch on me the whole time during the drive there.

I return to Texas in despair because I cannot bear to leave my children. However, I do tell my church how thankful I am that God protected me during the trip to see my children, and that nothing bad happened. I had asked them to pray for me during this trip. They were overjoyed to hear that these prayers were answered. I had no idea of what had actually happened. The amnesia and dissociative barriers were still intact, and the events of the weeks before have only served to strengthen them; the trauma of the past week is too overwhelming to touch. Deep inside, for a moment, Ana wishes that like Elsa, she too could forget what happened.

As this chapter shows, when a member of organized, international cults tries to defect, or is disloyal and spills internal secrets to others, there can be terrible retribution. A large portion of this retribution will be public, because they want to quench rumors and prove that the threats they make about what will happen "if you tell" or "if you disobey" really are true. But usually, they will publicly, very painfully and very slowly kill someone who defects and tells high security information. The only reason to explain the fact that I lived is twofold: God did not want me to die yet; and the Jesuit Fathers wanted me back in Rome, and so they put pressure on the Illuminati leadership to make an unforgettable example of me to others, but not to maim or kill me or my children.

I have not described in detail the ten days of non-stop abuse. It suffices to say that it was extreme and I was left wanting to die. Elsa mistakenly assumed the despair she felt driving out of San Diego was because she was leaving her children behind; she did not understand that it was due to the horrendous amount of trauma that they had all endured.

Being stripped of all my ranks, however, did not mean that I no longer had to work hard for the Illuminati. After the torture, I was still expected back at various jobs in the facilities. The distinction was that now I had no status, no rank, no leadership position, no access to information except under supervision, and any credit for any work I did was automatically given to others. This was part of the ongoing humiliation that they wanted me to experience, for in the Illuminati, status is everything and being stripped from leadership to slave levels is an unthinkable thought for most of its members.

Chapter 29: Leaving the Jesuits

As, Luce, the Jesuit cult presenter, I was observing everything that Ana and Elsa were going through. I hated every moment of it. I hated how they were treating the children. I hated that how both the Illuminati and the Jesuits were enslaving all their members. Unbeknownst to the Order, the way we were being treated and forced to treat others, combined with the moments of hope from the answered prayers of Ana and other parts, was now making it impossible for me to not try to defect to the true God's kingdom. I cannot live like this anymore.

In my heart, I pray secretly to God. Memories of what happened when I was 14 keep coming unbidden. I think about the other fathers I love, and the children I love. I feel so trapped. I do not have a plan; I cannot see a way to one.

I miss my scheduled pick-up to switch out with Lizzie and return to Rome. I leave a message containing a weak excuse about needing to observe two infants in the local facility whose programmers were reporting difficulties in managing failure-to-thrive.

I receive a reply to be ready to return in three days' time.

I go for a day's hike, leaving all my communication devices at the house, and miss this pick-up too.

When I get back to my house, Jimmy has made spaghetti for dinner. He turns away from the stove, switches into his Jesuit cult presenter, Joram, and hands me his cell phone. He tells me in Latin, "Tommie wants to talk to you."

Tommie is the Jesuit name of the person who has the cover identity or presentation of being my biological mother in the Illuminati. I sigh and take the phone. A call from Tommie is only marginally better than a call from Matteo or Mattie.

"Come home to Rome," Tommie tell me with no preamble.

"No," I reply. I do not explain. There is nothing more to say. I should be surprised that that "no" had flowed spontaneously out of my mouth to a father that I have vowed, over and over again, to obey since childhood. But I am not. I am just too weary of being a father deep inside to wonder at my heartfelt, unplanned "no". I have felt this way ever since my coming-of-age at 13, and I have nothing left in me to keep pretending to be the perfect Jesuit father.

I want God. I want to follow Jesus. I want again that love that I had been coerced to deny when I was 14, that I had tasted again as Ana.

"Come back, or die like a soldier of Rome, it's your choice." This is a deep, core command to obey or die, for my mother's loyalty to Rome supersedes any love for me. Coming from Tommie, not only my real biological mother, but one of my primary programmers from infancy, it is an extremely powerful command.

The next day, I go to a drug store. I buy, then take, a lethal dose of antihistamines. From my years of medical training in the Order, I know that an overdose of this medication is irreversible – there is no known drug to reverse its deadly effect. I cannot go to Rome, for they will harm the people I love, and then hurt me and them in terrible ways. It is better that I die than return to more pain. Within 15 minutes of the overdose, I feel dizzy and then pass out. Someone calls an ambulance and I am taken to a large trauma center.

I am in the emergency room, fighting for my life. The antihistamines are causing my heart rate to jump above 200, and the room is fading in and out as I pass out, and regain consciousness over and over again. A nurse has pumped my stomach and given me charcoal, but the drugs are in my bloodstream. A doctor comes over, and says, "I can give you some morphine, and you won't feel the seizures that happen before you die. I can give you enough for your death to be painless."

But suddenly, I want to live. I don't want to die. "What is the half-life of the drug?" I ask.

"Two hours," he says.

"Give me two hours to fight, please," I say.

"Okay," he tells me.

I keep fading in and out. I am switching through thousands of parts. My potassium goes to 2.0 due to the rapid heart rate, and a nurse gives me some IV potassium. Another nurse has brought a death kit in.

"Isn't it a little early for that?" the first nurse asks.

"She doesn't have a chance, it's just a matter of time," says the second nurse. "I wish you hadn't wasted the charcoal kit on her." These nurses don't realize that I can hear everything they are saying.

I am cold, very cold, the room feels dark. I am dying, I can feel it, and suddenly, a prayer from the depths of my soul comes out; I pray with my mind since I am incapable of speech. "God, I am so sorry that I tried to kill myself," I say, and mean it. "If you let me live, I will never try to kill myself again. Please, let me live." I black out.

It is the next morning, and I open my eyes. I can't believe it, I am still alive, and my heart is no longer racing like a racehorse in the home stretch. I am tired, so tired, and I have an IV in my arm. I see a policeman at the foot of my bed. He sees me wake up, and informs me that I am on a 72-hour hold; that I will be kept inpatient here for three days at the county hospital because of my very serious attempt to die. He then asks, "Did your husband try to kill you?"

I ask him why he is wondering this. "Well, he has a criminal record, and you sure fought hard to live. It looked like you really didn't want to die. In fact, you are a miracle to still be alive."

I agree. I will keep my promise to God, and never try to suicide again, because I believe He is the one who kept me alive, and without brain damage. God, and the 2,000 parts that switched out, rotating every few seconds, in a desperate fight for life all night long allowed me to live and retain normal brain function.

I am grateful that God spared my life that night. Somehow, in the midst of my despair and hopelessness, He infused me with enough hope to maintain that fight for my life that night. When I woke up the next day, my brain and mind surprisingly intact, as Luce, I rededicated my life to Him. I have no idea how I could possibly face what will be coming at me from the Order, but I ask Him to be with me in it. He wrapped His love around me that morning, and for the first time in over twenty years, I was truly comforted.

Chapter 30: Jesuit Punishment

It is three weeks after my suicide attempt, and I am in Rome as Luce. The fathers are very angry with me. My refusal to return and choose suicide instead has made it starkly clear to the Order that I no longer wanted to be a Jesuit father. In my weakened state after attempting suicide, however, Danny and Lizzie had visited and succeeded in persuading me to fly back to Rome with them. Returning to Rome was a horrible mistake on my part – the same mistake I had made when I was 14.

The generals, councilors and senators have been discussing what to do with me. As I wait in a glassed-in terrace, my twin brother Danny appears. He has an espresso in each hand, and hands me one. His face looks serious, and he is not greeting me with his usual jokes.

"Why?" he asks. "Why?"

I know what he is asking. Why have I started believing again in the Christian God, in the Jesus that always lets people down? Why did I try to go rogue in Texas? Why can't I be loyal, like a true soldier of Rome?

"Because what we are doing is wrong. What we serve is wrong. Deep down, you have to know it. This is evil, what we do, and I can't keep agreeing with it," I reply. "Turn to Jesus, Danny," I plead.

He puts his hands up in a halt gesture. "Hey, don't start preaching that stuff to me," he says. "Save it for the council."

I am called up before the council. They ask me to explain my actions. They want to know what has caused me to question the goodness of the Order, and to betray those I love most by refusing to return home. I give them the same answer that I gave my brother, and they are dissatisfied with it.

"What we are doing is not wrong; it is to bring in a new order of peace to replace the chaos of this mortal life," Mattheo tells me.

"How can you question the goodness of all of us, who have loved you through the years?" asks Lizzie.

"You are the one who is misguided, not us; you have allowed the propaganda about the traitor god to enter your soul," says Mara, a member of the mage council. The others all nod or murmur their assent.

"Yes, you are the one who is in error. How can you question the wisdom of thousands, over centuries, and believe you know better than the accumulated wisdom and knowledge of the generations and leaders who have come before you? What kind of misguided pride is this?" Vitali asks me.

"You must be taught the error of your ways, and have this pride humbled," Mattheo says, and the others all agree with one accord.

The teaching of my errors and the humbling begins. First, I am tortured for several days with electric shocks, and all manner of sexual violence. The skin is peeled off of different parts of my body, then the raw wounds are rapidly healed with our medical technology, so they can start peeling the same body parts again. All the while I am taunted: "Why doesn't the Christian God answer your prayers? Why is He allowing this to happen?"

Jesus does come and comfort me afterwards when I am alone and I pray. But it is getting harder and harder to reach out to Him, as I not only endure torture, but those I love are tortured as well.

Next, they place me in a room with no walls or windows, except a smooth steel door that lets people in and out using biometric security. I am chained to the wall. The children who play the roles of Elsa's children in America are being raped in front of me. They scream in English, "Mommy, help, help me!"

All the while, the rapists sneer and say "Pray, 'Christian', for your children. Pray!"

I pray, but the torment of my children continues for days. I am forced to watch helplessly as these tortures are applied to their bodies: hot rods inserted into their private parts; electric shocks; fingers broken in wooden vises, and more. The whole time, the cruel words ring through the room, "Why isn't your God answering your prayers? Pray harder, Christian. Maybe you don't have enough faith,".

I am wondering why God doesn't answer my prayers, for I am praying intensely. The seeds of doubt are being sown and taking hold. After four days, I am weeping, broken, and no longer praying. The torture of my American children and Jimmy, my husband, then stops. The fathers have achieved their goal of making me believe that God does not hear or answer my prayers. My children and I are released from the room.

I am in another room, chained. Conner, one of my dearest friends closer than a brother, and who has the role of Alan, my husband in Germany, is being tortured terribly in front of me.

"He is paying for your sins," says Mattheo, as he turns accusing eyes on me

Worse follows. Once Conner is near death, I am put into a room, like the one my children and I were in before. Conner is strapped to my back. He is dying, and Mattheo tells me, "You must bear the weight of your sins, because you were faithless to Rome when you questioned us."

Conner slowly dies on top of me. I keep telling him I love him, and he tells me that he still loves me. Just before he dies, he accepts Jesus, but I will not remember this later. Instead, they will make me believe that he went to hell after his death; I will agree to believe this to keep them from killing another brother. For three days, I carry his dead body on my back. The room is warm, and his body bloats and rots. I am told that I am smelling the "stench" of my "treachery". I start vomiting and become physically ill, and his body is taken off once I collapse during the third day. I am given nutrients, liquids and stimulants to revive me.

Later the same day, I am taken into another room. In the middle of the room, nailed to a cross, is Conner's bloated, dead body dressed grotesquely as Jesus.

"See? There is no 'resurrection' after three days," the programmers taunt me. I turn away and vomit, overcome with horror and anguish. I collapse from emotional and physical stress.

I am revived again, because they want to make an example of me for any other children or adults who might think of wanting to leave the Order. They have to show all members that the threats they make about what happens if you try to disobey, or break programming, are not idle ones.

I am in a room filled with crosses. Just as when I was 14, I am forced to recant my faith in Christus. Once again, I break, and recant my faith. I cannot stand seeing the torture of my loved ones, their cries of agony as they try to breathe while nailed to these crosses.

After I recant, they nail me to a cross for two days, and keep me conscious with drugs and IV medications. They tell me that Christus can never bear the weight of my sins because they are too great. Instead, I am told that I must do penance. I cry and wail in emotional and spiritual pain; my grief is unbearable.

Satan paces back and forth below, saying "Didn't I warn you this would happen to you if you were unfaithful to me? Did you forget what happened before when you betrayed me?" and similar accusations.

The children and adults in the Order come to see me hanging there. I am an example of what they do not want to become. They hurl urine and feces and insults at me. Some come up and use a metal rod to rape me with, saying that because I was such a filthy traitor, I am too "dirty" to touch. They leave, and come back every three hours to repeat my degradation in numerous ways.

I am in Rome for a month. After completely recanting and breaking, I am re-instated. Unlike in the Illuminati where I am demoted and kept at a low status over the next two decades, my re-instatement in the Order is complete – I am restored to all my previous leadership positions, privileges and duties. Ostensibly, this is a demonstration of Satan's "mercy" towards those who 'repent' and 'return to him after straying' – I am welcomed back just as the prodigal son was welcomed back by the loving father after squandering his wealth and feeding the pigs. The truth is that Satan and the programmers believe that the additional guilt of having to be responsible again for coordinating the wicked activities of the Order, and of constantly being honored as a competent and loyal servant of Satan, would actually serve to shame, burden and chain me far more effectively than the subtle martyrdom of demotion would.

While the Illuminati abuse was terrible, it was much less painful and spiritually devastating to me than the abuse by the Jesuit fathers. I had once again come to faith in Jesus and desired to break free of Satan's control; the Jesuits sought to crush my faith. To this day, I still do not understand why Conner, a brother I loved deeply, was killed instead of me. This is one of the questions I will have to ask God one day, when I stand before Him, although I suspect that when I do, all questions will be answered just by experiencing His goodness and glory. In His presence, my "Why?" will become instead, "Why are you so merciful to me, a sinner?"

The impact of the month of horror in Rome was felt throughout my system, even by parts who were programmed to be amnesic to cult life in the Order. As Elsa in the USA and Ana in the Illuminati, I recall that at this time, I felt like some part of me had died, as if I would never, ever be the same again, though I did not know why. While indescribably horrible, that month and my point of breaking and recanting was only the beginning. The months of reprogramming that followed my recanting involved even worse, and unimaginable, levels of physical, emotional and spiritual abuse. Another decade would pass before my Illuminati and non-cult systems would learn that we were also members of the Jesuit Order. The terrible events involved in my recanting, reinstatement and reprogramming created oceans of pain, sorrow and regret so overwhelming that my systems believed that we could never survive remembering.

I have struggled about sharing these events, in case it could cause some who are attempting to leave to reconsider, but I think it is important to acknowledge the costs that some organized occult societies try to inflict on any member who tries to leave. For many survivors, these are the terrible realities which they may have to overcome in order to choose freedom. It is so important that helpers and supporters understand the cost and magnitude of what survivors face when leaving their cults. Even in cults or government agencies that may not use the degree of violence that the Jesuits and Illuminati do, the loss of relationship, identity, belonging and purpose involved in leaving the community that raised you can be overwhelming. In 2007, I did choose freedom again. Once more, it was extremely costly, and I will describe this journey in my next book which will be part three of my autobiography.

Years later, when as Elsa, I struggled with horror, devastation, grief, despair and panic as the layers of parts that stood between the cult and non-cult systems stood aside, and I listened to these terrible, terrible memories. Along with Luce, I wept and struggled to believe that God cared at all for me, because He allowed me to experience these things. I screamed at Him, "Why didn't you let me die?!? Are You so cruel that You let me live after going through this, and others better than me died or were hurt???? What kind of God are you?!?" These screams lasted weeks and I went through a real faith crisis. I felt as if my faith was dead, nailed to the cross I described above, which was the whole intent of the fathers when they put me through this scenario. I thought God had to be malicious, cruel, terrible or He would prevent human beings from being capable of things like this. I was nauseated by the platitudes Christians gave in response to my anguished cry of "Why????"- mouthing platitudes to me regarding free will. I wanted God to have made men without choice, if these things are what they choose. I thought I knew better than God regarding how the universe should be. I told Him that He was messed up to have created a world where people did these things. I could not reconcile a 'good God' with how a good God could allow men to be created and to fall, and to control other men to the degree that they do these terrible things..

It took years to process the feelings, and always, I did not get an explanation of why from Him. God did not hate me or turn away despite my rage at Him, but instead, gently comforted me, stood beside me and listened as I told Him how I felt about it all. His love was there, and I hated Him for loving me. I feared His love would cause me to choose Him once again. Then, the Order would start all these awful, terrible, unbearable events all over again. They had told me that He and my faith in Him was the cause of the pain, and that they would have to 'do it all over again' if I ever trusted Him again. I believed them.

But over time, I saw that this, too was a programming script of the cruelest kind. They wanted me to blame God for what Satan caused. Of course, the question, "Well, why did He create Satan then????" came. I am not a theologian. I am merely a survivor. I have no profound, scholarly answer for such questions. I only have the knowledge felt deep within during this struggle that without choice, there is no love; the ability to choose even this depth of evil is the price of the ability to love. He wants us to know His love and not to be automatons. And somehow, in the midst of unthinkable evil and pain, He is present, holding out His wounded hands, His body that experienced everything that I did during this time, and more. He did not abandon me in the midst of my pain. Instead, He took everything I experienced, all the sin, the terror, the horror, the betrayal, the wounding, the rejection onto Himself and understood what I had gone through. He was not at all asking me to come to Him with my pain and trauma without deeply understanding what this type of pain and trauma feel like within Himself. He was present with me in these events, in a way that I cannot understand, any more than I can understand the "Why?" of it all. What I do know is that God deeply loves each person He has created. My experiences are not "proof" that He doesn't care, but rather, that regardless of what we go through, He does care, cares enough that He chose to go through it with us at the cross, to provide healing.

Chapter 32: Rewarded and Controlled

Three more years pass. As Elsa/Ana, I have been writing an online blog exposing the Illuminati, in part because I am angry about the things that happened to me and to my children during my humiliation (Ana), and the loss of custody (Ana/Elsa). I continue working on healing from ritual abuse and cult programming, believing as Elsa that I was no longer active in the Illuminati. I have no idea that my hard work on healing is limited by the programming I was given by Jonathan and the others to try but never really heal. I attend church, read the Bible, and pray constantly for my children's safety and their reunification with me. I do not remember that I still frequently see them at cult events, or in my identities in other countries. I re-open the custody case for my children with a paralegal. Finally, I am allowed to have first, supervised visitation in Texas, and then un-supervised visitation.

My two children fly out from San Diego to see me in Texas for ten days.

The visit is coming towards an end. It is three days before my children are supposed to return to California. I am talking to my daughter in the front yard, and I am crying. "I don't want you kids to have to go back there," I tell her.

"Why?" my daughter asks me.

"Because bad things happen there," I reply.

My daughter starts shaking and shaking, as if she is having a seizure. "My protectors don't want me to go back either!" she screams. "Anabel is terrified of going back. She will get hurt there!"

"Who is Anabel?" I ask my daughter.

"One of my inside people," my daughter tells me. The rest of the day, she has numerous flashbacks, and tells me, "I don't want to go back to California. Help me."

My son, who is four years younger than his sister, asks what is going on. "I'm remembering what happened in California," she tells him.

My son also has flashbacks of being raped and hurt with a cattle prod, and tells me about them.

I call my ex in California. "I can't let the children go back, no matter what you do to me," I tell him.

"I'm flying out, right away," he says. "I will come and get them."

The next afternoon, my ex arrives. "I'm taking the children back with me. You will go to jail if you don't let them go with me." I am crying.

My daughter comes into the room. "Don't make me go back, Daddy," she sobs.

The next day is Sunday. Because my ex is very religious, he goes to church with me. After the service, when the others are gone, I ask him, "Please don't let the children go back to what's happening there. I don't want them to get hurt."

"Well, I don't remember anything like that," he tells me. "Wouldn't I know if something was going on?"

"We're in church. Why don't you pray, and ask God if what I've been telling you is true?" I respond.

"Okay." he says. He kneels on the carpet between the pews, and says, "If this is true, God, and not some kind of insane delusion, show me. Because I don't believe it's true."

Suddenly, he starts shaking and his face turns white. "Oh, my God!" he screams. "Oh, God, it's true!" He looks at me and asks, "What do I do? What do I do?"

I quickly teach him a simple grounding technique, and help him to calm down.

The next day, my ex comes to my house. He has seen a notary, and shows me two sheets of paper that he has signed and notarized, giving me full custody of my children. He tells me, "I am going back to California, then will be moving here to Texas. I need to get out, too."

My children now come to live with me fulltime. I am overjoyed and share about this miracle with many in my church and online. I reduce my online writing to sporadically answering survivor and therapists' questions so that I can focus on caring for my children.

The "miracle" I, Elsa, have celebrated with others at church –getting custody of my two children - was actually a setup. At that point, because I was amnesic to my current activity in the Illuminati and had very limited communication between parts in my system, I had no idea that the Illuminati had granted me custody in order to strengthen their control over me. It all looked so authentic – my children's tears and fears of returning to San Diego, my ex-husband's prayer and sudden revelation. It was easy to believe because I wanted so much for my children to be safe with me. It was also easy to believe because my children and ex were not actually consciously lying or pretending – their front, non-cult parts had been programmed to start remembering the cult and to believe they were remembering spontaneously – just as I had been programmed to do so several years prior (see Chapter 23).

There were several pieces to my children being returned to me. One was reward by the Illuminati. Elsa had, for the most part, been compliant with her programming to only 'heal' within designated parameters, never remembering or disclosing her current cult activities. Maintaining programming entails rewarding desired behaviors; only punishing forbidden behaviors produces weaker programming. Based on basic behavioral theories, the programmers knew that it was important to reward Elsa for three years of good behavior. Hence, they gave her back her children after programming her to believe that it was an answered prayer from God. Or at least, they returned two of the three children. The non-cult presenters' amnesia to Elsa's adopted daughter, Mary, was kept intact as a reminder of the consequences of disloyalty.

The other piece was control. For Ana, who was completely aware that her children being allowed to live with her when she was in the USA was an Illuminati decision, it served to remind her that she was under their control. They could give and take away all the things that were most important to her. For Elsa, mentioned earlier, she had been compliant 'for the most part'. Where she had continued to be non-compliant was in her writings as svali where she/Ana were sporadically releasing unauthorized information. It was the job of her two children, now that they were with her, to remind her of the consequences of such actions or other acts of disloyalty. In fact, Elsa rarely wrote as svali after Chuck gave her custody of Sandra and Sammy. Her two children, along with Jimmy or Sagit, were there to monitor and control her, and she to monitor them, as is typical between the members of any Illuminati family.

The third piece, for the Jesuits, was convenience. Sandra and Sammy were Jesuit children, our next generation of infiltrating the Illuminati. Sandra was 14, and so had come of age and had been given her adult name, Father Mark. She was already a very skilled programmer and agent. Luce and Mark being together meant that they could easily discuss observations of the Illuminati, debrief on the progress and impact of the infiltration, make calls to Rome and so on when at home and in their own car. Both their house, car, home computers, etc., was bugged by the Illuminati, but the Order's technology was used to override the Illuminati surveillance in order to communicate securely with other Jesuits locally and internationally.

In fact, memories of the wider context, as I continued to work on communication between my non-cult presenter systems, my Illuminati systems, and my Jesuit systems, suggest that ultimately, it had been the Jesuits who were behind my children being returned to me. Jonathan and several of the Illuminati leaders, out of spite and vengeance, would not have changed the custody arrangements. At most, Elsa would have been given a supervised two-week vacation with them once a year to reward any programming compliance. A number of Illuminati members had never stopped agitating for my death, especially as I continued writing as svali. The Order did not favor this idea because it could negatively impact our multigenerational infiltration efforts. Therefore, our higher-ranking infiltrators in the Illuminati 'decided' instead that the children would be returned to both reward and control Elsa/Ana, much to the annoyance of Jonathan and the others who resented me in the Illuminati.

Chapter 33: Life Continues

I am now 43 years old. In America as Elsa, I am working three jobs out of necessity. Jimmy, my second husband, is unable or unwilling to work. I am working 40 hours a week as a manager for an Internet company. I teach English as a Second Language (ESL) classes two evenings a week, and I have started a business, writing content for websites and ghostwriting medical articles. The latter is becoming successful and I am starting to build my savings again.

My daughter Sandra, after her initial joy at coming to live with me, has become sullen and withdrawn. She is angry all the time, refuses to participate in school activities, and tells me that she misses her friends in San Diego. My son Sammy is glad to be with me, but is showing severe posttraumatic stress from years of abuse. He struggles with bedwetting at the age of 12, compulsive overeating, and chronic nightmares. Both children experience flashbacks that wake everyone in the house up several times a month, while I am working an exhausting schedule to pay the bills.

Both of my children see a therapist who specializes in severe trauma and DID. I drive them weekly to their appointments, which my ex-husband pays for. He has moved to Texas from California, and is remembering that he was active in a cult in San Diego, and is trying to heal from his own PTSD.

It is 3 am six months later. My 15-year old daughter is awake, screaming. I go into her bedroom, and find her flailing her arms and legs, screaming "Get him off of me! Get him off!" I sit next to her on her bed, and she puts her head on my chest, crying, in wailing sobs.

"It was just a nightmare," I tell her, as she cries and cries.

"It was...horrible!" she wails. "I wasn't asleep; it was like I was day dreaming. I was in a room with all these people, and they were chanting to Satan. Then, this large man got on top of me." She shudders as she recalls the memory. "He raped me! He raped me!" she screams. "I couldn't breathe! I felt like I was suffocating, he was so big and I was so little!"

I hold her close as she shakes, telling her, "It's not happening now. It's in the past. I'm here with you. You're safe now. He isn't here."

I encourage her to look around the room and see that she is safe. I place her hand on the sateen cover of her bed, and have her feel the cloth. She calms a bit, then wails, "I feel dirty, I want to clean it all off." I talk with her awhile longer, then go and run her a warm bath. After she bathes, I wait, and after her bath, we talk for two hours, until she can finally fall back to sleep.

Two hours later, my alarm rings. I have to go into work at 9 am, and I get dressed quickly. My daughter is sound asleep, and I decide to let her sleep in this day. I wake her briefly to let her know that she can reach me at work, since my husband will be home all day, and she won't be alone. At noon, I call to check on her, and she tells me she is okay.

It is 1 am, three days after the New Year, a year later. My son wakes up screaming. I sit with him for two hours as he abreacts memories of being raped and tortured. My husband is angry with my son, telling me I should tell him to go to bed, and this infuriates me. I hold Sammy, while he sobs and asks me, “What kind of people send a kid to Russia, the UK, France and Germany, all in the space of a week? Why did they make me stay in a dark dungeon in Russia? Why?”

I don’t have an answer; all I can do is to tell him is that I love him, and that he is safe now. Finally, exhausted, he falls asleep. Afterwards, I am able to sleep for three hours before I go in to work. Since it is still Christmas break, my son goes in to work with me. Jimmy, my husband, stays home to do what he does a large part of the time: play online fantasy role playing video games.

This is my life for the next four years, as my children struggle through high school and I take them to weekly therapy. I assume that they are working hard on the issues that are causing the frequent abreactions and nightmares.

It is three years later. My daughter is 18 and is getting ready to go to college. Her therapist, who specializes in DID, the same one my son is seeing, has called a family conference. When I go in, to my amazement, the therapist tells me that she believes it would be better for my son to live with my ex, who is requesting custody.

I stare at her, incredulous. “But my ex is the one who let them be abused all those years in San Diego,” I tell her.

“That’s not what your children and ex are telling me,” she replies. “They say that there was no abuse, that it was your putting ideas in their heads,” I hear from her.

“But what about the nightmares, the abreactions, the suicidality?” I ask, still incredulous.

“They tell me they are fine, that you are making all of this up,” she answers. I hear in her censorious, accusatory tone the unspoken words, “You crazy woman – those poor kids of yours.”

“Why didn’t you tell me this years ago?” I ask, angry. “I have been driving them here for four years, and only now I hear this?”

“Because you weren’t the one paying the bill. Your ex-husband was. I did parental conferences with him, not you.”

“Well, he wasn’t the one holding them when they cried and screamed and abreacted,” I retort, hurt and confused.

“He and your children tell me you are making all of this up.”

“You’re telling me you think I’m a liar, or delusional,” I say, stunned and angry.

“I’m telling you what your children have been telling me in therapy for the past four years,” she responds.

My ex gets custody of my son the next day. He is 17, a senior in high school.

Later, I ask my son why he lied to his therapist. “Because Dad lets me do a lot of things that you won’t,” he tells me. “He lets me stay out late and drink beer with my friends, and doesn’t ask me who I’m going out with, unlike you.”

My son is a minor, and I am not happy to hear about what his father allows.

I ask my daughter why she lied about me to her therapist. “Because I hate you, bitch,” she answers. “You left me alone with that asshole- my father- and he raped me. I will never forgive you for that.”

I am left speechless. I realize that there is nothing I can do. I pray for them, since there is nothing else I can do.

Two months later, my daughter comes home for a weekend from college. “My roommate is in the cult,” she tells me.

“Maybe you should tell your therapist about this,” I suggest. “This could be really bad, you know.”

She laughs at me. “No, because I went back years ago, Mom. I just hid the fact that I did from you. You are pretty clueless at times, you know.”

I know. I don’t reply to Sandra’s statement. What is there to say? I try to process this new information, and feel very sad and weary at all the lies.

Six months later, my daughter is highly suicidal, and can barely function. She goes inpatient into a unit for dissociative disorders for a week. I decide to continue loving and supporting her, regardless of what she has said about me to others.

When she gets out, she tells me that she had secretly been calling her friends in San Diego for years, and meeting with cult people. She then tells me pointblank, “I never got out, and never wanted to. That was all an act.” She smiles at me, “I am back with the cult fulltime now, at college, and am glad I am. I never wanted to leave.”

These memories are extremely difficult to share. Even now, more than twenty years later, as Elsa, I can feel the sting of the overwhelming hurt, humiliation, betrayal and bewilderment I felt when I learned that my precious children had been lying to me, slandering me to the therapist and relatives, and that they did not actually want to be with me. I realized for the first time that year, as Elsa, that their abreactions, nightmares, tears and other symptoms had been a carefully planned and programmed script to make me believe that we were healing together and that all was well. The words ‘devastated’, ‘heartbroken’, and ‘crushed’ are inadequate to describe the impact of this realization that my children had not been safe with me at all.

I had no idea that other parts in me – Ana and Luce – had always known this fact about my children; my programmed belief that Elsa remembering would mean the cult will kill my children had kept my amnesia completely intact. In fact, my account in this chapter shows that at that point as Elsa, I still not did actually have any memory of my children’s current Illuminati or Jesuit lives; my pain was a response to Sammy and Sandra themselves telling me to my face about their lies and slander, their desire to be away from me, and to remain in the cult. Why they stopped the pretense the year Sandra went to college is still a mystery to me. Possibly, it was simply to hurt Elsa, as a continued consequence of having betrayed the Illuminati several years ago. That is, Elsa, unlike my other presentations who had stayed loyal (Trixie, Trudi and Jeanne), was not allowed to be happy. Even prior to my children’s hurtful disclosures, as Elsa, I was constantly exhausted, overworked and subject to financial abuse by my husband Jimmy.

As Elsa, I would remain amnesic to my own and my children’s cult lives for over another ten years. When different parts started to communicate on these issues again after I left the Jesuit Order in 2007, the rest of the picture that came out was even more devastating. Not only were my children still completely cult active when they lived with me in their teen years, but they had been sent back to me to control and handle me. Just as I as Ana had monitored and reported on their presentation programming when they were children and conducted regular reinforcements on them at home using mobile programming tools (see Chapter 19), they were monitoring me, reporting on and reinforcing my programming at home. The first time I recalled my teenage daughter placing a programming helmet on me at our home in Texas, I was in shock for days. It was just as stunning and painful for me to learn that Jimmy was actually a member of the Illuminati too, and that he had also been handling and controlling me. As Elsa, I had truly loved and trusted him, despite his financial irresponsibility.

I knew, as these memories came back, that their behavior was 'normal' and 'typical' for an Illuminati family. Had any of the three of them shown deviation from their programming in front of me during that period, I would have had to switch into Ana, and done the same to them. All families in international and larger national groups are programmed to report on one another, to report any signs of discontent or programming breakdown to leadership, and to draw one another back into the circle of the group. An individual's handlers are often members of their family, whether spouse or children. Nonetheless, it was an extremely painful thing to learn, and I cried for months. The pain is often what makes accessing and clarifying memories so difficult: as human beings, it can be easier to deny that the people we love most may be hurting us, or not wanting the best for us. This, along with the rejection, betrayal and sense of being used that being coerced or "handled" causes, usually strengthens amnesia for many survivors.

It is the year 2000, I am nearly 44 years old. As Luce, I have continued to work hard for the Order. I have retired from my position as the fourth general due to age, and now serve as a senator. Just as Mattie and Mattheo did for younger members of the Order, besides my own missions and projects, I spend much time guiding and mentoring up-and-coming leaders from various units in according to my specific areas of expertise in science, programming, and politics. After a few years of captaining the 33, I was now also officially retired from the 33, but was often called on to assist in analyzing intelligence from the ground, and to provide my thoughts on which of the younger children might be future candidates for the 33.

It is the Christmas season, so the facility is beautifully decorated. But I have no joy in it. One of my genetic daughters, Felix, the best and brightest of her generation, is pregnant with Satan's child. Due to improved genetics, and spiritual support from a team to help her carry the spiritual oppression from the hybrid fetus, Felix has survived the pregnancy, reaching the ninth month. She is the first person to have made it this far in carrying a son of Satan, and the fathers treat her with worshipful care, respect and tenderness. Her eyes, though, reflect the weariness and despair from the darkness and oppression she is carrying in her womb. No 16-year-old should ever have a look like that in her eyes.

Very early on December 21st, as soon as midnight passes, Felix goes into labor. Her closest peers and mentors are in attendance. As I hear her screams, I hold her hand and try to send her my love with everything in me. Her twin sister wraps an arm around her shoulders, whispering words of love and encouragement. We fear that delivering the child will kill her from the physical, emotional and spiritual anguish.

Theo, or Satan in his beautiful form, is also there. He looks down at her on the birthing bed. He smiles. He tells us that since Felix is bearing the 'savior of the world', the 'light of the world', it would be fitting that she be crucified during the labor. I almost pass out. For a moment, I hope against hope that he is only making a rhetorical statement. He waves a hand in a do it now! gesture. Vitali murmurs an order to one of the other fathers in the room who leaves to obtain the equipment needed for this cruel, cruel act.

I watch numbly as her twins and Vitali, who I know love my daughter like their own lives, place her on a cross and nail her hands and feet to it. She screams, and arches her back against the cruel wooden cross with hands and feet nailed to it, as the labor goes on and on. We are all relieved when after twenty-four hours, Satan allows us to remove her from the cross. As we attend to her wounds, I tell her, "Stay; we love you, don't give up. You can do this, you're not alone."

She is in labor for three days. Lucient, her son, is born late on December 23rd. The child is physically beautiful. As the mother of his mother, I had been given the honor of being the one to catch him when he was born, then place him in his father's arms. Others are gathered around atan as he holds his newborn son. They have looks of awe and adoration, mixed with a slight unease. I see the satisfied, smug smile on Satan's face, and hide a shudder.

My daughter is near death. I and others, including her twin sister and brother, are trying to keep her alive emotionally and physically in the aftermath of this terrible birth. She is nearly comatose, but I give her sips of broth and tell her how much I love her. Her sister does the same, looking into her eyes and saying "I love you. Don't die and leave me."

As the hours pass, my daughter slowly revives then nurses her tiny son. To do so, she takes a golden knife, and cuts her breast enough to allow some blood to flow along with the milk, since Nephilim infants need blood as well as milk for nourishment. I grimace a bit at the thought of the pain this causes her, but the infant nurses greedily on this mixture of food and personal sacrifice. The birth had long, torturous, and nearly cost her life. Feeding him would cost her both blood and milk. I wonder what else he will cost her as he grows up.

By the next morning, Felix is nearly recovered. She is dressed like royalty in a deep, rich blue velvety robe trimmed with gold, and with golden slippers and a gold hairnet over her thick, dark hair. She still looks pale and shaky, but has received numerous injections of nutrients and fluids to support her recovery. Her infant son rests in her arms, then yawns and opens his blue, blue eyes and stares around the room. The hairs on the back of my neck go up, for this baby is looking at each of us, even this young, as if measuring us. A small halo of light surrounds his body, faint in the daylight, and I wonder what kind of being this is.

Theo is looking proud. “We will let the world see him in three more days,” he announces, “at a special banquet to celebrate his birth.” It is understood that this banquet will be attended by the heads of international occultic societies and carefully selected world leaders who have traded their souls and their countries to Satan in return for power. They will be shown this very special infant, and their allegiance to him will be required.

I leave Felix to help with the planning and preparations for the banquet. This is expected, and I dare not disobey my orders.

It is late the next day, and I come into my daughter’s chambers. Theo has left for a moment, carrying his young son into a room where the Vatican council meets.

“How are you?” I ask her, knowing that this is a stupid question. How can she be okay after…this?

“I’m okay, a little tired,” she answers. I look into her eyes and see the despair and trauma that this event has left on her soul. I hold her hand. “I love you,” I tell her.

“I know,” she answers. “That’s why I’m still alive, because you and my twins and the others love me. Otherwise, I would just have let go and not come back…”

I note that she does not mention her new son in this list of reasons she has survived this recent trauma to her heart, body, soul and spirit; there is no joy in the birth of a Nephilim child. I hold her quietly for a while, and then leave.

As I go, I see my daughter’s twins enter the room, and smile sadly at them. They return the sad smile, for they also understand that Lucient’s birth has changed the world – or so the Order believes. I wonder if they also wonder just what we have actually accomplished, in spite of all of the prophecies and eager awaiting that has occurred over the past few centuries. For this tiny infant does not seem like a “light” to me at all, but like something much darker. I leave the room, and go back to my duties, still bothered deep within. But I can tell no one of these secret doubts, for all must be joy and delight when discussing this being, and I join in as expected.

It is a few days later. A huge banquet hall has been set up with the finest place settings: gold and crystal, the most exquisite china, silk and linen. On a raised dais are my daughter, Lucient, Theo, and the current black pope, Vitali. Several people close to my daughter are also honored at a side table on this dais. There is laughter, joy and expressions of delight by the people honored to be invited here: the heads of the international occultic societies from around the world, and the carefully selected world leaders who have also given themselves to serve Satan. They believe Satan's newborn son is the "light of the world" whose arrival has been prophesied for generations, the "anointed one" who will lead the world into a new era. Knowing how painful and traumatic this "light's" entry was into the world, how it almost cost the life of my daughter, and the uneasy feelings I have each time I look into the infant's eyes, I struggle to maintain a demeanor of celebration to match those around me.

The infant will have mentors and tutors, and I am to be one of them. I dread this, because I know how difficult it is to work with Nephilim children. All who will work with this child must overcome a deep sense of instinctive dislike and unease. We will also have to protect ourselves from the terrible things he, like other Nephilim, can do, such as send tremendous horror or terror like a black cloud at those who hold them. We will also have to cope with the emotional impact of working with a creature that does not have to be trained to overcome reluctance at killing a human being, but enjoys inflicting pain, horror and death. The critical part of this infant's socialization will be to teach him not to give in to his lusts, but to wait for these "rewards" at the appropriate time. In other words, this infant will require special tutoring in order to prevent unnecessary deaths. The other trainers and I have learned this much over the years, working with the Nephilim infants that did survive in our ongoing project conducted in various facilities around the world (see Chapter 16).

Deep inside my spirit, beneath layers of trauma and programming, I know that this infant will bring chaos and destruction to mankind, if the occult prophecies are true that he is the "light" so long awaited. I desperately want to get away from him, and everything he represents. Deep inside, I plan to try to escape once again, in spite of the huge amount of pain and trauma that previous attempts have brought. I cannot be part of introducing this being to the world at large, and do not want to be his grandmother. I will do whatever it takes to break free.

I do know that what I have written here will be hard for many to believe. I do believe my memories, though, and how I wish that this was not true, and that I was not part of helping to bring this great evil into the world. I have asked God's forgiveness many times for my involvement in bringing the Nephilim back to earth; it has been a struggle many times to forgive myself because of the evil that such beings seek to inflict on mankind.

While I do believe my memories of Lucient being born, I want to make it clear that I do not claim that he is indeed the personage who is the 'antichrist' described in the book of Revelation. Satan claims that he is, and the Jesuit Order claims that he is; Satan may be lying, and the Order may be mistaken. What I can say without hesitation is that this product of man and fallen angel is evil indeed, and cannot possibly bring anything good into the world. The entire hybrid project was a sin against the God of the Bible, the sin that mankind before the flood in Genesis was committing. The flood described in Genesis shows God's judgment regarding this terrible sin, which the Jesuit Order was dedicated to replicating, with what I believe could be fearful consequences indeed. It is really a very bad idea to disregard God's commands and to listen to Satan's very bad ideas instead.

Epilogue

This book covers the years from age 14, when I first ran away and tried to escape, through age 43. During those years, I show the effect on me first as a young teen, and later as an adult, of the programming I endured since I was in the womb on my beliefs, behaviors, and spirituality. But I also show here my deep desire to be free of the cult, even as a highly programmed adult in the group. They could program me, but not completely take away my deep, innate desire to be free of the abuse and terror that serving Satan creates in the members of the Jesuit Order – and many other groups that serve this creature, as well. While I struggled to break away, and was reaccessed and reprogrammed, I could not agree with what the Order was doing, as I share in this book. It would be seven years after this book ends that I would find real, lasting physical safety for the first time in my life, and begin really healing and remembering not only what my front presentations knew, but my real life growing up in a Jesuit cult facility. I will cover these years in the third book, Getting Free.

I don't want to leave people feeling that it is "too hard to get free" or discouraged. I debated whether or not to share on these pages what it was really like to try and get away, and the awful things that the Jesuits did to punish me as a result. But how can we help survivors, if we don't understand what they are up against, when they show up in a counseling center, or a church office, courageously asking for help? Uninformed help can be as bad as no help at all, and a simple pat on the head and quick Bible verse will not meet the needs of an individual who may be literally fighting for their life, and struggling against the forces of hell itself. I chose to share the full, real story here, because we need to know how these groups operate (realizing that all groups do not act as the Jesuits do, many groups do things very differently, but retaliation in some form against disloyalty is almost universal among organized occultic groups). My hope is that this autobiography will help inform therapists and ministers of what survivors face, and help them think about what might be helpful to them as a result.

I feel that I would be remiss if I did not share the real source of strength and courage in my life over the years, a source that never failed me throughout my journey, and how to know Him yourself: Jesus, the true Son of God, and the One who will reign for all of eternity when the occultic "Light of the World" is not even a faint memory one day.

This was the prayer I prayed at age 14: "Dear Jesus, I acknowledge to You that I am a sinner – that I have done things in my life that were wrong. I agree with the verse in Romans: "all men have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." I sinned against You and God in the things that I have done or thought, or failed to do in my own life, and I ask for your forgiveness, because you went to the cross, died for my sins, and took my sin and the sins of the whole world on yourself. You were the blameless sacrifice for my sins, and because of your death on the cross, You purchased my complete forgiveness and redemption. Thank You for dying for my sins, and I receive what You did for me, the forgiveness of sins. By doing so, I am a child of God, a new creation in Christ."

My greatest hope is that if you do not know Jesus personally as your savior, that you will pray this prayer and receive the gift of what He has done for you. As you can see from my story, He can forgive ANYTHING – and I mean ANYTHING, as will be shown even further in the final volume of this series.

About the Author

Since 1999, svali has written articles and led online groups to help educate survivors and the public regarding dissociation, ritual abuse, mind control and the work of organized occult groups internationally. Her articles and free book (Breaking the Chain) have been translated into five languages and read by both survivors and therapists around the world. Her book about how programming is done and suggestions on how to heal, It's Not Impossible, has also been translated into four languages, and has been used by survivors, therapists, prayer ministers and those who support survivors from around the world to gain a greater understanding of these topics. She has also written Never Give Up, Part 1 of her autobiography, covering the first 13 years of her life while growing up in a cult facility, in order to promote a better understanding of how one organized, well-funded occultic society does its programming.

A former trainer for an international occultic group, she left the group nineteen years ago, and currently helps to educate others about topics related to ritual abuse and mind control through articles and podcast interviews.

Never Give Up – Chapter 8 Excerpt

This is one section from Chapter 8 in my autobiography, Never Give Up, about sex parties.

Trigger warning: mentions sexual abuse of young children

I am four years old. My twin sister, Elizabeth, and I are naked, covered only with dark blue velvet cloaks. Around our necks are jeweled collars, and we are being led in on a lease as if we are a pair of dogs by one of the fathers. Once inside the huge room which is filled with adults in various states of dress and undress, many with wine or cocktail glasses in the hand, we wait.

There is a large raised pedestal in the middle of the room. It is about four feet by four feet, made of granite, with small steps in the back. Liz and I watch as one by one, young children are led up to the pedestal. They must stand, naked, while adults in the room "bid" for the chance to have sexual activities with each child for the night. The trainers discuss the sexual training that each child has, and bids are made with small, hand-held fans encrusted with jewels, scarlet and blue patterns, and gold leaf. Winners of each bid come up to the platform to collect their prize for the night.

Liz and I are two of the lucky ones. We each have a special temporary tattoo that lets those bidding know that we cannot be killed, although we can be used for anything else. This tattoo is a reminder that if we are killed, the person who killed us will suffer severe consequences, due to our "belonging" to an extremely influential person who wants us kept alive. We are on "loan" for the night, supposedly by the German father over the Illuminati, and we are supposedly his bastard children who have other skills that make him want us alive.

At some point, Liz and I are taken and led by our leashes onto the pedestal. I feel ashamed and embarrassed to be on display, naked, before a roomful of people, but have learned to hide this. I smile go to her. She does not tell me her name, but it is obvious that she is wealthy and powerful, not only from her jewels, but her body language and speech.

“What can you do, little girl?” she asks. While the trainer has already discussed my skills, she wants to hear it from me; maybe this is some type of test, or maybe she wants to humiliate me further.

She smiles and describes her favorite extremely sadistic activities. Her teeth are white and gleaming as she smiles. With dismay, I realize that those same teeth will be used soon to bite me in extremely sensitive, private areas. I tremble slightly, knowing that this is what she wants to see, but my reaction is not completely acting. I am sorry a woman bid because they can be some of the cruelest, most sadistic abusers. It is almost as if they have spent years devising ways to give “payback” for their own early sexual abuse but with interest. I have always wondered why they seem to be most vicious to little girls, wondered whether this is working out their own childhood abuse on a child that reminds them of themselves, but I never voice this out loud to a client. I do voice these thoughts with the fathers during debriefing afterwards.

I perform well. I let the sadistic woman have her way with me for hours. She seems very inventive, and I feel worn out emotionally and physically by the early morning. I am also sore everywhere. I have screamed appropriately, sensing that this is what this woman wants to hear as she abuses me. Finally, finally she herself is tired and falls asleep. Quietly, I get up and look for my twin. I worry about her in situations like this, as I know she worries about me. Tattoo or no tattoo, there is always the concern that a client might get carried away and go too far; many enjoy abusing children to death. But to my great relief, I see her sitting in a corner of the room, half asleep.

The father who brought us in, who is thought of in the German Illuminati as one of their trainers, but is actually a Jesuit father, sees that we are done with our clients. He brings my sister and me our cloaks. We are grateful to be covered, that the night is almost over, and leave with him. Outside, he takes us into a waiting van, unsnaps our leashes, and talks to my sister and me.

I then realize that like me, he also had concerns, and was monitoring both of us and our clients closely during the night in hopes to intervene in time if something life-threatening seemed to be imminent.

Carlotti asks, “What did you learn while you were there?” He is asking us for intel, prompting us to report the conversations among adults in the room that we were listening to throughout the night, adults who did not suspect that four-year-old children were capable of being agents with photographic memories who would report any information discussed by them while in a drunken state. We give him the information he requests.

Once we are in a safe house not too far away, one owned by the Order, Lizzie and I are given baths, and wash off the body fluids that our clients left with us. We are also given medications to help prevent disease. Father Carlotti inspects us carefully to ensure that there is no significant harm. He provides healing technology for a rectal laceration that I have, and a gash in my twin’s arm inflicted by her client, a male, biting her.

“Human bites are the worst,” he mutters, as he cleans out the bite with a special formula, applying healing so that no scar is left. He then says to both of us, “I am so proud of you. I love you so much.”

Lizzie and I then go to sleep in soft, warm beds that are side-by-side. I go to sleep holding my sister’s hand.

“I love you, Lizzie” I tell her.

Of course, Lizzie and I told ourselves that we were two of the “lucky ones” with the special tattoo. We had seen and heard far too many children who were called expendable by the adults around us die slow, terrible deaths at these parties. Secretly, deep inside, however, I wonder if the children who died, who no longer have to experience any more pain, were the lucky ones. I can’t say this to Lizzie, or she will be forced to let the fathers know, and this will be emotionally painful for her. So I keep silent.

All children in the Jesuit Order are trafficked, but we did not define it that way. Attending and being abused at these types of parties held by the extremely wealthy in Europe and other countries was framed as doing a “mission”, one that involved a specific set of skills, skills that could “help the Order.” What we did was not defined as being abused, but as participating in a potentially dangerous activity. But all missions were dangerous to some extent. We were allowed to be “real agents” according to the fathers, and they were using our deep desire to do great things for the Order, when we were put in these situations.

But the reality is that my twin sister and I, and all of the other children I grew up with, were being terribly sexually abused and trafficked. The fathers who forced us to do this had been subjected to non-stop sexual abuse as children themselves. They did not realize how monstrous what they were asking us to do was; after all, they had to do it when they were young as well.

But the terror, anguish, sadness, grief and sense of betrayal, along with deep rage at the father who led my sister and me into this potentially life-threatening situation, risking our lives for the sake of gaining useful information, came forward as I processed this memory.

Thank you svali for your honesty and openness, and the lessons and deep truths that are coming forward through it.
Only the Lord Himself can sift through the complexities of all of this. I have no idea how, but I am so grateful that He is working things out now, and will be completing it all very, very soon.
I honor every child who is fighting these types of battles right now, as well as those of us who have throughout our lives, and especially those who never even had a chance to live.

NEVER GIVE UP

SVALI SPEAKS

The Autobiography of a Survivor of Ritual Abuse and Mind Control

Dedicated to the brave survivors around the world who have worked to get free of cult and mind control abuse, and the wonderful people who support them. Thank you.

Also, to the One who has made my journey out of the cult possible and given me the courage to share the things written within these pages: the true Jesus Christ.

Foreword

For the last thirty years, I served in the field of trauma recovery, first as a clinical therapist and later, as a prayer minister with a specialty in helping survivors recover from ritual abuse. I believe the field owes svali a huge debt of gratitude for her latest contribution of Never Give Up. I so appreciate the brave and difficult sharing of her life story and the sheer courage it has taken her to stand up against such evil in order to shed light on how the sophisticated techniques of mind control shape and indoctrinate a child into loyal devotion to her cult group. Svali takes us through her childhood journey that is actually no childhood but is more like one nightmare after another until she begins to question what she is being told and forced to do that is so incongruent with her heart. We, both survivor and helper, benefit from her labor of love in sharing her story with us. Survivors can receive insight into their own stories from one of the best explained examples of cult indoctrination I have read. Survivors can witness how mind control is accomplished as well as use the examples in this book for validation of their own similar memories and experiences. Helpers receive valuable information about the complexities of cult abuse, what struggles a survivor will likely encounter to risk breaking free and the astounding service gaps in our culture to aid survivors to break free.

This book is not an "easy read". While the stories are shared with captivating details that will keep the reader's interest, the stories of human tragedy and disregard for human life makes this difficult to absorb and the reader is left with wonderment at what causes such evil in our society. As a Christian prayer minister, I believe that our battle is not against flesh and blood but against spiritual forces of darkness. Satan's tactics are exposed by svali in the stories she recalls. Svali describes the methods used by the trainers to accomplish their purposes which are inspired by the dark forces the cult group calls the "Immortals", the spirits they serve and worship. At one point, svali points out that Satan and his minions cannot force humans to do anything against their will but must have agreement from humans to accomplish his evil plans. In numerous examples, svali shares how her trainers work with her agreement to coax her into accepting what she is participating in. From these stories, we receive insights into generational patterns in cults of agreeing to perform dark deeds out of fear of reprisal from the trainers, out of a belief of needing to obey to survive and/or protect other's lives from destruction, and a deceptive redefinition of immortality perpetuating a belief of superiority that there are those worthy to live and those who are expendable.

Satan must deceive, seduce and terrify humans into cooperating with him. He must also work within the needs and desires of the human race to entice compliance from his subjects. The trainers simply use rewards and punishments to reinforce a child's need to survive and to be loved, accepted, belong and feel special to someone. Svali's descriptions of how these basic attachment needs are manipulated and used by the cult trainers provide sharp clarity for understanding how a child is controlled into cooperating through working hard to numb and dissociate while preforming abhorrent tasks of torture on other human beings in order to achieve the trainer's praise, attention and affection and avoid their severely punishing responses for disobedience. If the trainers only used fear and intimidation to force obedience from their subjects, the fear would not be sustained and the training would fail. These sophisticated trainers know that the manipulation of attachment needs is crucial to establish loyalty in their subjects. As the Bible says, "love never fails" and a child will do whatever it takes for love even for occasional moments of love doled out to them according to the trainer's strict schedule.

There is no greater human motivator than love. Love is what drove svali for years to serve a group with which she increasingly became disillusioned. But through it all there was another One who was pursuing her with love and He never let her go. This is a story ultimately about unfailing love. In this first book that describes parts of her early childhood, svali slaves for the scraps of love that are given to her under conditional terms from her trainers. Even so that love is powerful enough to harness her attachment and loyalty until a greater unconditional love begins to break through to her and call her out of the entrapment of the cult environment. In the second book of her story, Never Give Up, of her teen years and adulthood, svali will share much more on how the unconditional love of God pursues her, forgives and restores her, and keeps pursuing her until she finds the strength to break free.

In her pursuit of freedom, svali found very little help from the outside world to break free. Of all the various groups of people in the world, I can think of few others more in need of resources and help than those escaping mind control cults and yet there are so few good resources. Part of the difficulty has been a lack of education and understanding of how difficult it is to break away and how much opposition the survivor typically endures from their groups. After reading svali's story, we readers can no longer claim a limited understanding for our lack of response. I heard svali say once that she believed there would be a mass exodus from the cult if survivors of cults knew there was a place for them to belong outside their groups with people who would love and care about them. I hope that svali's labor of love to us through sharing her difficult story will be the impetus to cause others to open their hearts and doors to survivors in their homes, churches, and communities to begin to provide the greatly needed resources for their freedom.

About the Author

Introduction

I remember being told, when I was a very young child, to say the words, with other children, "Ich bin eine kinder macht zachens gut" (I am a child who does things well). I believed it then, because life really was about performing well. But now, as I am older, I realize that this was not really true. I was a child who desperately wanted to be loved.

This is an autobiography in which I describe parts of the first twelve years of my life growing up in a highly organized and extremely wealthy occultic group: the Jesuit Order. Their wealth enables them to build extremely sophisticated programming studios and laboratories, and to use and develop advanced healing and mind control technologies. This autobiography does not include all memories, of course, since that would require a library of books. Instead, I share the memories that stand out the most from these early years. It is thus a "snapshot" of various scenes I lived through as a child to show what it was like to experience these events. While in previous books, I have discussed programming more from the observer perspective, in this book, I am much more personal.

This book is not written in chronological order. The first chapter covers a few key milestones in my infancy. The remaining chapters are grouped according to topic, and cover memories from various ages within that topic. In these chapters, I often share how early trauma and training lay the foundations for later programming and training for the skill area or job discussed in that chapter.

I realize that some of the memories I share, especially in the mage and spiritual training sections, may be hard to believe. I may be accused of having read too many 'fantasy novels' (which I never have and never will read since they have always frightened me). I believe that instead, some (but, of course, not all) writers in that genre may be actually drawing from their memories of these types of things. I am also aware that some of the events I describe can be attributed to cult members dressed in costumes in elaborate setups, the use of virtual reality, drugs and hypnosis and other forms of trickery.

However, I also believe that not all things that occur in our world can be explained this simply. I believe that there is a spiritual, or even unknowable element to some experiences, i.e., encounters with forces that defy material or rational explanation. All that I can do is to share for the record my own encounters with these beings according to how I experienced these events, alongside the memories of the more mundane and very physical events of my childhood growing up in an occult training facility.

My memories are not unique. Many survivors around the world from various cults and agencies that practice mind control have reported similar things, including the military and assassin training, the training to respond to visual codes, tones, colors and other cues; spiritual training, and being wedded to Satan. None of these training and events are unique to the Jesuit order, although methods may vary from those used in other groups.

I have heard concerns that sharing memories about programming is giving too much information, possibly providing a "blueprint" for "how to program people." I do not agree because programming involves much more than reading how one group does things. Reading memories of how one organized group programs their members, and then being able to program others, i.e., elicit the desired behaviors and beliefs in the subject, would be similar to reading a book on quantum physics, and then being able to build a spaceship. It simply can't be done. A lot more knowledge and skill are required to be able to program people than is described in this book. Additionally, the groups capable of conducting the kind of programming described in this book are already doing the things described here, since this is from fifty years ago and things have advanced exponentially since then.

I have written this autobiography for several reasons. One is to expose what is going on in a world that is increasingly confronting what can simply be termed as “evil”, and some of the experiences that produce people capable of this evil. I also want to validate the memories of those who have survived similar types of abuse. I describe the impacts of such abuse on a young child and over that person’s lifetime, and hope that this would be helpful not only to survivors, but also to therapists and others who support survivors. To emphasize hope and the incredible strength and capacity for humanity that survivors retain despite pervasive early abuse, I share too how I began to question and break free of the abuse and control, despite my years of indoctrination, trauma and mind-controlled, programmed obedience to the Order where I had perpetrated against others under orders.

In the book I describe several memories of the Order investing tremendous amounts of time, effort, manpower and finances on the spiritual training and spiritually-themed programming of their infants and children. Some readers may ask, “Why on earth do they go to such a great lengths to instill occult beliefs in their children?” The answer is that the Jesuit Order in its dark side completely believes in the concepts of ascension (into immortality, bliss and fulfilment) and descension (into mortality and hell). Religion is a great motivator, as seen historically and around the world, and the Jesuits are no exception. They are fervent in their beliefs in ascension and descension to a degree that would put to shame many of the most fervent believers in many faiths. They spend a great deal of time passing their beliefs on to each new generation, as my memories illustrates, and believe that children must be introduced very early to these concepts in order to fully believe and grasp such concepts. As very young children learn best through concrete experiences, they train and program children through the use of older cult members dressed up as spiritual entities, and take them through studios designed to look like locations in the spiritual realms or dimensions. They believe that without these early concrete experiences, the child when older will eventually have much greater difficulty in accessing the dimensions, and seeing, hearing and interacting with immortal beings who assist with ascension.

Finally, this is my personal story. As human beings, we each long for someone to hear our story, whether good or bad, as this is part of the processing that occurs for those who have survived extreme trauma. In a sense, this is my narrative shared with the world now, in hopes that it will accomplish some good, and provide some hope for others who long to be free.

The memories shared within these pages are the result of 35 years of working at healing. These memories did not come forward quickly, easily or painlessly. It involved many years of journaling, therapy, prayer ministry, using dolls and other toys to act out what had happened, as well as other modalities. Over time, I have gained a much better understanding of what my life was, and as a result, what I want to rest of my life to be. I want it to be free of the manipulation, the demands for performance, and the spiritual darkness that characterized my younger years. My greatest desire is to now live my life in thanksgiving to the God of the Bible, and His son, Jesus, who have forgiven me for the terrible – and painful – things I was forced to do, throughout my life.

Defining Some Terms Used in this Book

Dissociation and Programming: When a person is subjected to extreme pain to the degree that his/her mental, emotional or physical survival is threatened, that person can dissociate, i.e., create a new state of consciousness that is capable of doing anything in order to survive or stop the trauma. Emotional traumas, such as abandonment, even in the absence of physical traumas, especially by an attachment figure, can also cause dissociation. This new state of consciousness is extremely suggestible. Programmers in the cults consider this a type of tabula rasa state: in order to survive, this new state of consciousness will believe/do/feel whatever it is told to think/do/feel and is easily convinced that this compliance is what stops the abusers from abusing him/her. Common terms for these new states of consciousness include “personalities”, “parts” or “alters”. The goal of cult-controlled dissociation as described in these pages is to ‘program’ the child: (1) subject a young child to enough pain, physical or mental, or both, to create new states, (2) give them names or codes, (3) teach these new states specific beliefs, emotions and/or jobs, (4) condition these parts into continued compliance by reward and punishment. In this book, I use the term ‘parts’.

Cult host: the cult host is the part of the child raised in a cult who lives the child’s cult life, e.g., this is the part who is out in the body during rituals, meetings and lessons in the cult facilities, and so on. This part will not be amnesic to the cult activities. For me, this was the part of me that felt most substantial and most like the “real me” since most of my life was spent in cult facilities or carrying out duties for the cult in other settings.

Presenter: In the Jesuit order, these are the parts of an individual that are created to be “out”, or to present and live in the “normal world” in “ordinary families” outside the training facility. These parts are programmed to present in various countries, and will have families that host them starting at age three. Each presenter in each country will have been programmed to have its own name, personality, abilities and preferences, and to be completely amnesic to all cult activities, as well as to the activities of the other presenter parts. Despite being one set of parts, they will believe that they are the entire person, and only recall an ordinary life with no hint of any cult existence. Presenter parts are typically programmed to disbelieve, deny, or be highly distressed by any cult-related memories.

Internalize: During early childhood, we tend to internalize the things we experience and see (building a sense of reality and how the world works). Programmers take advantage of this natural developmental period to introduce parts to concrete experiences that demonstrate to the child the scenarios, people and beliefs that they want the child to internalize. For instance, if they want the child to internalize a castle, they will take the child to spend time in this castle. If they want the child to develop an internal ‘castle guard’, they will have a designated part spend time with a castle guard (to role model the beliefs and behaviors), then dress the part up as a castle guard and have the part act out this role. This kind of ‘internalization’ is common across individuals who experience early trauma, for instance, the person who realizes that they still hear their critical parents’ voices inside their heads long after they have attained adulthood. Due to the dissociation, parts subject to these setups may only have experiences of the ‘reality’ that their programmers had them ‘experience’.

Programming studio: These are large dedicated rooms or areas for programming in the cult facilities. These studios would rival the best of any Hollywood filming studio. They can be designed to look like any place that the programmers need, e.g., space ships, pyramids, underwater caverns, the city of Troy, a circus, etc. They have state-of-the-art lighting, animatronics, holograms, walls, ceiling, and floors that are screens that can display any scenario, and other audio-visual technologies to create extremely realistic experiences for the child being programmed in them. During programming scenarios, the adults and older children will put on costumes and act out the scenes (for instance, in a ‘hell’ scene, they may dress up as demons) that the programmers want the infants and children to learn about and eventually internalize.

Programming laboratories: Often located in the same buildings as the programming studios, these are areas dedicated to research on programming, and where children and adults receive assessments, health checkups, programming schedules and other processes that are critical to their programming. Very sophisticated equipment for programming, data collection, data management and so on is part of these labs.

The Fathers: Individuals in the Jesuit Order, both men and women, (yes, there are both sexes in the occultic side of this order, unlike the male only fathers in the public side) who have undergone the full training required and completed the coming of age ceremony at age 13 (described later in this book), are titled 'fathers'. For instance, as a child, I called my primary mentor, "Father Mattheo".

The Fathers I Loved: As the Order understands the importance of attachment and community for mind control, each child raised in the Order will be given 12 primary Fathers to be bonded to from infancy. Three of these 12 will be designed as the child's primary programmers, and the child will be conditioned to bond most strongly with these three fathers. This bonding starts in the womb, then throughout infancy and childhood. It is common for individuals in the Order to be assigned three new primary programmers as they become adults. This is to ensure that the person continues to be bonded to agents capable of controlling them as their original programmers age, and that there is no risk of losing control over that individual should their original programmers die. These new programmers are typically selected from among peers who he/she is already very close to, such as a twin, a classmate (who is as close to them as any biological sister or brother could be), or a close mentor.

Class: At the age of six, children raised in the Jesuit programming facilities are assigned to a class consisting of eleven other children their own age, to create a group of twelve for each class. There are multiple classes within each facility, and each class will have their own dormitory. These children eat together, sleep together, go to classes together, go through physical training together, and bond extremely closely to one another. The fathers tell them that they are "sisters" and "brothers". The children consider their classmates to be sisters and brothers, emotionally, even if not genetically. Along with the fathers, these classmates comprise the child's "family" when growing up in the facility.

Mage: The Jesuit Order is very occultic. Each child will have spiritual mentors who have achieved the status of a mage, an individual who has become extremely well versed in occultic knowledge, incantations, spells, and rituals over many years of training, intense study and testing. Mages are expected to mentor those younger than them, and to help raise up a new generation of mages. They are skilled in oral teaching, ancient languages and are often master storytellers, since much of the information is also passed down in oral form. All children are expected to become mages themselves. I use the term 'mage' instead of other terms for practitioners of the occult arts, such as 'wizard', 'sorcerer', 'magician' or 'witch' as this is the term that parts used when sharing their memories.

Ascended Master: This is considered by the Jesuits the highest form of spiritual achievement. These individuals are considered as close to ascension as a human being can achieve while still walking the earth.

Immortal: The Order believe that immortals are beings who are trying to help mankind ascend and become like them, and to teach them how to overcome their mortal flesh. "Overcoming the mortal flesh" includes suppressing the desires within a human being that make them flinch away from interacting with these beings, and accepting the pain and long, difficult training that the fathers believe is necessary to ascend. The Jesuit fathers utterly and completely believe in these immortals, and in the theology of ascension and descension.

Demon: I believe that the immortals and other spiritual beings described in this book are actually demons, or what the Bible describes as fallen angels. These beings were formerly filled with glory and were in the presence of the true God of the Bible. However, the one named Lucifer (now known as "Satan") chose to rebel against the loving creator of the universe, due to pride (he wanted to be as God). In his rebellion, the Bible says that one third of the angels followed Lucifer and became fallen angels, or demons are they are commonly known. Demons can also refer in some theologies to the souls of individuals or Nephilim who are wandering the earth. In my book, I am not referring to this interpretation, but instead, to the "fallen angel" definition. While I believe that both angels and demons are real, as the memories in this book make clear, some of the "demons" I encountered in childhood were actually older children or adults in costumes. Also, I had many parts who were programed to believe they were demons. This is extremely common in ritual abuse and mind control groups. These parts are usually very young children. These parts, when they came out, would growl, threaten, and act very convincingly according to how people believe demons would act. In reality, however, they were frightened little children who had been given a difficult role to play inside, whether as a punisher, a guardian, or other jobs.

Chapter 1: Infancy

One of my first memories is of looking at the light sifting in through an outside window. I am an infant, and am being held, and allowed to look outside for a brief moment. I am old enough to hold my head up and body straight, as I peer longingly at the outside world, at the soft greens, browns and blues of grass, earth and sky. I wonder if even then, I was longing to be free from the facility that was almost my whole world the first three years of life.

I was conceived in a genetics laboratory in Switzerland, the product of "state of the art" genetic manipulation. I was a "generation 3" baby in the Order, from one of the batches of genetically designed babies that were 'benefiting' from their latest round – the third one - of genetic knowledge, including the ability to isolate genes for intelligence, strength, and quick healing. I know this from looking later in life at my own records, once I had clearance at the cult facility as a trainer myself. As an adult in the Order, I also read my own records of the programming done to me while in utero, but I have no conscious memories of the programming; only vague, inchoate feelings of rage, sadness, joy, love and rejection, and feeling very disturbed at the thought of what these feelings could mean.

All I can really be sure of is that as a fetus, my life was unpleasant and manipulated, a mixture of reward and punishment, to prepare me for what was to come when I was born. What was distressingly omitted was something I had never known, but instinctively craved: real love without conditions. It was to become a deep longing throughout my life. Later in life, after I left the Order, during my healing journey I met fetal parts from the prenatal period of my life. These fetal parts had not only their original memories, but had also been programmed throughout my lifespan. This made their memories a mix of primal fetal rage, fear, and pain due to early traumas, and the meaning their programmers gave these memories.

My next conscious memory, a brief flash, is of being held lovingly by a woman who is rocking me in a chair, while she nurses me at her breast. The room is white; the woman is dressed in white, and she is singing me a song about how the best and bravest do great things for the Order, smiling tenderly at me the whole time. I am content, and love her, this woman who is one of my primary trainers, as she soothes me after a programming session that I no longer remember, or want to remember, wanting simply to experience being held and loved for this point in time. There is no other type of love available, so like a sponge, I soak it up.

Another memory flash: men in white lab coats come through the nursery, checking each infant. I am in a metal crib with bars, and want to get out, but I am still too young to try. But even then, the thought of escape, while unattainable then, simmers in the back of my mind. The problem is that it is getting fuzzier, a bit harder each day, to know exactly what it is that I want to escape, but even during rest, I feel deep within that something is very wrong here, something that I need to get away from, regardless of the soothing words and loving pats on the back.

I want to note here that early trainers are both male and female, and in the facility that I was raised in, female trainers often nursed young infants as part of the bonding, and also to comfort them after stressful training sessions. The trainers were sometimes given injections of hormones to lactate if they were not actively lactating. The Jesuit fathers were well aware of the importance of attachment in development, and in programming. The fathers who programmed me were dissociative as well; there was a tradition of abuse that created dissociation for many centuries in the Order. The love and nurturing they showed was real; it was not "fake", but it was still manipulative, because they were not free to love the way that I believe many of them longed to. They were all slaves to fear – the fear of disobeying Satan – and this fear made them unable to love in a truly free or healthy manner. What they did instead was to pour out the love within them in the carefully prescribed ways that were permitted, such as when holding and nursing the babies. When I was older, this was one of the ways I was allowed to be tender, and I loved cuddling and holding the babies. Even in this terribly abusive environment, the members of our group found ways to express love whenever we could.

Josef Mengele's Cruelty

I am in the infant nursery at some point later in time. There are dozens of us infants in this room. We are in little metal cribs with metal rails, on mattresses with white sheets. We all wear little white soft long shirts and linen diapers, and can see each other through the bars of our cribs, or when we pull ourselves up to stand and peek over. Today, one of the other babies in the nursery is pulling himself up, and is energetically trying to climb over the raised rail of his crib. Interested, I pull myself upright, using the rail of my crib, to get a better view of what he is doing. He tries to climb over, drops back, then keeps trying, until finally, he falls right over onto the white tiled floor with a "thump!"

All of us other babies stare, and wonder if we can do the same; it looks like fun! The baby who escaped happily crawls around to the other cribs, as if urging us to join him. He seems to act a bit triumphant and proud of himself. Then, he crawls towards the main door to the nursery, which seems to be the way out since that is where all the trainers go through when they leave. Suddenly, footsteps are heard, the door swings open, and an enraged Mengele comes stomping into the nursery. His glasses and hair are quivering with rage.

He yanks the little boy baby on the floor up by one arm, and takes him over to a large wooden table in the middle of the room. He takes a large steel cleaver off a nearby table, and suddenly he chops the infant's hands off on the table top, with loud "thunks". All of us other infants stare at this scene with wide eyes of horror. We are silent, too terrified to even scream. Then, Mengele takes the little boy baby, and hangs him upside down from a hook in the middle of the nursery, to bleed to death in front of us all. The blood drips down, and the terrified baby screams as his white shirt turns scarlet, until finally, his cries slowly stop as the life ebbs out of him in spurts.

During this act of dying, Mengele glares at the rest of us infants, and screams in German, "This is what happens to "bad babies" who don't obey or try to get away!" Terrified at what I have just witnessed, shaking inside, I decide then not to try to crawl out of my crib, regardless of how wrong things feel in this place. I decide to bury these feelings of wanting to escape deep inside, because I very much want to live. Being the object of Mengele's anger is a very, very bad situation to be in, and I try to conform to what he wants as best as I can, even at this young age.

Mengele could be unutterably cruel, as this scene demonstrates. In our facility in Italy, he was the top trainer, due to the large amount of new programming information that he developed during the war years. This is why in occult groups, he is at times referred to as "the father of modern programming." He discovered that fetuses and very young infants could be programmed, and that in fact, programming done at these impressionable ages when the brain is developing rapidly, is less likely to break down later in life.

Being raised in a cult facility just north of Rome, Italy, the memories I share in this section are some of my earliest ones. I have other memories of Mengele, who I believe, along with Hilde, his blond, blue-eyed assistant, were both dissociative. I believe that they were products of the extreme and cruel programming methods of the early 1900s, when attachment was less understood, and sociopathic personalities were more likely to develop. As far as I know, Hilde, who was raised with him and endured the horrors of their childhood together with him, was the only human being that he trusted, although he did obey orders from those who paid him to program their children, both in Italy and other countries.

Mengele and Hilde were two of my infant trainers, but not my only ones (thank goodness!). I shudder to think of what kind of human being I would have grown up to be if I had not also experienced the kindness at times from the Jesuit fathers who were my primary attachments.

Survival of the Fittest

Mengele liked to use 'survival of the fittest" setups to cull out the weakest babies, and ensure that only the fastest, strongest, most intelligent babies were kept. Fortunately, due to the large numbers of babies that died, this setup was phased out quickly in the Order after his death. By then, I was an adult, and my influence as a trainer, along with that of Mattie, another top trainer, caused this change. We argued successfully that this method was needless, since there were other ways of assessing these qualities. We were also concerned about the long-term impact on the Order's unity, longevity and prosperity, if all our members believed deep in their unconscious minds that their peers were competitors for basic needs, and that the only way for them to survive was for their peers to die.

I can crawl, quickly, now that I am four months old, with soft curly brown hair starting to grow that matches the color of my brown eyes. I am athletic and fast, and perform well in the physical assessments. Today, I am in a small cage with bars. I can see two dozen other similar cages in the room, each containing a baby. I am hungry and thirsty, since I have not been fed for several hours. In the middle of the room are three bottles with formula. I look hungrily at them, I want one! Suddenly, the doors to all of the cages lift simultaneously, and a baby race is on. We all crawl as fast as we can to get to the bottles in the middle of the room.

I, and two of the other fastest babies get there first. Breathing hard, I grab a bottle and start drinking the life-giving, nourishing formula. But two other babies are trying to grab the bottle away from me, they are hungry too. There is a fist grabbing for the bottle, and another baby is climbing onto my back. I have to fight them off, kicking, biting, twisting and turning my back on them, all the while trying to drink the formula as quickly as possible. I am able to successfully keep my bottle and fend off the other hungry babies, using my strong, chubby little legs to kick some away, and get enough formula in me to allay my hunger – and to survive. After a few days of this scenario, the weakest babies are crawling extremely slowly, and I, along with two other of the strongest babies are able to drink a full bottle with barely any resistance from the others.

Mengele walks into the room and picks one of the babies up who is drinking formula, cuddles him, and praises us three, looking at us with a smile. "You are good babies, strong and smart," he tells us. He then goes around the room, and one by one, he hangs a baby from a hook through its gut, in the middle of the room. "This was a weak baby," he says derisively. "This baby didn't try hard enough." He hangs others of the "weak" babies from hooks, and horrified, we three survivors watch. I realize deeply that, in order to survive, I must perform well. Surviving means performing well for Mengele, and I learn quickly to be fast and smart – to find the best way to do something. I don't want to end up on a hook, hanging in the middle of a room.

I am a toddler, several months later, and I hate Mengele, on whom my survival depends. Once again, I am in a cage in a room, with doors that can rise. Next to me is another toddler my age, a little girl. I smile at her, and she smiles at me. In the middle of the room is some food and water, and I already know what will happen.

Suddenly, the doors to our cages lift, and we all run to the middle, trying to fight off each other in a melee that includes mashed faces from tiny fists, kicking, and grabbing. I grab some food, which I eat quickly, grab a drink, and return to my cage.

This happens for two more days, but on this third day, I notice that the little girl in the cage next to me is weakening. I am starting to notice others more at this age, and seeing her look this way bothers me – a lot. When the doors lift, I race to the middle, grab some food, eat a quick bite, then return back to my cage. I then offer some of the food in my little fist to this other toddler. She smiles gratefully at me, but doesn't seem to want to eat; I wonder why, since I was extremely hungry before I ate some of the food. I go over to her cage, and try to put it in her mouth, but she doesn't eat, to my huge distress. I realize now as an adult that she was probably dehydrated and too weak to eat. "Eat, eat, eat" I tell her over and over, but even when I try to put the food in her mouth, she just closes her eyes and falls asleep.

The next morning, she dies and is taken away. As I watch her body being carried out, I cry silently, hiding my tears from Mengele, who would have punished this type of weakness. Fortunately, the fathers were more understanding, and disagreed at times with his methods.

That night, Mattheo, the father I love most of all, notices that I am upset. In my high-pitched little toddler voice, I sob and tell him about the other little girl.

"I am glad that you cared," he says. "But even more glad that you lived. There simply wasn't enough food for all of the babies." While he is trying to promote my acceptance, I can see in his eyes that he is sad and disturbed, too.

"I wanted to share, but she wouldn't eat," I say, crying.

"She was too weak to eat," he says. "But it was good of you to try. And very smart of you to try to find a way to help her."

Mattheo is a rising leader in the Order, and I am glad that he understands. In a few more years, he will be one of the fathers who initiates stopping these survival exercises, with the support of the younger trainers. I love Mattheo and the other fathers, and trust him more than I trust Mengele. But Mengele will never, ever suspect how I feel, because I want to survive, and Mattheo has made it clear that he wants me to live, too.

Many of the infants programmed by Mengele and other trainers in this type of scenario struggled with issues around food all of their lives. When adults, later in life, they hoard food, or gain weight, or become anorexic. Even as a young child, when hosted in my American presentation, I would sneak food and hide it under my pillow. My family teased me relentlessly about this habit, but allowed it, perhaps sensing the deep psychological need to do so.

Mattheo and the other fathers argued successfully to discontinue these methods for several reasons. One was seeing disturbances related to food in the children that survived. But another was that this programming promoted survival at the expense of others, while the Jesuits wanted their leaders to think of the good of all, when leading teams on missions; they wanted to promote a cohesive working together and bonding with each other that is part of life in the order, and this training went against it. Later generations – those after G7 in the Jesuit Order- would not have to undergo these extreme setups.

Sexual Training

I am just a few weeks old. One of the fathers I love, Father Jerome (who is also a primary trainer) comes into the nursery and stands over my crib. He looks at me lovingly, then takes my diaper off, and rubs me gently with his hand between my legs. It feels nice, but also odd; I feel confused. He continues for a while, and then puts his mouth between my legs.

This happens daily, as part of my early sexual training. I have never known anything else. When these things happen, I am called "Amis". At first, all is gentle and kind, and I learn to accept it as part of being loved by my trainers, as part of the daily routine. After all, this doesn't hurt, unlike some of the other things they do to me.

But after a few weeks, Father Carlotti, another primary trainer comes in. He has a special object in his hand; it is round, small, and not too hard, and he lubricates it and gently inserts it into my rectum. It is uncomfortable, and I wiggle and make a noise of dislike (I have learned not to cry and tantrum in rage already), but he makes a hand signal that means "Be still". The halt and be still commands are among the very first commands I have learned since birth, and so I go limp, as taught, and allow him to continue. After a few seconds more, he stops, and then picks me up and praises me. He tells me, "Amis, what a good baby you are!" with genuine love in his voice, looking me in the eyes with his beautiful amber brown eyes. I wiggle in delight; I have performed well, and he is happy with me, that is all that matters. I am learning that when asked to do things that hurt or make me feel sick inside, I must endure them for the ultimate reward afterwards: love and affection. Father Carlotti holds me against his strong, warm chest for a while, then takes me to one of the female fathers to be nursed.

I have already learned that when I don't perform as asked, I will be punished with even more pain, such as being held upside down by my legs, and whipped with a small but very painful whip. I prefer hugs and praise, so I do what I am asked to do, almost always. I am considered "programmable" and not "difficult" or "resistant" as some babies are, as I learn about when I am older and hear the fathers discussing different babies in the nurseries, categorizing this among other qualities. I also learn when allowed to watch the fathers as an older child that babies who are considered not "programmable" or "too difficult" get slated to be the infant or toddler that dies in various scenarios. But at this young age, I still don't know these things. I work hard to gain the smile and affection from the fathers, which is what they want – for me to perform in order to earn their love and approval.

I am five months old, a vigorous, healthy, happy, active baby. I can already sit up and crawl, and am practicing standing up. I also am able to speak some very simple two-word phrases, and understand my trainers when they speak with me. Father Mattheo, the father I love most of all, comes to my crib. He has some equipment that he hooks me up to, and inwardly I flinch, although outwardly I smile. This is equipment to shock me with, and I am already familiar with it.

He then calls out Amis, and some of the parts that she oversees inside, including Charté, a part that has been previously split from her. As he sexually stimulates Charté with his finger, he also applies mild, but painful, shock at the same time. I have learned not to flinch away from shocks, although internally I am upset at the pairing of what I have associated with "love" with this new pain. I can't help myself; salty tears run down my cheeks, but I don't flail or try to get away.

Mattheo continues doing this for five minutes, telling Charté over and over, "Love is pain. Love is pain. You love pain, it shows love." Afterwards, he stops the shocks, and holds her tenderly, saying, "You are a good baby, and I love you." Charté , while still upset, is glad that this was not a punishment, as shocks can be. He then looks into her young baby eyes, and says, "You must learn to do this. I know it is difficult, and it makes you feel angry, but this is important, and what you are learning is very, very important. I am not doing this to you to punish you, but because I love you. Charté, you are very special for learning to do this and will be able to do great things for me and the other fathers if you learn this." He, and the other fathers, always acknowledge the discomfort and understand the feelings, and discussing them with me and the other parts, even as infants.

Charté is learning to enjoy sadomasochistic sex, and to associate it with feelings of love, arousal, and feeling special and important. Later, she will be dissociated and reorganized into other parts who have only known these feelings, and she will oversee them as a sub-controller within Amis's system. These skills will be used when I am older to help me do missions with individuals who prefer this type of sex, including gathering intelligence or gaining favors. These skills, learned so young, will also help me to survive the extremely painful sexual acts that I will have to endure in some of the homes of the very wealthy around the world. In the order, they do not call us "trafficked", but "skilled"; and our being sent out for various forms of sexual abuse from earliest childhood are considered "missions" for the order.

But deep inside, I feel violated and angry. This is abuse, and my little baby heart and mind know it, even though all of the adults around me treat this as normal, and model it in their own lives. I have learned to hide my anger, but it is there, simmering deep inside. While I love the fathers who rock me, hold me, nurse me and love me, I also hate them with a deep, white-hot hatred.

One thing that the scene above illustrates is that even in infancy, the Jesuit programmers acknowledged how their abuse made me feel. They could tell, by my reactions, the look in my eyes. But then they normalized it within a framework of something that must be done in order to successfully complete missions, as necessary to show my love for them. The Jesuit fathers were masters at manipulating my infant need to attach and maintain a loving bond with them and used it to get me to accept their abuse. The Jesuit programmers understood that a child – even an infant – will do much more for love than in response to any amount of torture, and used this knowledge on me and the other infants I grew up with, just as it was used against them, continuing the cycle of abuse and its normalization generation after generation.

During my own healing, it was a struggle for Amis, Charté and other parts to realize that they had even been abused, since this was "love" to them, the only love they had ever known. They wondered what all the fuss was about when they wanted to continue their activities, even after I left the group, and became aware of their activities and wants that put us in extreme danger. I was quite surprised when Charté came out early in my healing journey, offering to sit on my therapist's lap and give him rough sex; I was also saddened realizing that she had been pushed out by another part inside who wanted to disrupt and distract from what I had been talking about with this therapist. Talking to these parts using logic didn't help. Holding them inside, spending time with them, and showing them other forms of love and experiences that were not sexual helped more.

As an infant, each day was broken up into programming, training, comfort, rest, play times and attachment/bonding time on a strictly regimented schedule in the facility nursery. The fathers in the order were experts in child development and were careful to balance training (which was gentle, and filled with praise very early on, with only mild punishments if any for inability to perform in the early weeks) with nurture. They realized that if a child was not given enough nurture, they could develop psychopathic tendencies, would be less controllable (since love is the greatest motivator), and would show other pathologies in psychological or physical development. They knew this because of the failed programming methods used in the early 1900s, when the children were not given enough nurturing and failed to attach to a loving adult caregiver: many had to be "put down" later as they developed severe psychopathic tendencies, to the point of killing the trainers that they did not love, without a twinge of regret.

Oh, how carefully the fathers monitored and doled out "love" to us infants, and we came to look expectantly for that special time each day with the "fathers we loved". Each infant had three primary fathers they bonded with, along with nine others who were also important to their emotional development and training. I loved three special fathers the most: Father Mattheo, Father Jerome, and Father Carlotti. I was also very closely bonded to Father John, an older female trainer, and Father Daniel, a female trainer who also nursed me and filled the "mother" role in my life. Females upon becoming a Jesuit father took on male names, so this was considered normal in the Order. The Jesuits always had several trainers that bonded closely to each infant, since they realized that otherwise, if an infant bonded to only one individual and that individual died, the baby or child would be at a huge risk for failure to thrive, or would be basically un-programmable. They learned this, also, from the failures of the early 1900s, when some children bonded to only one primary trainer, who died. Data was collected on these children, and they kept it in their huge library of training materials and information, as well as coded into a huge computer database that could be accessed with a simple series of codes and voice commands for those authorized to do so.

So I, and the other infants I was raised with, bonded to the fathers we loved. But the fathers I loved also tortured me and the other babies. Infancy and childhood was a strange mix of torture and being held and rocked lovingly; being nursed by the same individual who later sexually abused me.

I am just a few months old, and angry about the pain the fathers inflict upon me. I feel sullen. While I have been trained to look up and smile when the fathers come into the nursery, today, I turn away. I turn my back on these men and women who bring me daily pain. It is Father Carlotti who comes by my crib, and sees my angry turning away.

"You cannot act this way," he tells me curtly in Italian. "You are being a bad baby to act this way, and must be punished."

He then goes and gets a couple of wrist holders and straps. He places the wrist holders around my chubby wrists, and then as punishment hangs me by my arms from the side of my crib. This hurts terribly, I feel as if my small arms which do not yet have the muscles and ligaments to take this, are being wrenched out of their sockets. The muscles burn as they are stretched. My arms do pull out of their sockets and I scream in pain.

Carlotti repeats, "This is what happens to bad babies who turn away, and don't turn and hold their arms up." He holds me with one hand, releasing my wrists with his other, and assesses me for the extent of the physical damage. He takes me to a healing room, and uses technology to put the arms back into their shoulder sockets, and to heal the joints and ligaments that have been so painfully stretched.

"Don't do this again," he warns. I don't.

I came to hate and fear that phrase, "bad baby", used by Mengele and the fathers, as something to avoid at all costs. "Bad babies" cried, turned away from, and kicked at their programmers, and did not greet them with an unfailing smile. "Bad babies" were allowed one or two chances, but after that," bad babies" were hung on hooks from the nursery ceiling until they died, or were seen in "hell" later that day, being whipped to death by "demons" (children in costumes). We all learned to be "good babies": compliant and programmable, and never to show how we really felt about how we were being treated. We were taught to send that anger down into an "anger pit" filled with anger-holding parts inside; this rage would then be directed at other objects, such as Christians, outsiders, and most importantly, ourselves.

This inability to show my feelings at the person who caused them fostered intense dissociation which the fathers had already carefully conditioned me to rely on while in the womb and during the early weeks after birth. I already had the structure in place to 'dissociate away' into designated parts the angry feelings out of my fear of punishment for "bad babies" and to focus on performing well and being a "good baby".

In the memory above, I also mention the healing rooms. The programming facility had state-of-the-art healing technologies that even over sixty years ago were far ahead of what is commercially available to healthcare providers currently. There were vats filled with saline and electrolyte/mineral solutions of various types, with various types of frequencies to promote healing, and even artificial skin that when lit with a red light would help new skin to grow rapidly. Because of the ongoing, physical abuse, these technologies were necessary to prevent permanent scarring or disability for the children being programmed, as well as older children and adults who might come back injured from dangerous or strenuous missions, or who might be accidentally injured during training and military exercises.

The Drawer

I am a few months old, and I am upset. Father Jerome is taking out the wires and electrodes that I have come to hate; wires and electrodes that cause sharp, biting pain with the electric shocks that they conduct. I don't want this! When he tries to put the electrodes on me, I kick and squirm and wiggle away, struggling to avoid these stinging wires being placed on me.

"This type of behavior can't be allowed. Be still!" he commands sternly.

But I am not still. I disobey him, for I am still very small, and do not know yet what can be done to ensure compliance. His command instills less fear in me than the fear that the memory of shocks that sting like bees, shocks that cause terrible, burning pain. I don't want to be hurt, so I continue to resist, arching my back in protest and screaming.

Father Jerome stops, then takes a key hanging around his neck, and with it, opens a small drawer. This drawer has padding on the bottom and sides. He picks me up, saying, "You will experience utter darkness, the hell reserved for disobedience such as this." He then places me into the drawer, and slides it shut it with a loud "click".

It is utterly dark and soundless in this drawer. I can breathe, but there is no light, no noise, nothing. It is quiet, and I am afraid. I wait to see what will happen.

Time passes, and I am frightened and hungry. I cry and cry with ever louder wails, but no one hears. My diaper is wet and filled with stool, and I am afraid. No one can see or hear me in this place; no one is there to take care of me. I am a little baby, and I know that I will die if no one takes care of me. I depend on the adults around me for everything. And now, there is...nothing. Just black darkness. I am terrified.

Time passes, where I alternate between loud screams of terror, and soft whimpers. Finally, I am too exhausted to cry any longer. I fall asleep.

I am very sleepy; maybe I will never wake up. I am starting to feel very far away and strange, as if my body is getting smaller and further away. Maybe this is what dying is like. It feels like a long time has passed, and I am resigned to being here forever, and dying.

Suddenly, I hear the drawer slide open. There is a light, much too bright for my eyes which have been in complete darkness for so long, even though it is just the dim light that is on in the nursery at night.

Father Jerome is there, and I am frantic, desperate for him to take me out of this terrible, terrible box. “Will you obey me now?” he asks, looking me in the eyes. He sees the terror and pleading in them, and lifts me out of the box of terror, of abandonment.

He holds me for awhile, close to his chest, then gives me part of a bottle. I drink, but keep looking at his eyes the whole times, frantic for him to respond to my frantic terror and need for him to not leave me alone. Later, he takes me into a white room with a rocking chair, and rocks me for a period of time. Finally, I relax and rest awhile.

The next morning, Father Jerome returns, comes to my crib, and tries to put the electrodes on me. I do not struggle or resist this time.

These drawers are reserved as punishment for resisting being programmed, and being placed in one was one of the cruelest tortures that I experienced as an infant. The sense of utter abandonment and terror was overwhelming, but it also ensured compliance in an infant that comes to realize that emotional survival depends upon obedience to what the trainers demand, no matter how difficult.

Learning to Crawl Towards Colored Lights

I am a baby, able to crawl but not able to do much else, yet. After all, I am only three months old. I am on the smooth floor of one of the programming labs. I have been told to wait. Suddenly, I hear six notes played in a specific sequence. Simultaneously, a code is flashed in front of me on a large overhead screen: it is a black and white pattern in a specific configuration meant to bring out a specific part. I have already learned to bring the correct parts out when different tones and patterns are shown to me during the previous first few weeks of life, and have become quite good at it, to the pleased smiles and “good girl!” comments from the fathers I love. This ability to make them so happy makes me coo and wiggle with joy.

Now, a part loyal to the Jesuit Order is out, and a green light, about the size of a traffic light, shines down the smooth tunnel I am crawling through as I crawl towards this light. The tunnel is bathed in the green light, as Cerachnid-1, a cult-loyal presenter, is learning that green is her color, just as the tone sequence and pattern are hers. This task is fun, and when Cerachnid reaches the light, she is given a piece of soft fruit as a special treat by Father Jerome, a man in his early 20s who already has white hair that looks beautiful with his clear blue eyes.

“Cerachnid, you did well,” he tells her. Jerome then picks me up in his strong arms and cuddles me against the soft folds of his lab uniform. “Cerachnid, you are so special for being able to do this,” he says, and Cerachnid wiggles with delight at the praise in his voice. “I love you,” Jerome tells her. “I am glad that you had fun doing this.” During this early part of training, there are lots of rewards and hugs when Cerachnid and other parts perform well, doing simple tasks such as recognizing cues to come out; recognizing their special colors, and obeying the trainers.

Punishments will come later on after this first, primary belief is instilled deeply: obedience to cues brings feelings of love, security, joy, and is even “fun”.

It is a month later. Cerachnid has been performing very well, but now something very important happens to her. Cerachnid undergoes extremely severe pain, being told ahead what will happen. The fathers always tell parts when pain is going to happen, they never hide this fact.

Cerachnid cannot endure this pain, and her mind starts dissociating from it, creating new little babies from herself. These new parts are quickly given names as each comes out; a code specific to them is flashed on the screen above her, and these new cult loyal parts split from Cerachnid become the system parts that she will oversee and eventually learn to control.

Cerachnid will eventually learn to forget that these other parts originally came from her, and instead, will see herself as protecting them from "further harm" (going through the agonizing pain, pain that made her feel as if she was dying, of her original splitting memory). She is told that she can only keep them "safe" by ensuring that they are always "good" by being obedient to programming cues and commands. Her desire to protect these parts dissociated from herself from experiencing further pain and trauma actually reflects the deep, instinctive self-love that all babies have for themselves, which the programmers are counting upon as they cause her and other primary controller parts to dissociate and then re-organize into subsidiary, system parts.

It is several weeks later, and I am four and a half months old. Cerachnid is taken to a special room in the programming lab. There is a huge tree pattern laid out on the floor, with a trunk, roots, branches and leaves. She has already met "Gnossis" (the tree of knowledge), a woman dressed in a tree costume, who visited her crib numerous times over the past few months, and explained to her who she is. Cerachnid now sees the face of this woman embedded in the center of the tree, inlaid with the bark, and wiggles with recognition.

"Cerachnid, it is time for you to learn where you live on the tree," the soft, beautiful voice says. "Come to your place." At that moment, a special pattern (Cerachnid's code), a small green light and the musical sequence play on a specific branch, close to the trunk. Cerachnid is guided by the trainer to this spot, and she sits.

"This is where you will live," says the soft voice of the tree. "This is your special place where you can feel safe; if you leave your special place, you and those you protect and help – your system – will be unsafe". The trainer then comes and hugs Cerachnid, and gives her a soft, sweet rusk to suck on. They spend time in peaceful activity, while one limb of the tree slowly strokes Cerachnid's back and the trainer murmurs loving words to her. After a few minutes, the trainer calls out another part whose job is to not remember the programming session, Cerachnid goes back in, and the trainer picks me up and carries me out of the lab. I have no memory of what happened inside the lab; only Cerachnid will remember learning her place on the tree.

It is not until this program, and the deep feeling of love and safety for going to the correct place on the tree, and remaining there, is instilled, that the punishments for leaving the designated place or disobedience are installed. For the rest of her life, Cerachnid will always seek to return to that initial sense of peace, safety and being loved that underpinned her programming. And for her, this means complete, unquestioning obedience and belief in what her trainers tell her.

The above memory illustrates how the Jesuit trainers use a combination of concrete, physical structures and activities for their training of infants and young children, combined with rewards and punishments to ensure that expected behaviors will be instilled. But this, like all programming, will often rest upon an earlier, primary memory, of a time when the controller was loved and felt safe; in essence, a "resting place" that the controller will always try to return to whenever possible. The trainers provide a framework for the only way this feeling of security and attachment can be attained: being programmable, and obedient to the programs being installed by the trainers.

I love the other infants I am living with in the large nursery filled with cribs. We are fed bottles of milk at the same time, and later sit at a short table and eat together as we become able to sit up. During free time, we play together. Most of all, we learn to do things together.

I am a year old. I and the other infants my age are being told to sit in groups of four at small child-sized tables with colored blocks.

"I want you all to build a tower with all blue blocks on the bottom, all red in the row above, and then all yellow blocks at the top. I want you to do this together when you hear the bell ring," Mattie is telling us. She is one of the top 11-year-olds in programming. Behind her is Father Timothy, her mentor. She enjoys working with us babies, and he is watching her as well as us.

Timothy and Mattie go from table to table, giving each the same instructions. In a bit, a bell rings and we start. This is fun, and I laugh as the other one-year-olds and I do this simple task. We create a small tower of blocks as instructed.

"Good, very good," Mattie praises us. I like her; she is warm and caring and tries to praise us whenever we do well. The other toddlers and I grin at each other. As we look around the room, we see that the other toddlers are finishing up, too.

"You all did really well," Timothy says. "You can have lunch now."

Lunch is brought in, and we enjoy the soft fruit, vegetables and liver. The food is always, always very healthy and tasty, and because we are so physically active, all of us are hungry. The food doesn't last long.

There are other small group activities given over the next few months: figuring out how to share four apples among twelve of us, or how to climb a wall that is too high to simply put a leg over. As we do these things, and learn to work as a team, the fathers praise us, and give us extra "free time" to simply play with each other. Free time is a precious commodity in this highly structured environment, and we all decide to perform well to gain as much free time as possible, in order to simply be toddlers.

This pattern will continue throughout my life. When my class did well, or I am part of a mission team that does well, we can sometimes choose our reward, and we choose time off. The programmers and facility heads knew that we valued most of all the times when we could simply be human beings without expectations of performance. They allowed for this, but it had to be earned.

Because of genetic engineering for intelligence, all the babies in the nursery had high IQs, and we all achieved behavioral milestones very early. Most of us were toddling by six to seven months of age on plump but muscular baby legs, and we were starting to talk as well, in high-pitched baby voices. We understand what those around us are saying, although we are still unable to follow complex, abstract discussions, and can only respond in simple phrases.

During the early years, we are assessed and sorted according to leadership gifts, intelligence, strength and creativity, as well as other qualities, into groups of similar abilities. These sortings are held loosely during the first three years of life, with ongoing testing and assessments throughout life. The activities described here function not only to teach the children skills, but also enable the fathers to assess the children. But by age six, we will be sorted into classes of 12 of similar abilities for further training and education at the specialized 'school' run by the Order. As children, we attend this school from six until twelve years old. I recall my cohort as having four classes of 12 children.

Angel in the Labs

I am four months old. Like the other infants in the nursery, I am sleeping soundly. It is the middle of the night, and we have had a busy day learning new tasks and doing all the things that little babies growing up in a programming facility do. It is quiet, the lights are down, and the darkened room is silent except for the occasional rustle of a baby moving a bit on soft sheets.

Suddenly, something wakes me up. I look around and see a figure walking through the nursery. This figure looks like one of the immortals, but something about it is very different. The robes are soft, almost transparent, and shine with a soft light. This being has golden hair and a kind face. I watch as it stops by a crib and places its hand on a baby's head. The baby wakes up and smiles at the being.

As it walks nearer to my crib, I see white wings folded behind him. I feel that this is a male being, without being sure why. As it gets closer and closer, placing his hand softly on each baby's head, the babies smile. Some sit up and lean towards him, reaching after him as he goes to another crib. Finally, he comes to my crib. I smile at him, and his golden eyes look at me with tenderness and love. He places his hand on my head, as if in benediction, and suddenly I feel something I have never felt before. I feel peace, utter peace, and safety. I want this feeling to go on forever. This being does not smell like the other immortals who visit, but instead, seems to bring the smell of a beautiful breeze from somewhere else that floats around him. This smell is wonderful, and I want him to stay with me. But the being keeps going until the babies in the nursery have all had a hand placed on them. Then, the being silently, quietly disappears.

After the being is gone, several fathers come into the lab. Father Mattheo comes to my crib. "You should not have let that malak – that messenger from the enemy – touch you," he says. His voice is angry, I have no idea what I did wrong. Don't beings come at night all the time? Why shouldn't I let him touch me? Don't all the immortals touch me? I think all of these things, but cannot speak them yet. "That was one of the liar's messengers; that was not an immortal," Mattheo says. He must have seen the being come into the nursery. But it is not until I am much older that I learn that he and the other fathers could not stop it. They had to wait until it left.

I feel bewildered. This being was kind, and the peace and love I felt coming from its touch was even better than the words and cake that the "immortals" were bringing me at night. How could a being this nice be an "enemy"?

The next morning, Father Mattheo shows me a depiction of an angel, and shocks me over and over as he shows it to me, telling me, "These are the enemy. Send them away if they come to you." I understand that he wants me to hate this gentle visitor in the night and start to associate him with the shocks. The shocks are my enemy, but my baby brain thinks they are caused by the picture of the angel that I am being shown.

I am 18 months old, and my hand is being held by an adult dressed in a costume to represent Gnossis, the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. She has a crown of leafy branches on her head, and her arms have numerous leafy branches that appear to sprout out of them; even her fingers look like small twigs. Her middle is covered by rough looking "bark", and her feet are covered with what appeared to be several layers of roots. Her voice is calm, patient, and melodious as she takes me by the hand, and leads me down a pathway that is outlined with wide, white brick pavers.

"You must always, always stay on the path, and never depart," she instructs me. "Only by staying on the path of righteousness and knowledge can you ascend and reach the celestial heights. Otherwise, you will descend into mortality and suffer the torments of the wicked – those who choose the flesh over immortality." As she leads me, the pavers under our feet light up with a soft, diffuse glow; it seems wonderful and magical to me as a toddler. "If you follow the path, your way will be lighted with increasing knowledge," she assures me. When we come to the end of this part of the path, it divides, and we go to the right. We then rest on a small bench, and she gives me a sweet treat as a reward for being such a good child and following the path with her so well.

These walks along the path continue at intervals over the next few months. I learn exactly where to go and am warned where not to go each time by one of the three trees who lead me along this path: Althea, the tree of life; Gnossis, the tree of knowledge (of good and evil); and the Servant tree. These paths actually represent following my internal programming, which I have been told is the path to immortality. But at this young age, my main concern right now is to always stay on the path. I have been told that dreadful things will happen if I fail to, and I don't want these sweet, caring trees to become angry with me.

After another month, when I am almost two years old, Althea starts me on the path, and then smiling, she says, "You know the way, child. Remember to always stay on it, and all will be well." She then leaves me, and I start to follow the path. But along the way, I see to the side of the path some chocolate treats on a table, just a few feet off of the path. I start to go past, but then pause, and look longingly at the treat. I love chocolates, and want one very much. I think Maybe no one will know if I go off for just a few seconds, grab a treat, then go back on the path.

I step off of the path, and suddenly the room grows dark, a cold wind blows, and I feel terrible, hot, sharp electric shocks beneath my feet that cause me to cry out in pain. I hear shrieks and screams, and demonic looking figures lurking in the now completely darkened room start coming towards me; I can hear their snarls and hisses, and back away.

I can't find the path! It is hidden in this dark place, and I am terrified. I scream aloud, asking Althea to help, and suddenly I see a soft glow in the distance that comes closer. It is Althea, and she looks very sad and concerned.

"Why did you go off the path, child?" she asks with great sorrow. Her beautiful crystal clear blue eyes are filled with tears.

Terrified, I look at her, then stutter, "I…I…I w-w-wanted chocolate…" Tears are streaming down my face, and I feel deeply ashamed and guilty about my disobedience.

She sighs. "You let your mortal flesh, your mortal desires take over, instead of staying on the path," she says sternly. "Don't you realize that I warned you to stay on for your own good? Staying on the path is the only path to safety."

I realize that she is right, because even taking a small step off the path brought disaster in the form of extreme pain and terror.

"Will you stay on the path, and not go off again?" she asks.

"Y-y-yes," I say, having no desire to experience the terrors and pain of mortality and descending again. It hurt, badly. Althea then smiles, and her clear blue eyes light up with joy.

"Good." She stoops down to eye level, looks me in the eyes, and says, "I trust you to desire immortality more than to gratify your flesh." She then leaves me on a portion of the path near where I started out. I walk along the path for a time, and suddenly see candies in a bowl on the side of the path, just out of reach. But this time, I do not step off the path, a path which represents my staying within the prescribed programming for my system, of which I am a controller. Instead, this time, I ignore the candy and continue on, until I am greeted by a delighted Althea who praises me warmly.

"You are learning not to give in to the flesh, and to desire immortality," she says in loving tones. "You are doing well, indeed." She then takes me into her arms (I am still quite small) and ascends the celestial stairway – a golden stairway that goes up and up towards the ceiling, taking me to the celestial realms – another part of the programming lab up above that has fluffy clouds to walk on and beautiful, sparkly stars all around on the walls. Together, Althea and I enjoy a wonderful treat of cream cake. The other celestials there praise me and tell me how glad they are that I am learning to overcome my mortal flesh.

While I was too young at the time to fully understand why I had to stay on the path, I came to understand over time that the path was my programming, and that stepping off of it, even a little bit, would bring pain and terror. During these initial early years of programming, the costumed adults and children who represent celestial beings such as the trees are loving, kind and instill the belief that these beings – who are also internalized, or become part of my internal mental landscape, as important controllers – want only what is best for the child and their systems.

This makes the very young child want to obey them, want to make them happy, which is a much stronger underpinning for obedience than simply terror. Even as an adult, the young system parts and controllers will still want to obey their internal primary controllers, believing that they want what is best and safest for their survival. This makes the programming even more difficult to break later in life, than if a simple desire to avoid punishment was used. An analogy that can be used – although imperfect – is the difference between a child who is abused and maltreated growing up, without any display of love to the child, and a child who has experiences of being deeply loved and attached to a parent who often sorrowfully takes off a belt and thrashes them until they are covered with black and blue stripes from neck to ankle, saying "This is for your own good." Both children have experienced severe abuse, but the latter child, who believes the parent genuinely cares for them, may find it more difficult to define their treatment as "abuse" and will be more likely to internalize their parent's beliefs.

There was only one time when the constant demand to perform was relaxed.

I am about seven months old. I have stopped eating and I am beginning to lose weight. I turn my head away, even with threats from the trainers. I simply don't care, even if they kill me.

I am feeling utter, complete despair. Somewhere in the depths of my developing mind is a dawning understanding that my life is one of frequent abuse, paired with the demand to perform, and then perform still harder, and do things repugnant to me even as a baby. I have no control, and this is to be my life, and this knowledge overwhelms me. I want choice, I desperately want a choice, and it is not allowed. So, I make the only choice that I can make. I choose to die and fail to thrive.

In later years, as a trainer myself, I saw this phenomenon many times in infants. In fact, it was expected at some point in infants who are pushed to the limit of their emotional, physical and spiritual endurance. Most survived, but some did end up dying. The threat of death is real.

As soon as the symptoms occur, a change is made in my routine. The programming stops. Mattheo, Jerome and Carlotti come, and hold me and rock me in the rocking chair near my crib. "I love you," Mattheo whispers. "Don't die, little one; I would feel so sad." He believes what he is telling me, and I feel his words. But I still cannot eat. The despair is too deep.

Jerome and Carlotti also come and hold me and talk to me. My twin siblings – I am part of a triplet set, which is what the Jesuits raise instead of twins- Daniel (Danny) and Elizabeth (Lizzy), who I love and am bonded to, are placed in my crib with me. This is unheard of, but the fathers are desperate. I am losing more weight and have pale skin and dull eyes. Danny coos to me, and holds a small bottle out to me, trying to get me to eat a little and to play with him. I smile, just a little, at this brother who I love so much. His love reaches me, and very hesitantly, I pick up the bottle and take a tiny sip. Lizzie, my other twin, looks at my face and pats it with her little baby hands. She tries to make me smile by blowing loud raspberries at me. I smile weakly at her.

Soon, one of the female fathers comes over to my crib, picks me up, and nurses me in the rocking chair nearby. She is my "birth mother," not the real one, of course, but the one my parts have bonded to after the death of the real one. She whispers to me, "I love you, I love you," over and over, her light brown hair falling softly forward as she looks me in the eyes with her grey eyes filled with tenderness. I nurse a bit and fall asleep. I am exhausted with the exhaustion of deep depression, even at this young age. But the rocking is soothing, and for this time, being treated almost like a real baby, and less like a circus performer, something in me unwinds a bit. Maybe there are good things in life, too.

The next day, two of the fathers walk by. I hear them discussing Danny, Lizzie and me. "If she doesn't make the decision to live, we will have to put the other two to death, too," I hear them say. I am horrified. Even if I don't want to live, I want my little brother and sister to live. Danny and Lizzie, sitting in the crib next to me, are looking at me with big, sad brown eyes. I realize that they, too, have overheard the fathers discussing us. A small tear falls down Dannie's cheek; he wants to live, I can feel it as strongly as if he has spoken to me. His brown curls tremble slightly as he leans over and gives me a little kiss on my cheek.

I take the bottle that is lying in my crib, and start drinking from it. I have decided to live, to save my little brother and sister, whose lives I now realize depend on mine. As I drink the formula, Dannie and Lizzie smile with baby joy, and Lizzie claps her little hands with a soft "pat, pat" noise.

It is not until years later that I realize that this conversation by the fathers was meant to be overheard; it was no accident. They wanted me to believe that my siblings would die if I died, to motivate me. But as an infant, I had no way of realizing that they were using my love for others against me.

I survive, I start gaining back the weight that I had lost. After a few more days of rest, I am put back into the daily routine, but am carefully monitored for any further signs of failing to thrive.

And the bonding continues with the fathers, these fathers who caused me to want to die with their abuse, their torture, their demands. Each day, usually at the end of the day, Mattheo comes in to spend special time with me, for 15 to 30 minutes each day. He holds me and talks to me with loving words. "You are such a beautiful daughter," he tells me as he rocks and comforts me. "I love you," he says as he holds me close to his warm chest, treating me the way a father would treat their beloved baby. "I'm so proud of you; you are wonderful," he says at the end of a long, hard day of learning and performing.

I look forward to this special time with great eagerness. This is what makes all the hard work, the terrible abuse, the punishments and rewards, all worth it: to earn the love of this human being that I adore so much. I will do anything for him, even live.

Infants in the Jesuit nurseries are allowed to bond deeply with both the fathers, and their genetic triplets; these babies are allowed extra time together in simple play. But the fathers are masters at manipulating these love bonds in order to gain the behaviors they want. When I first had this memory, I felt enraged. Enraged that my very ability to love others, to care, was used so callously against me. Enraged that even the choice to die and escape as a baby was wrested away from me, due to my inability to allow my siblings to die. This desire to rescue others will be used again and again throughout the rest of my life to control me, and it is a heavy weight to bear indeed, until I learn that no human being can truly "rescue" another; that there is only one who can rescue without manipulation or demands, and that is Jesus.

Chapter 2: Early Spiritual Training

Meeting the Immortals

I am only a few weeks old, and I am lying in my crib. Suddenly, two beautiful women in soft, glowing silvery dresses and two men in glowing robes of the same color come and stand by my bed. I am enthralled at these beautiful people who walk softly and talk with melodious voices. They lean over my crib and speak.

"Child, we are the immortals," they say in unison. Their voices are sweet and musical, and sound like those of angels. "Because you are blessed, we have chosen to visit you. You are fortunate indeed." I grin a toothless baby grin and wiggle my arms and legs happily. These people seem nice, and they seem to like me.

"My name is Calexa" says the woman with beautiful silvery hair, as she picks me up and holds me tenderly. She holds me upright so that I can clearly see the other woman, whose soft golden brown hair seems to be waving about her face in the nearly darkened room.

"My name is Althea, and I bring wisdom to those who seek me," the brown-haired woman says. On her dress is a golden rune, a picture of a tree. She continues, "You will grow to love me, as I already love you, chosen one."

Then a man with golden hair and beautiful blue eyes approaches me next. "I am Paltheus, and will teach you how to do difficult things; but you will grow strong and beautiful as a result. I want you to be strong, and to one day join us where we live." He takes me from Calexa and cuddles me gently in his strong arms. I feel warm and secure against his chest, as I smell his wonderful smell; he smells like roses and lavender and sweet things. These immortals are wonderful people.

Baltheus is the next "immortal" to talk to me. He has silver-white hair and grey eyes that look suspiciously like those of Mattheo, my primary trainer. "If you learn to love me as I love you and do all that I and my mortal representatives tell you to do, then I will give you the gift of seeing what is to come in the future, and to look into and see what is in men's hearts." I am still too young to fully understand all of this, but I recognize his kind tone and the loving way he holds and rocks me. I am filled with joy at the attention they are giving me.

Several times a week, they and other fathers dressed as "immortals" visit me in the nursery. During each visit, they teach me about who they are, and what abilities they can give me. This is an important part of my spiritual training. I also see them visit the other babies in the nursery and tell them the same or similar things. I feel I must be a lucky baby indeed to be visited by such loving, beautiful people – or "immortals", the "divine" as I am learning to call them. My only confusion is that they feel and smell like real people to me, in spite of their words; they actually smell like some of the fathers I know. I wonder why, but go back to sleep, dreaming about being held and loved by these people in silvery soft robes.

The Jesuit fathers use very concrete setups to teach infants and young children their spiritual beliefs, which include ascending towards immortality, or else descending towards mortality (and pain). An infant and young child will willingly believe what they are taught at this age, especially if their lessons are conveyed through concrete experiences like the 'role-playing' and 'acting' by the fathers and older children in costumes, as depicted in this account.

Celestial Heaven

A few weeks later, I and the other babies in my nursery are awakened in the middle of the night by the soft tread of the "immortals" who walk into our room on silver slippers. I am picked up and carried by an “immortal”, Charydon, a man with beautiful long white hair and green eyes, He says, “I am going to take you to a very special place – the place where I live. I want you to see what the celestial realms look like. This is where you can one day live if you are very, very good.” I already know that “good” means being obedient and doing all that the programmers tell me; the “immortals” have already been telling me that my programmers are the “mortal representatives” of the “immortals” and that obeying them is the same as obeying an “immortal”.

Charydon carries me in his strong, muscular arms and walks up a beautiful golden spiral staircase that is strung with glittering stars and what looks like planets along the darkened areas beside it. Up, up we go, until finally, he is walking on what looks like soft, puffy white clouds with glitter and rainbow lights everywhere. It is beautiful, and I hear lovely singing from far away, by voices that sound like angels. It is not until I am much older that I will learn that these voices are actually older children singing, with their voices piped in. As a little baby, I have no idea that as I get older, when I am eleven or twelve years old, I will also be singing songs of the ‘celestial realm’ for new groups of babies.

I look everywhere about me. Charydon holds me carefully upright in his arms so that I can see as much as possible. I see beautiful, ethereal figures with wings flitting by in the background. The smell is wonderful, like flowers and perfume and rose candy all at once.

After a while, Charydon’s voice becomes tinged with sorrow. “We must now descend back to the mortal realms,” he explains, with a pathos that makes me realize that he, too, hates to leave this wonderful place. He looks into my eyes and smiles, and says, “But if you are very good, and I know you will be, we will come back here soon.” I smile back, and he gently carries me back down the golden stairs, down past the stars, as we descend. Finally, we are at the bottom, and he carries me back into the nursery and gently lays me in my crib.

I am so excited from this experience that it takes me a while to settle back into sleep. But the fathers and Mengele start training the next day several hours later than normal. It is as if they, too, understand how important it is to spend time with the immortals, and are willing to change the daily routine to allow for this.

I remember that Charydon, Althea and the other immortals told me that my trainers were their mortal representatives, and how important it is to always obey them if I want to “ascend” and visit the celestial realms again. I am very obedient for the next few days, and as promised, another immortal, Baltheus, comes and visits me a few nights later. He also helps me to “ascend” the beautiful staircase to visit the celestial realms. They are teaching me that I need the help of an immortal to visit this spiritual place as they must carry me there. This lays the foundation, for me to later in life allow the demonic to ‘carry me’ or ‘help me to ascend’ into the ‘celestial realms’.

These visits occur regularly during my first two years of life. As a toddler, I toddle around the clouds, which feel like soft puffs of cotton beneath my slippered feet. I am given wonderful cake to eat and learn from these beautiful beings many of the rules of the immortals and how to enter these realms. I am being inculcated in the belief system that underlies all of the programming, all of the rituals, all of the hard work being done by the Order: the desire to allow the immortals to visit earth, and to ascend in order to be with them in the celestial realms.

I am much too young to recognize that these immortals are adults dressed in costumes or that the stairway is part of a programming lab. Nor am I yet able to recognize that the celestial realms are a programming studio with special props. I will only learn this years later. By that time, however, I believe utterly in the celestials. I have also by that time become completely indoctrinated with my mentors' teaching that the celestial programming studio is a necessary teaching tool for babies too young to grasp the spiritual realities of the immortals and am blind to the fact that it is nothing but trickery to manipulate the babies into obedience to satanic agendas.

Again, this is an example of the extremely elaborate setups that are used to indoctrinate the very young infants with a belief in the immortals – this belief that underpins the Jesuit Order in its occult side. Readers may wonder how on earth setups this elaborate are possible. But the Jesuits have lots of money that comes from their human trafficking and intelligence work as well as other dark operations. With billions of dollars at their disposal, and state-of-the-art technology that is many years ahead of current technologies, they have had no trouble constructing advanced programming facilities. They have facilities in numerous countries with the largest and best-funded ones being in Italy.

The older children and adults enjoy dressing up in costumes, and everyone loves the celestial scenes, hoping to be chosen to take the young babies and toddlers up the golden studio stairs, and watch their delight in the beauty and sweet treats. While the fathers, due to their own dissociation, mind control, and erroneous beliefs, feel that these young children must be abused during programming, the truth is that everyone feels a sense of relief when they are scheduled to participate in a happy training setup such as described above. The fathers view the abusive programming as a "necessary thing" but still dislike it, in spite of a lifetime of training to normalize it.

Typically, immediately after the older children or adults put costumes on for particular setups, other programmers who are overseeing that particular setup will first call up the appropriate parts in those individuals. For instance, in the setup described here where they will play 'immortals', 'angels' and other roles, parts who have been programmed to be 'immortals' and so on will be the ones called up. This means that when the adults and children participate in these indoctrination scenarios through these parts, they are not aware that they are 'acting' out roles in a studio but are personally convinced that they are taking a baby to the celestial realms, or that they are angels singing in the realms. Their utter conviction is part of what causes the scenarios to feel absolutely authentic to the babies. Besides helping to program the babies, using the programmed parts of other cult members serves to reinforce that programming of these cult members themselves, as their internal parts are called out to present, and act out their roles in those programming studios under the programmers' supervision.

Mortal Hell

It is a few weeks after Althea and the other immortals last visited me. I am awakened in the middle of the night by a dark and malevolent being. Years later, I will learn that this is an older child dressed in a costume, but in the darkened nursery, this creature looks and sounds terrifying, with long, dark claws, long sharp fangs, red glowing eyes, and a twisted, dark shape.

"You were bad today, and you are coming with me," it croaks in a demonic voice, with sibilant hissing. Now, I am really scared. I wonder what I could have possibly done that got the attention of this…thing… Obviously, I must have broken some unwritten, not understood rule. The creature picks me up roughly, its claws biting into my tiny arm as it does so. It carries me out of the nursery. I am struggling hard to free myself from its grasp, but to no avail. This creature takes me into a room with a large, black, cavernous hole in the middle. There are steps going down into the dark, scary looking steps. I struggle even harder, but I am held in its iron grip.

"We are going to descend," the creature croaks, and it carries me down, down, down into a place where the air smells smoky, and there are red flames flickering on the walls. I see black poles that fill this room. Men and women are tied to them by chains. "Demons" (as usual, the older cult children dressed in costumes) are whipping them with long whips with bits of bone attached. The men and women are screaming in tortured pain.

"Because you were disobedient, you will join the other mortals who chose to give in to their flesh, and to descend. They caused themselves to come here because they did not listen to the wise counsel of the immortals," the demonic actor hisses in my ear.

I begin crying, but the dark creature doesn't care. He ties me to a pole that has a small stand to hold me, almost like an infant seat, since I am too young to stand yet. The small chain bites into my little arms and chest. The creature then takes out a small whip and lashes my tiny arms and legs. While there is no real injury, the lashes sting sharply and add to my terror. I am now screaming at the top of my lungs.

Suddenly, Father Mattheo appears, dressed in the silvery robes of an immortal. "Do you promise to always obey me, and to try to never give in to your mortal desires again; to try and listen to the wisdom of the immortals?" he asks.

I look at him with huge eyes, and raise my right fist, the sign language I have learned for "yes", since I have forgotten in my terror how to speak.

Father Mattheo then turns to the "demon" and says, "Let her loose, I will vouch for her."

The twisted, grimacing, dark creature reluctantly looses the tiny jangly chains that hold me in place, and Mattheo picks me up and soothes me, in spite of the fact that I have had a loose bowel movement due to stress.

"Let's go and ascend back up, out of here," he says. "I can help you ascend." We walk up, up, up, out of this terrible place, to my great relief. His strong arms hold me securely, and I am so glad that he came to rescue me. Mattheo then cleans and changes me and spends time rocking me until I have calmed down. This takes quite a while.

"This is why we ask you to do difficult and painful things at times; we are teaching you how to overcome your mortal flesh and its desires, so that you will not descend and remain forever in hell," he tells me. I am so traumatized, and so relieved that he rescued me, that I absorb and believe everything he is telling me without question. I have been rescued from hell by a father that loves me enough to go down into that terrible place after me, and I think that there can be no greater love. I love Mattheo at that moment with everything within me.

A female father, Joanna, one of the 12 fathers that I am bonded to and love deeply, then comes, and nurses me at the breast for a while, rocking me and singing to me softly. Hours later, I finally fall asleep. I decide to always, always do what the immortals say, and to never, ever give in to my mortal desires again.

This has been my introduction to "hell", one of the many horrible programming studios constructed by the Order to terrify their children into obedience. Many years later that I will learn that there are three stages located on three floors. Each level can be entered through winding stairs that go down into each level. Hell levels "one", "two" and "three" can be changed with a change of scenery, lighting, and children and/or adults dressed into costumes who either act as 'demons' or as 'tortured mortals', with appropriate props (including fake blood and gore), into hell levels "four", "five" and "six." The final and deepest level, utter darkness, reserved for the worst "sinners" who are completely "descended" is accomplished through time spent in an isolation tank or a negative sound room. There are usually about six or seven people being "tortured" at each level in this fake hell, but these rooms have mirrors that multiply the images until the scene appears to be filled with hundreds of writhing, tormented figures and flames, or screens that will playback such scenes.

But as an infant, and later as a toddler, I do not know these things. I fully believe that I have gone to hell. I have screaming nightmares at intervals about this place for years, until my systems learned to suppress them fully. But deep inside, I fear hell more than anything else. Every part inside of me fears this terrible place, the place where the worst possible punishments occur – or so I think, until there is a new, more terrible setup.

I am now a very young child, about age two years and two months. During the day, I disobeyed a direct command given to me by the father I love most, Mattheo. He has asked me to perform an act of sexual abuse on another child, and I can't. By this age, it is very, very rare that I say "no". Somehow, I identified too much with the child, who is close to my own age and who even looks like me, with curly brown hair and sad brown eyes. Mattheo is quietly angry, but he then goes on to abuse the child himself. Then, in order to punish me, he kills the child. I am heartbroken, but also feel glad that at least now, this child can no longer feel any pain or torment; she, at least, is set "free".

I later verbalize this feeling to Father Carlotti. "I know that she hurt, but now she will never hurt again," I say, using childish logic. "Nothing can hurt her anymore," I tell him. The fathers will view this a dangerous line of thinking, as rather than feeling remorseful and guilty about my disobedience, I am feeling that the child who died was "lucky". I am too young to realize that such thinking is unacceptable to the order, however.

In the middle of the night that follows this conversation, I am awakened by a "demon" who is older and larger than many that have visited me before. The "demon" takes me by the arm, yanking me roughly out of bed with claws that bite into my flesh until it bleeds. It hurries me down the black, winding staircase that descends into "hell". There are many adults and children tied to poles, and to my horror, right in front of me, in the center, is Father Mattheo. He is tied with rattling chains to a large pole of black stone. He is being lashed with a large flagellum, a whip that has bits of sharp rock and metal attached, and is screaming in pain.

"Satan" (another adult in costume) comes up to me and says, "You were supposed to take this punishment for disobedience, but Mattheo offered to take it instead. He is taking the punishment for your disobedience."

Horrified, I scream and weep as I see the blood pouring from Mattheo's wounds and the flagellum cuts deeper and deeper into him. I am terrified that he will die, this person who means so much to me, this person without whose love I don't believe I can survive.

"I'm sorry, I'm sorry," I scream.

Satan then turns to me, and says, "Do you vow to never disobey my mortal representative again?"

I stutter in my terror as I reply, "Y-y-yes."

Satan says, "Then take this spirit of obedience inside; it will punish you if you even think of disobeying." I do a short ritual, accept the spirit, bow low, and then "Satan" releases Mattheo from the pole with a golden knife. Mattheo is weak and shaky, but stumbles with me up the stairs, looking pale as we enter the room above.

"I knew the punishment for your disobedience today would kill you, and I love you too much to lose you. I am older and stronger and offered to take it instead," he says. "You must learn that the actions of each of us affect those around us. The obedience or disobedience of one affects many others." He holds me as I cry for a long time, and then says, "I know you won't disobey me again; I know you love me too much."

This is the communal thinking of the Jesuit order. It is based upon loving one another and the terrible manipulation of attachment, and I am being indoctrinated into it in a very concrete way. I am learning that my rebellious thoughts, my saying "no", will cause pain to the people I love most, and it causes deep emotional pain. I am caught in a terrible place. I cannot choose what I truly want which is not obey commands to hurt others, because it will cause even more pain to the people I am attached to, and the child or person I try to save will just end up dying anyway. The cost of doing what I really want – to not hurt another child – could cause someone I love to be flogged to death. I fall asleep crying, wondering why the world is such as terrible place.

It is not until I am older, and learning to program other children, that I learn that the fathers take pain medication ahead of time during these setups and wear special rubber layers over their skin that releases 'blood' as they are being 'whipped'. Much of the screaming is acting, because the fathers are very, very good actors. As an older child, I am taught that these setups are a necessary thing to teach infants and young children about the real spiritual realities that they are too young to grasp yet. I accept this since I have already learned, even as a child, to never question my own programming.

When I remembered how the setups are done, and how the fathers I was bonded to manipulated me in this way, I was furious. I could not understand how one human being could do this to another. But then, I realized: they were afraid. If there is one thread that tied us all together, it was the deep, deep, terrifying fear that underlaid everything we did, the fear that sabotaged our real desire to love each other. We were all terribly, terribly afraid of these "immortals" who while appearing kind and loving, could also unleash terrible beings. The "immortals" are beings that the fathers believe control the universe and who oversee creation, and they worship them and give them unquestioning obedience. We were all slaves to our fear of these beings, and thus we could not act the way we truly wanted to. It would take finding a source of protection from this terror, much, much later in life, to break free of this slavery.

I am two years old. The part of me who is out is a master controller named Galatea who is over the presentation systems. My hair has been dyed a beautiful silvery color, and I am wearing a black robe that has beautiful sparkly stars splashed over it. These little stars twinkle and glow as I walk. I love being the beautiful Galatea, one of the immortals who has been meeting with me since I was a tiny baby in my crib. I even speak with her soft, musical voice and inflection.

Pleiades is in the room with me. He is another master controller. Polaris, the third controller, sits on the other side. Satan, an adult in costume, is also there. He has more authority than even the master controllers in this setup.

In the room beneath the platform that the master controllers are sitting on, are other children my age dressed in costumes to represent various system controllers who will be working under me: Athena, Andromeda, and Saturn. Their sitting beneath the master controllers shows that they are lower in status – and thus obedient to – the master controllers who are sitting on an elevated platform. The children turn and look at me as Galatea, and at Satan.

Satan gives me the order. I must always, always immediately obey him, immediately and unfailingly. "Take Andromeda, place her on her controller platform, and then have her give Athena the golden key. Athena will then leave the room, and in five minutes, will return with one of the presentation children".

I hurry to obey him. As a master controller, my obedience must be as quick as thought, or so I have been trained. I run to Andromeda, put her on her controller platform, and then tell Andromeda to give Athena the golden key and have her bring a child representing one of the presenters back into the room, going through a door marked with a special golden rune that means 'Wonderland'.

Andromeda stands, waiting. Athena goes to her, receives a golden key, and then goes through the door. We wait. And wait. Finally, she comes back through the special door with a child that resembles me. This child represents a presenter.

Satan then tells me, "Have Athena lock the child into her French shell." The shell is a clear plastic shell that will fit over the whole child. The child will be able to breathe due to special air holes.

The child is put into the shell, locked in, but then the trouble starts. The child starts screaming, saying that she wants out; that she doesn't want to be in the shell. Worse, she is not following her profile; the child is supposed to be speaking only French, but she is screaming in four different languages.

I hear a loud noise, and the child is knocked unconscious. But worse follows. The room that we, the immortal star systems are located in, turns black. The whole floor beneath us begins tilting, moving and spinning, as stars in the ceiling above begin falling, at times hitting me and the others in the room with sharp, biting pain. “The destruction of the universe has begun,” Satan’s voice thunders. “Andromeda, Athena, you both failed and allowed the presenter to fail, and now the universe will fall into chaos. You have become the bringers of chaos into the universe.”

Pleiades, Polaris and others are screaming behind me. These are fathers I love, and I am causing them and everything and everyone I have ever loved to be destroyed, because of my failure. As a master controller, I must never, ever fail, and those who I oversee must never, ever fail, either. And I did. I failed to control the presenter.

I cower, screaming, as this terrible scene continues. I am overwhelmed with terror. Finally, Satan intervenes. “Do you swear that you will never allow failure in those beneath you?” he asks. “That as my representative to these mortals inside, that you will ensure that there will never be failure?” The shaking, tilting and spinning have slowed down while he talks, but the room is still dark.

“Receive this spirit to help you,” he then says. I look up, and a dark presence is standing next to him. I don’t like it, but I don’t want the universe to fail, so I nod “yes.” It seems to melt into my body, and I feel terrible.

“I will give you another chance,” Satan says. Instantly, the room completely stops shaking, tilting and spinning, and the lights come back on. I still feel shaken and disoriented by it all. I look, and Athena, played by my twin sister, also looks dazed and white-faced. The little girl in the shell is unconscious, and we have to pull her out after Athena unlocks the shell.

When the little girl comes back to consciousness, I tell her, “You must never, ever scream when you are put in the shell. It isn’t forever; but if you scream or fight, worse happens than being in that shell.”

The little girl nods her understanding. We redo the scene, and the little girl does not scream or fight this time. We all have just learned how very, very important it is to do our roles perfectly. The fate of the universe depends on it.

As the above memory shows, not only the master presentation controller Galatea, but also the sub-controller Athena, and the presenter part beneath all of them, are all being taught the ‘terrible consequences of disobedience’ through the use of sophisticated programming studios that convincingly create terrible scenarios of devastation, disaster and pain. The Order uses many, many setups like these to instill complete obedience in all levels of a system. There will be other setups like this, until all of the controllers learn to do their jobs, including instantly punishing parts brutally for disobeying programming. These internal punishments that systems use to perpetuate programming long after the original programming sessions are usually memories, threats of, or internal reenactments of these terrifying traumas to keep parts in line. The capacity of parts to stop running such programs, i.e., stop obeying the original programming directives, can be greatly improved when parts realize that the ‘disasters’ were not natural consequences but staged trickery with no basis at all in any reality outside a programming studio, and that obedience only serves to benefit the cult without really protecting the child or his/her parts.

I am a year old, and a part inside that has been created through intense, agonizing pain has been called forward. This part, called “Mortal Flesh” is greeted by adults dressed in dark brown robes, the Council of the Flesh. “Flesh” is always associated with terrible pain, since it represents my mortal wants and desires, the things that keep me from ascending, according to the theology that I have been taught by the fathers.

The council head greets me, saying, "Welcome, mortal child. You are here to learn more about why it is important to overcome the flesh." I tremble a bit, because I do not like pain, but am able to cover my response and look expectantly at the figures.

"What are the primary sins of the flesh?" one of the council members asks me. I talked very early, as many of the infants in our facility do, in part due to genetic engineering for high IQs. I respond as taught: Unbelief, doubt, and disobedience – and forgetting eternity.

I have given the correct responses and they nod with satisfaction. Then Lovent, the council head, comes near me. This dark-clad figure takes my arm with one hand. In the other is a small candle. He speaks an incantation, and it lights with a flickering flame. He holds the candle flame to my arm for a period of time. I am in intense pain, sweating with the agony, but I do not pull away. Finally, with a deep burn on my arm, Lovent grunts his satisfaction with my desire to "overcome the flesh". If I had pulled away, or screamed, I know that I would have been subjected to something even more painful. Terrible pain has been part of my life intermittently since I was in the womb, and my obedience to this council represents my deep-felt, instinctive desire to not experience even more pain.

I have been taught that the Council of the Flesh wants my best good and is teaching me to overcome my flesh so that I can ascend and join others who live in the celestial realms. Their greatest desire, they assure me, is to help me to avoid mortal hell, the fate for those who descend due to unbelief, doubt, and disobedience. By now, I have visited all seven levels of "hell" at the programming studio and agree heartily with them that this place is to be avoided at all costs. The Council of the Flesh has an eager, believing pupil for their theology.

I have already internalized this council, along with other councils such as the 12 members of the Mage Council, the Council of the Immortals, and the secret Vatican Council (which is not the public Vatican Council) inside. All leadership councils have 12 members, the number of governance, with it understood that Satan is the 13th member.

The Council of the Flesh by now has been internalized within me as well, and can cause intense pain in my body, and punish inside parts who seem to be following "fleshly desires" (e.g., not following their programming directives) instead of seeking immortality. If I seek eternity, and obey my programming, a member of the Council of the Immortals will call out one of my immortals inside and will take me up the golden stairway to the celestial realms as a reward.

At a year old, the celestial realms setup is more elaborate than when I was just a few weeks old. There are mists that glow everywhere, created by dry ice, and even a display of what looks like an aurora borealis above in the sky. The rich, fruity cream cake I am allowed to eat there makes me want to work hard to achieve permanent immortality, which I am assured I will be able to do one day.

I have a full operant conditioning system, reward and punishment, deeply installed by this age of one year old. The celestial realms are the "reward", and "hell" is the punishment system, for obedience and disobedience, respectively. If I disobey a command, I not only fear the anger of my programmer, I now fear descending for all of eternity into hell.

By this age, I have also internalized within my mind the hierarchy of councils that I have interacted with and been programmed by for the past year. These councils inside are the high controllers in my systems. They can mete out both punishment and reward internally, even in the absence of the external setups. This has been the real goal of these setups: to teach me to internalize the beliefs and behaviors and responses that the programmers have patiently been training me in over my time in the womb and the first year of my life. That is, they have made me a collaborator to and a perpetuator of my own abuse and control.

My birth name is Lucient, but my daily name is Lucia. I am usually called Luce. This is the name of my 'cult host', or the part that presents during my cult life in the facility. As my cult life was the majority of my life until my escape in 2007, with only limited time in the presentations in different countries, Luce is the part of me who feels most like the 'real me'.

Mengele and Hilde work with me still, although my main influence are the fathers I love. Mengele and Hilde praise me for doing well and acting "intelligently" in different situations, but as Luce, I looked forward each day to the time I get to spend with the fathers I love.

For the first three years of life, life was regimented according to a strict routine. Early morning assessments are done quickly, with the fathers checking at regular intervals if prior programs installed are still intact. In between, there is holding and cuddling; these times too is scheduled. Later in the day, I learn the new day's task(s). There is always, always something new to be learned or practice designed to build further on old skills previously learned.

I felt like a miniature performer as the tasks continued day after day: learn to swim (and see how long I could endure in the water in one early test); learn to crawl across a narrow bridge with water on both sides, and see if I could push another baby crawling across the same bridge into the water; learn to open my little legs on cue from a trainer (for sexual training); learn to switch out parts on cue with colored lights and tones, and many more tasks.

For the first three years, the children in the order are dressed in short white robes. Between three and five years old, the children wear brown tunics and leggings, then graduate to an acolyte's hooded brown robes at six years old. The older children find us younger children adorable. They enjoy interacting with me and the other infants, and will often come by and stroke our little cheeks and hands, or tell us that one day we will be big and have fun like they do. I love this attention and want to grow up to wear an acolyte's brown robe one day, and eventually at 13 years old, complete the coming of age ceremony and earn my adult name. I know that this will require learning many, many new skills and knowledge, and at this age, as the cult host, I am eager to learn.

Years later, when I was healing, I had trouble with the term "host", and especially its definition: an amnesic part that lives a life without abuse, or any knowledge of abuse. My host knew well that she was being raised within an occultic society. This was the only world she knew both as a child and as an adult. She knew about much of the abuse, and about the parts. She was allowed to watch and help monitor the different parts that presented when living in various countries. She was also one of my most deeply cult-loyal parts, because with all of her heart, she loved the fathers she had attached to. This feeling was true even during adulthood, which made leaving the order later in life very, very difficult. I missed the fathers when I didn't see or hear from them regularly, and not talking to them would trigger intense grief.

I am 12 months old. Father Jerome has tied me to his waist with a thick rope. He is playing the role of a system controller. My role is to obey everything he tells me, quickly and without error.

"Pick up those blocks," he says, "and stack the red ones together and the blue ones together." I quickly kneel by the blocks and do this task. When I am done, he says, "Good, good." In my role as a system part, I am learning how important instant obedience to my controllers is. The rope represents authority. The controller, being played today by Father Jerome, is always wearing the rope, and the system parts are tied to the controller by ropes.

It is a few days later. We are walking quickly and go to a field with lots of rocks. "Pick up the rocks, and put them in this corner of the field," he orders, pointing near the intersection of two stone walls. I begin picking up rocks while he oversees what I do. I am little and tire quickly, and his job is to encourage me to complete the task. Finally, we rest.

"You are listening well, and I am proud of you, Delta 34" he says. Jerome is dressed as Orgus, one of my delta controllers, and even in this menial task, I must obey him. The rocks represent memories, and he is teaching me to take them and put them in the correct area of the field. The field is divided up into squares labeled with various names and runes. I must match the rock and its rune with the storage rune.

After a period of rest, we eat some bread and drink some water then go back to our task. "Delta 34, put these memories into this storage file," Orgus commands, pointing to an area of the field marked with a rune that means "Low security". Quickly, obediently, I do so. "Delta 34, pass this memory into this file," he commands again, and I take the rock into a storage file marked "Medium security." I already know that rocks that are "high security" must be passed back to Orgus, to put into a special high security vault deep beneath us.

I am 18 months old. I have a rope tied around my waist. I am a gamma system controller, and tied to me by thick ropes are small children of my own age. There are six children. I have been told that my job is to ensure that they are completely obedient to me. These children represent my system parts. My job is to protect them by ensuring obedience to all commands from the programmers.

"You can walk around this house, but do not touch any of the candy in the yellow room," I am told by Father Carlotti, who is dressed in the costume of a master controller from the galaxy Pleiades. He has the stars of Pleiades scattered over a dark, midnight blue sky, and is wearing the runes and codes that signify his status. System controllers such as gamma system controllers take their orders from master controllers inside. Their orders must always, always, be utterly obeyed.

The children and I walk together into different rooms in the house. I have to tug on the ropes of a few to get them to follow. One room is painted with bright yellow walls, and this color, and the huge table in the middle of the room, attract us all. The children and I eagerly walk towards the table, where there are piles of candies in glass bowls.

I try to pull them away, but I am not strong enough to stop all of them pulling at me at once. One little girl, who looks so much like me, grabs a piece of soft divinity off the table and starts eating it. I try to pull her away, but it is too late; she has disobeyed the order.

Suddenly, she jerks in a violent seizure, turning blue. The other children stop their own rush towards the table. With frightened eyes we watch as this child continues seizing, and then dies. The candy must have poison in it, and she has disobeyed and died as a result. But I am responsible for her obedience, and with guilt and shame, realize that it is my fault that she died.

Pleiades (Father Carlotti) comes into the room and looks with anger and disgust at what has happened. "You killed her!" he tells me. "You didn't make sure she obeyed you! A controller always makes sure that their system obeys them. You failed her!"

I feel terrible, but worse is to come. Now, as I move with the children around the house, I must drag this dead child around with me.

"You are feeling the weight of your failure," Pleiades (Father Carlotti) says. I feel terrible, and start crying. A child, one put into my care, has died, because I failed to ensure her obedience to a command from the master controller for my system. I crumple to the floor, heartbroken, as I weep.

"Stop crying and do your job," he says sternly. "Don't let any more of your children die."

He then gives another command. "Do not let any of the children touch the toys in the blue room." The blue room is one we saw when walking through, but on this round of the house, I see toys on the floor: blocks of various colors, puzzles, picture books, and sparkly, beautiful dolls and balls. The children, who seem intent on disobeying me in spite of what happened in the yellow room, try to pull me over with them to the toys on the floor.

"No, no, children, no!" I scream. I pull with all of my strength, trying to pull them away. But the children wear me down, and one of them picks up a shiny red ball. Suddenly, there is a scream, and the child falls down dead. With a feeling of despair, I realize that this toy, too, contains poison. I am now dragging two dead children around from the ropes tied to my waist, and I am very tired. But the other children are now very quiet and seem willing to listen to me when I tell them not to touch anything at all in the house unless I give them permission. We sit in the middle of a red room, and Pleiades (Father Carlotti) enters. "You may all have a drink of juice," he says, and he pours out a cup for each of us. The juice tastes good, and I am relieved that no death results.

"Only allow them to do the things I tell you to," he says. "This is the only way to ensure their safety." I nod my understanding.

The children and I stay in this terrible house for two days. I am dragging the two dead children, reminders of what happens when system controller allows parts to disobey their master controller. During the day, Pleiades (Father Carlotti) comes at intervals, and lets us eat, or allows us to play with only certain toys, or rest. The children, who are still alive, and I sleep together, utterly exhausted by the end of the day, tied together, on a mat on the floor.

By the second day, the bodies of the two children who died begin to smell. The other children and I feel ill from the smell, and Pleiades (Father Carlotti) returns. "You are smelling the stench of disobedience," he tells us. I wonder how long I must drag these bodies around. I am feeling tired, ill, and sick of it all.

Finally, Pleiades returns again, gives a code, and I go inside. He then unties me from the children, and Lucia, my cult host, is sent out to take a shower and then rest in my dorm room. I am tired indeed and realize that being a controller is a great responsibility. The lives of those under me depend upon my ensuring complete obedience. I go to sleep, dreaming of saving children, while I am yelling orders at them, frantic to save their lives.

This memory caused me to cry for days when I first had it. I felt overwhelmed by guilt, sadness, grief, and then, finally, anger at Carlotti and the other fathers for putting me through such a terrible setup at such a young age. This is how the Jesuits train the internal controllers and master controllers to do their jobs: it is at the threat of loss of life if they should fail, not just for them, but for those they are supposed to protect.

I now realized why for years, my system controllers had been fighting me so hard, when I asked them to stop doing their cult jobs. They were desperately, desperately, trying to save the lives of children that they loved. They were terrified to disobey the master controllers over them inside, who I had yet to meet at that point in my healing. The lessons of absolute obedience, of never failing, and of controlling inside parts, had been instilled through this and numerous similar setups.

The Cages

I am two years old. I am sitting in a small metal cage that is just big enough for me to curl up in. I am in a cage on the bottom row of a small pyramid comprised of four levels of cages, stacked one on top of each other. The bottom row has six cages, the next row above has four cages, then two cages in the next row above, and finally one cage at the very top. Each cage contains a child. We are all close in age.

I feel liquid dripping down on me. Someone in one of the cages above me has urinated on me. I hate the sticky, smelly urine. But my hair is matted with worse: the soft liquid stool that another stressed child in one of the upper cages has evacuated. I feel filthy, frightened, and the smell is horrible. I can see Mengele and Hilde, his assistant, in another part of the room.

I am hungry and thirsty. It has been a whole day since I have had anything to eat or drink. I whimper, and a guard comes by, looks into my cage, and drags me out. He rapes me roughly, and then puts me back into the cage. I feel utterly humiliated and utterly defiled.

Mengele walks towards the cages and opens the door to mine. He draws me out of the cage, and then takes me into another room where Hilde is waiting. He places me onto a mark chalked on the floor; it is a small blue square.

“Stand in the square,” he orders me. I do so.

In front of me is a large red circle painted on the floor, and in the middle of the circle is a small infant. Mengele places a knife in my hand, and then gives a single command: “Kill!” I hesitate for a second, struggling with killing this tiny, defenseless baby with red, wrinkled face and fisted up, tiny hands. I have practiced before with kittens, strangling them with my bare hands at his order, but this is different.

Finally, I stab the infant. But I had hesitated. Mengele is displeased with me. “You must never hesitate!” he yells at me. Delayed obedience will not work with him. I am put back in the same cage, and am told by Hilde, “No food or water until you don’t hesitate”. I am trembling with hunger and thirst. The terrible smell in my cage and on my body makes me retch. I wonder if I will die here.

Eight hours later, Hilde comes and takes me out of the cage. I am being given a second chance to be obedient. Once again, I am placed on the blue square. Once again, there is a tiny baby inside the red circle. Mengele is there. I am weaving a bit from trauma and exhaustion, but I listen carefully. The order comes abruptly again: “Kill!” and this time, without hesitation, I obey.

Hilde then takes out a sponge, and with warm water that feels wonderful, washes the feces out of my hair. She then sponges the filth off of my naked body. “Good girls get to smell good,” she murmurs to me in German. “No one wants to smell bad, like a bad girl.” I am grateful for the food and bath, and already feel a little better. Maybe I won’t die. But I am also feeling sad deep inside about the little baby that has just died. But I know, oh how I know, that I cannot show any of this sadness to these two. I lock the tears deep, deep inside, handing the emotion over to parts whose job is to contain the sadness and grief.

Mengele and Hilde then take my hand, and together, they put me into one of the cages on the second tier. I have performed well, and so now only three cages are above mine. This tier gets a little bit of water and a slice of bread twice a day, and there are fewer feces and showers of urine to endure. Best of all, I am only raped once a day, instead of four times a day as I was on the lowest tier.

After this, each day, twice a day, I am taken into the room with the blue square and the red circle with a baby in the middle, and I am given the order to "Kill!" I perform well. I have seen children on the bottom row weaken and lay in their cages without moving, and I wonder how many times they have hesitated. Some end up dying, and their bodies remain there for several days as a warning to those who fail to obey instantly.

On the fourth day, instead of a baby, it is a toddler tied up in the middle of the red circle. The child is struggling and screaming, and when the order "Kill!" comes, I hesitate.

Mengele looks furious. Without a word, Hilde takes me back to the cages. I am back in one of the bottom ones, starting out all over again. The rapes every six hours start back up, and I am covered with urine and feces at the end of the next day, hungry and thirsty once more.

I know that if I stay here, I will die. The smell of the decomposing body in the cage next to mine is an object lesson in what happens to children who are on the bottom row too long.

After 24 hours, Hilde comes and gets me, and takes me back into the room with the blue square and red circle. Once again, a struggling toddler is tied up in the middle of the circle. Mengele gives the order again, and this time, I obey his command instantly, without hesitation.

"Good girl, you have learned," he croons. "My little killer is learning." Hilde again bathes me, feeds me, and once again, I am moved back to the second tier of cages. I never hesitate again. Over and over, I am given the command to kill, twice a day, and soon my response is automatic; I obey without conscious thought.

After another few days, I am in the cage at the top. I am now killing on command using various weapons – knife, a needle, a garrote. Finally, I am praised heavily, and allowed to leave the cages, the terrible cages. I was 25 months old and have learned to disconnect how much I hated taking a life from conscious thought.

Mengele's methods of programming children were cruel beyond belief. But the occultic societies recognized that he got results: a child who survived his methods would be completely programmed and obedient. This is why he was so sought after by various occultic groups around the world. For a large fee, he would go in and train children of all ages, using his primitive but effective methods which were based on data collected for years.

Sadly, he was a head trainer for the Jesuits in their main training facility and labs. He used these labs to continue his experimentation on humans, which meant that the infants and children who lived in this facility would be exposed to his merciless training. I was extremely relieved when he died when I was 19 years old, and another, younger head trainer who used better methods that did not cause such needless loss of life (or sanity, in some children) took charge of the training and experiments. The younger head trainer was my mentor, and when I became older, I replaced her as head of this facility. But I consulted with her frequently, because I admired her more humane approach and her deep insights into human behavior. She was one of my best friends, and I loved her deeply.

Alice in Wonderland

In Jesuit programming, when presenters are not 'out' in the body, they are living in 'Wonderland' inside. In the Order, Alice in Wonderland programming is used to ensure that presenters: never communicate with or be aware of other parts inside; completely believe that their memories of an ordinary life is the only life that that person is living;

stay completely amnesic to any cult activity; and stay completely unaware of any loss of time when they are not 'out' in the body. Key characters in Wonderland, such as the White Rabbit, remind presenters of these tasks, and reward and punish for compliance or disobedience as needed. As these memories relate, Alice in Wonderland programming begins at a very early age.

I am 18 months old. I am in a special place in the outdoor programming lab. It is a sunny, warm day, and the sun falls on my face and shoulders as I walk on slightly chubby but muscular legs into an opening within a boxwood maze. This opening is a beautiful arched trellis covered with roses and other climbing flowers, with sweet perfume filling the springtime air.

There is a path that I can see that leads through this maze, which is augmented in various places with trees, shrubs, and even a fake "seashore" on the shores of a small lake. I wait, enjoying the weather, which is sunny and bright. Soon, an older child dressed as Alice from Wonderland appears. She is about 11 years old, has beautiful curly, dark blond hair and light blue eyes. She is dressed in a blue dress covered with a white pinafore, and she has a big blue bow in her hair that matches her pretty eyes perfectly.

The girl guides me by the hand along the path. An adult, Mattheo, my primary trainer, is dressed like a large white rabbit, and I toddle along behind him, being guided by "Alice". I am a French presenter named "Jean". This will be my name when I spend time in France with my French family, starting at age three. As 'Jean', I have had careful programming since birth to come out and go back in on cue, and to understand French when it is spoken to me. It is the only language that I, as Jean, have ever heard in this presentation.

As Alice guides me, she warns me, "Never, ever leave the path. If you do, terrible, terrible things will happen. The only safety is to follow the white rabbit, and to stay on the path. Never leave it, regardless of what happens." I wonder what could happen that is so terrible but prefer not to find out. I have already experienced "terrible, terrible" already numerous times in my young life, and have no desire to experience it again.

The white rabbit leads us to a special area with a small stone bench, and pretty stone pavers cover the ground in the center. This area is in a large room-like area in the maze surrounded by boxwood "walls" to nearly enclose it. At the entrance that we pass through is a sign overhead written in golden runes that signify "France". I follow the white rabbit and Alice inside.

"Jean, this is where you will live in Wonderland," both Alice and the white rabbit tell me in unison. "This is your special place," the white rabbit repeats. I have heard these same instructions before, on previous visits. On the walls of the boxwoods, which are high – nearly seven feet in height – are large television screens that display pictures of my family in France playing with me as a baby, talking to me in French. The screens show me the cottage that I will live in when I go to France for the first time in another year and a half. On the video display, I hear my French mother, Jeanine, talking to me as a baby in loving tones, as she changes me. I see her take me outside to see the flowers in the cottage garden outside the house. These are the 'memories' of 'France' that Jean is supposed to have.

Alice cautions me, "You must never, ever leave this area when you are not called outside to present," she tells me sternly.

The white rabbit looks at me and repeats her warning. "You must not leave, even to go to other parts of Wonderland, ever," he insists.

I have heard this warning before, since this is not my first visit to the French part of Wonderland. The first few times, Alice and the white rabbit stayed with me and played, speaking French to me. There are toys, games, and other things to play with, even picture books with words in French on the cover. And the fascinating, fascinating videos of a wonderful life with a loving family in France play constantly. I will not be bored here.

"You must remain here when you are told to," Alice says again, and then she and the white rabbit leave. This is the first time I have been left here, and I wonder how long I will be alone.

In a little while, I hear a little girl singing and laughing outside the entrance to my special place. I look out, and see that she is about three years old, and has curly brown hair and merry green eyes. The little girl stops at the entrance to French wonderland, peeks her head in, and in English says, "Little girl, come out and play with me."

She seems to be very nice, her smile is welcoming, and I am getting tired of playing alone. The sun is shining, and she beckons with her hand outstretched to me. I walk over to her and take her hand, and we walk together down the path.

But suddenly, a large, dark bird-like creature swoops overhead. "The Jabberwocky!" the little girl screams, letting go of my hand and diving under a bush. I try to do the same, but rough hands grab me and pinch me, and two fat people take me to a corner, and rape me. The hands belong to two men dressed in striped costumes, and I learn that they are "Tweedle Dee" and "Tweedle Dum" and that they enjoy hurting little presenters who leave the place they are supposed to stay in.

I begin crying and try to make my way back to the French part of Wonderland. I hear a cacophony of voices babbling in various languages as I pass by entrances to other parts of the maze. Finally, completely lost, I go into an enclosed part of the maze where the people speak German. There is a little girl who looks like me, having lunch with her family at a round wooden table in the center of the enclosed area. "Help me!" I wail in French.

"A foreigner, a foreigner!" The family jumps to their feet, shouting in rage. Then they all rise up and stab me with their sharp forks and knives, and hurt me, including hurting me in my privates. I am screaming in terror at this point, as the German speakers say "We hate French speakers who come into our area. Stay out, you are NOT welcome here!" Traumatized and shaking, I am thrown out of this part of Wonderland, and lay on the ground, terrified. Suddenly, the white rabbit and Alice are bending over me.

"We tried to spare you this type of pain, but you didn't believe us," says the white rabbit with heartbreak in his eyes.

Slowly, they lead me back to the French area of Wonderland, where the French videos are playing. I try to explain about the little girl who tricked me into leaving.

"You will see and hear a lot of people and things that might seem to be fun, or that might make you want to leave your area," cautions Alice. "But you must never, ever listen to them. Only leave when the white rabbit tells you to; and only go where he tells you to. He will make sure that you stay safe."

The white rabbit looks at me tenderly, and I realize that he really does want to protect me from the terrible things that happen outside of the French part of wonderland.

"Why were the German people so mean to me?" I sob. "I haven't done anything to make them hate me!"

I am horrified at the thought. I am a French presenter, and so am completely amnesic to the rituals and sacrifices that I have attended, including the ones I have done to seal me into my own presentation and create barriers between me and other presentations. The hedges in Wonderland are a physical representation of these barriers, which I had crossed in my terror a few minutes before.

I certainly have. Alice and the White Rabbit leave again, and this time, in spite of hearing children skipping and singing outside my boxwood enclosure, calling out to me in various languages, inviting me to play with them, I refuse to leave, and obediently stay in my area. I am learning to ignore the other presentations in this very concrete way, and to stay inside, immune to the attractions of other lives and other languages, staying exactly where I am told internally. As I get older and start training to be a programmer myself, only then do I learn that the 'Jabberwocky' is a flying animatronic or a drone controlled by the programmers.

The setup described above is used to teach parts to never cross the perimeters and barriers between the different presentations, thus isolating parts from each other. This isolation makes the person more controllable as each part will only have a partial view of the person's lived reality. Most importantly, it terrifies the presenters into obeying the rules to never communicate with each other and to never pay attention to anything outside their designated internal zones. Otherwise, because children have natural curiosity, the different presenters might be tempted talk to each other, or to "peek out" when the other parts are presenting in their respective countries. This kind of internal communication or shared presenting would overcome the amnesia or barriers between presentations, which is considered critical to maintaining security and covers. Many exposures to these setups and special rituals are used to make the child internalize the mazes and Wonderland, and to keep presenters in their designated zones when they are not cued out.

When not out presenting, the parts will be trained to watch the videos within their special area, augmented with videos of actual events, and to accept these videos as their own 'memories'. This creates the perception of a sustained and unbroken timeline for the presenters who will believe that they are continuously "living life". They are thus not able to perceive that they are 'inside' and have in fact 'lost time' from the time intervals (which can be significant, lasting months) between being called out to present. For instance, if a child has not been sent to a presentation for many months, they will be shown videos of significant events that the child allegedly experienced during this time. Thus, Jean will have her own "memories" of childhood, with many important events "remembered", in spite of the fact that in reality, she only spends three weeks a year in France, trading out with her twin sister and other children who look like her in this role. All have been equally programmed to look, act, and sound like "Jean", and the families are also programmed to not notice when 'Jean' is played by different children at different times. The Order will typically conceive several children (two to four is an average number) that look alike, making such 'swapping' possible when necessary.

I am two and a half years old. I am outside a special room in the programming lab, dressed in a bright blue dress that falls just beneath my knees, and a white pinafore. My hair has been dyed yellow with a temporary dye. I have a large white bow in my hair, along with white stockings and shiny shoes. I am Alice, one of the main presentation controllers, and I am going to a tea party. I love tea parties, with cakes and tea to eat and drink, and I look forward to this. Next to me, holding my hand, is Mnemosyn. In my Alice in Wonderland programming, she is a mother figure to me, Alice. Mnemosyn takes me places, reminding me of what to remember and what to forget. Mnemosyn also helps me to "remember to forget". I look at her and smile, and she smiles back.

We enter the room and sit at the tea party table. Several fathers I love are sitting at the table. But there is something wrong, terribly wrong. As I look at them, to my horror, I realize that these beloved fathers have been killed in terrible, gruesome ways: one father has his eyes gouged out, and is slumped blankly on his chair, unseeing with dark, bloody holes in his face. Another father has blood pouring out of his mouth, as he sits in pale, bloody death. The one next to him has his arms amputated. Blood has been pouring out in spurts and covers his robes. Across from him, a father has her chest stabbed and her breasts cut off. Her mutilated body leans at a grotesque angle in her chair. Each of the twelve chairs holds a gruesome, terrible scene of a recent death of a father I love.

"What are you screaming about?" Mnemosyn asks calmly, as she sits and pours tea for me out of a large teapot. "You seem upset about something."

I cannot believe what she is saying. It is obvious what I am upset about! "The fathers!" I cry out in anguish. "They're dead! Someone has killed them!"

Mnemosyn stops, looks at me, and says, "Alice, there are no dead fathers here. It's just you and I. Now stop being silly, and let's enjoy our tea". She points to an empty chair for me to sit in, and fills my cup with tea, passing me a plate with biscuits on it. "Have one, they're especially good," she says, completely ignoring the gruesome scene around us.

I feel green, but have learned to always obey Mnemosyn, whose job is to tell me what to believe and what not to believe – or remember. As she calmly munches on a biscuit and sips tea, she tries to discuss the outing that we will have in a bit to the beach. But I am white-faced and have difficulty not looking at the gruesome scene around the table.

"You look upset," she says in a slightly critical tone.

"But, the fathers," I say again, pointing to one of the dead fathers who has been murdered next to me to illustrate my point.

"Alice, you must stop imagining such things," she scolds. "If I say they aren't here, they aren't here. Why can't you listen to me? Don't you think I would be upset if there was something here to see?" As she continues to lecture me, I finally calm down and have a sip of tea with sugar from the beautifully decorated teapot: it has lovely roses and flowers on it, and golden runes in a lovely design.

"Good, Alice, you are looking better," Mnemosyn praises me. "You really shouldn't go around talking about dead bodies that aren't there. That's what gets people locked up in the insane asylum. Listen to me, and that will never happen to you."

She is reassuring in her tone. Then, she says, "Do you agree to believe everything – and I mean everything – that I tell you, and to ignore completely the things I tell you to?" Her eyes look fierce as she says this, and I say "Yes" in a low voice.

She then takes me to a small altar in one corner of the room, and we do a sacrifice together; I put a small child on the altar and stab it through the eyes, as I say "I will only see what you, Mnemosyn, tell me to see," and then stab it in the head, saying "I will only remember what you, Mnemosyn, tell me to remember." She pats me on the head, praising me, as I invoke a demonic spirit of memory control to come inside and help me to always listen to Mnemosyn. Afterwards, we turn around, and I am startled. The table has been completely cleaned up; there are no gruesome bodies, and the tablecloth is sparkling white. The tea party looks just as it should, with colorful flowers in a vase. I join Mnemosyn at the table who with a smile says, "See, Alice? There were no bodies here. You were just having a bad dream. Always, always bring your bad dreams to me, and I will help them go away."

I feel rather dazed. Deep inside, I wonder if the fathers I love are okay, dream or no dream. It was all too real, what I saw before the sacrifice. But Mnemosyn carries on a bright, happy conversation. I finish having tea with her and the other characters from Wonderland who have come to join us: Dormouse, the Mad Hatter, the White Rabbit. These are all children or fathers I love, dressed in costumes, but they play their parts perfectly, and we have a good time.

Later, I tremble just slightly as I leave the programming lab to return to my room. On the way, I see Mattheo and Jerome together; they smile at me and look just fine; they act as if nothing at all has happened in that terrible room; they certainly aren't dead, or even hurt. I wonder, then, if it really was all just a bad dream as Mnemosyn insisted.

This "tea party" setup was an essential part of developing my presenter amnesia controllers, Alice and Mnemosyn. In these setups, Mnemosyn, the adult programmer and a mother figure to young Alice, is modeling to her the behaviors and beliefs expected of the non-cult presentations if they ever remember any cult-related memories, and shows her how to handle them with denial and amnesia. The two of them work together to take memories of violent cult rituals or other events that a presenter might have, and to consign these memories into the categories of "bad dreams" which are not to be believed. That is, they are dedicated to ensuring presenter amnesia and denial of cult life. This enables the presenters to keep believing that their 'ordinary lives' are the only life they have ever lived, and that they have never experienced ritual abuse or mind control.

By the time I am five, Alice is able to check if any non-cult presenter is experiencing any unauthorized or 'bleed through' memories of their cult life, cult events, or lives of other presenters. If this is happening, she can help the presenter to completely forget them with the help of the ever-watchful and careful Mnemosyn. Of course, my cult host is allowed to remember cult life so Alice does not interact with her. If Lucia, my cult host, has any memories that need to be forgotten, these will be stored within a completely different high-security storage system that has different guardians and barriers.

Because Alice, Mnemosyn, and the other Wonderland parts have critical controller roles, they undergo frequent reinforcement of their programming through not only physical setups but the use of virtual reality and other technologies. As usual, the setups are designed to create complete amnesia, and to teach Alice to help the presenters to only remember what they are told to remember. These setups are at times brutally violent in order to make the threat of what could happen, if a presenter remembers things that they shouldn't, seem absolutely believable.

Over the next few months, the presenters themselves will be hosted in the various countries they are to live in at times. Before doing so, they will experience numerous physical setups in which the lives of their (beloved) family members – father, mother, sister, brother, aunt, grandmother, etc. – in various countries will be threatened should they ever remember their cult experiences, or the memories of parts that present in other countries. Finally, before starting to live with the family for a few weeks in France, or Germany, or another country, a "baby" brother in each of these families is killed by the young child who is to live and present in these countries. This creates extra guilt (along with terror created by the threat of the family "telling" and the child being sent to "prison") which will help to maintain the complete amnesia required.

Shell Programming

I am a presentation controller named Andromeda. I am two and a half years old. My job is to make sure that the presentation shells are working correctly, and that only the parts in the presenting shell are allowed to see, hear or speak. Other presentation parts, while not out in their respective shells, are not allowed to see, speak or hear. My instructions are clear: ONLY the child locked into the shell (with a special key) is allowed to see, hear or speak. The others must be silent, and unaware of what the child in the shell says or does.

Today, I am practicing controlling the French shell and the French parts who present through this shell. My twin sister, Lizzie, is playing the role of the French presenter today. She is wearing the clear flexible plastic shell that represents the shell program. My twin sister Lizzie, as Jean (we both play this presentation role in France, so she plays her role perfectly) is speaking in French to her French mother, who is in the programming studio to assist with this program. To help teach the other presentation parts who are not currently out in their respective shells that they must not see, hear or speak, children labeled with runes that represent other presentations are standing behind me. They are wearing eye patches, ear plugs, and blindfolds over their mouths to prevent their seeing, hearing, or speaking anything

While Lizzie is talking, I am doing my other, critical job: as a presentation controller, I am monitoring Jean to ensure that her language, her apparent intellect, her body language, and her motor skills are perfectly in line with her presentation profile designed by the programmers. If she deviates even slightly, or tries to take her shell off, she will be tortured terribly, and so will I. If I fail to report even the slightest deviation to Pleiades, Polaris, or Galatea, my own controllers and the triad of master controllers over all of the presentation systems, they and I will be tortured terribly. Father Mattheo, the person I love most, is Pleiades, and I am desperate that I perform well and not fail. I don't want him tortured. The three master controllers are sitting quietly on an elevated platform above the scene, which represents their more ascended status: the higher the controller, the higher in the room they sit. These master controllers are dressed in robes covered with stars representing their galaxy, watching, just as they will do internally as I grow and the program is fully installed.

Jean performs perfectly, even not understanding English when one of her mother's friends comes by, looks at Jean, and asks her a question in English. Since in her French presentation, Jean does not understand English, she gives the woman a smile, and a look of bewilderment. Jean has passed her test, and I am relieved.

Pleiades approaches me where I am standing on my little, raised platform above the children representing various presenters. He gives a verbal code, flashes a special pattern on the handheld device that he shows me, and also shows me his golden key. I must see all of these things, along with his voice and face, in order to obey his command to change shells. This has been practiced thousands of times over the past two years. I obey instantly. He has given me the code to change shells, replacing the French shell out in front with the Russian shell. I have a lever that rotates the correct shell out to the place in the room that represents the shell being out in the body. I relay the command to Athena, my sub-controller, who goes and gets another little girl. This little girl represents Katerina, or Katya as she is called by friends and family, and she is my Russian presenter. I must make sure that the shell is in place perfectly, locked in so that the little girl cannot remove it, and then monitor her performance as Katya. I give the key to Athena, the controller under me, who locks the shell with the little girl in it into place, and returns the key to me.

Katya's sister in the family that she will live with when she is in Russia, who is also a Jesuit child, comes into the room, and starts speaking Russian. Katya is performing well: her body language, language skills and abilities seem consistent with her profile. Then, an older man with white hair comes into the room. He is holding another little girl by the hand. The little girl comes over to Katya, and asks her in German, "What is your name?" as she smiles.

Katya answers, "Katya." I am horrified. She has broken with her presentation profile, disobeying her programming to only know Russian. I hear a sharp "zap!" and Katya falls over unconscious. I hear another zap, and I am shocked throughout my body with terrible, excruciating pain.

Pleiades and the other master controllers come over. They are angry. "She failed, and that means you failed!" they tell me. "Your life, and the lives of your presenters, depend upon never, ever breaking profile. Things like this can never, ever be allowed to happen!"

I am heartbroken. I failed, and Katya almost died. I am responsible for her, and her failure means that I had failed her.

The next day I am given another chance. Another little girl, one of my sisters who is presenting as Katya, plays her part perfectly. I have been given a new tool: a wand that can instantly stun a presenter into unconsciousness if they falter or deviate slightly from their profile. This way, they won't have to get hurt and possibly die, as I am told could happen if they continue to fail.

"You can prevent their deaths, if you discipline them swiftly and correctly," Polaris tells me. "Punishing them for disobeying – even slightly – will save their lives, and mine."

I feel the weight of this responsibility. Being a high-level controller over presentations is a very difficult job. But I desperately, desperately want to save the lives of the people I love, and my own life, so I will learn to do this job, and do it well.

As time goes on, there are fewer and fewer infractions or variances from the presentation profiles, under my watchful eye. These are punished immediately and painfully, and as I have been taught to do, I report the deviations to the three master controllers over me. They will notify Saturn, my presentation reprogramming system, and tell him which internal reprogramming sequences to run that night to fix the errors and repair the system. The fathers want our systems to be able to self-reprogram, because we may be in situations where we are away from Rome, and unable to get to a programming facility for a period of time.

As this memory shows, the presentation programming that I underwent was quite complex, where my internal controllers and master controllers were taught to do their jobs by the programmers using concrete setups to model the expected behaviors and train these controllers. The punishments for any infractions are very severe in order to instill the importance of never breaking presentation when being hosted in another country outside of the facility. Internally, Athena, the part who works under Andromeda, goes to the entrance portal of Wonderland and tells the white rabbit to bring the correct presenter. Pleiades informs Andromeda which presenter this is, and Andromeda will pass this command on to Athena. The white rabbit and Alice together will bring the correct presenter to Athena, who will then go to Andromeda, get the key to lock the presenter into her shell, and then return the key to Andromeda.

When the child's designated time in the presentation is over for the time being, Andromeda will give Athena the key to unlock the presenter from the shell. She then returns the presenter to the rabbit hole where Alice will be waiting for the presenter. Alice then takes the presenter by the hand and leads her down the rabbit hole and back into Wonderland, taking her back to the correct area within it. At this point, depending on the orders given by Pleiades, Andromeda will have another presenter brought out, to be locked into the appropriate shell, or other controllers may have the cult host or other cult parts present, according to what the cult needs at that point.

The concern about breaking presentation is a concern that if a child acts "differently" and their profiles are not "perfect", then the cover story that the little girl has only lived in America, or that she grew up in France and has never traveled elsewhere, could be questioned. If a child looks "multiple", or "abused", this could also draw undue attention and scrutiny from others, which is the last thing that the Jesuits want. For the children are used to help conceal the criminal activities worldwide that the Order is involved in, once they are hosted in various nations.

Chapter 4: Theta and Spiritual Systems Training

Some of the events described in this chapter on theta and spiritual training may stretch the limits of believability. Based on my memories, in order to train their children in these skills and indoctrinate them in their occult teachings, the Order uses real spiritual experiences as well as elaborate setups with costumes and props, virtual reality and other technologies, drugs and hypnosis. Both types of experiences will feel very real to the child who is going through it. It can be difficult to distinguish whether a memory is of a real spiritual experience, or of a contrived scenario carefully staged by the adults. In this chapter, I describe the events as I experienced them as a child, when they felt completely real to me. While I personally believe that the events I have chosen to describe in this chapter were indeed authentic spiritual experiences, I am also open to the possibility that they were staged and based upon trickery.

Theta Training

The room is dark with absolutely no light in it. I am only three months old, in a crib. I am gumming on a toy that I have been given to play with: a severed human head. With my tiny fingers, I explore its matted hair, its eyes, its mouth. I am a theta controller named Nemesis in training. Darkness has been the main realm that I live in. I only feel comfortable in this dark. This and similar body parts have been my playthings.

Later, Father Carlotti comes into the room. He places steel blades on the ends of my little feet, and tells me to kick hard. I kick as hard as I can. They encounter the soft fur of a rabbit that squeals. My kicks have killed it. Carlotti lifts me up, hugs me, and praises me. “This is where your power comes from,” he tells me in a soft voice. “You really are a little killer.” I feel funny about his praise. I am glad that he is happy, but deep inside, I don’t like being called a “killer”.

A few months later, Father Jerome comes into the room to take me for my daily training. I am not feeling good, in fact, I feel ill, and do not want to go. So, I think about hitting Jerome in the head with a tiny fist, even though he is too far away to reach, to let him know where I hurt. I simply think it. Father Jerome steps back, looking surprised, and then goes to get Father Carlotti. “She hit me with theta skill,” he tells Carlotti. Carlotti is surprised and objects, “That’s impossible. She’s much too young.”

Jerome lifts me up and praises me for what I have done. He checks my head and gives me some medicine to help with the headache and slight fever. “You were trying to tell me what was wrong, weren’t you?” he says in a loving voice. I had and am glad that he figured it out. But I am also pondering the fact that I can think something, will it, and others feel it. It seems like a wonderful new thing to be able to do.

I am nine months old and have been taught by Father Mattheo to direct my theta blows at animals. I can now kill an animal easily with a quick blow. For some reason, he and the other fathers seem excited by this ability. I hate the terrible scream the animals make as I kill them, but they tell me that what I am doing is good, very, very good indeed.

I wonder why an activity that makes me so sad makes them so happy. It makes me feel strange and dirty inside. I hate the rituals that have to be done before and after the kills to “give power”. I hate the killing. But I cannot let them know this. They will be angry, and I might even have to visit “hell”. I don’t want that.

Today is a bit different. Mattheo brings a small child that I have never seen before into the room and tells me to hit the child hard with my theta ability. I don’t want to do this and look upset. Mattheo sits me on his lap and talks to me. “Nemesis, this is a very, very bad child that has hurt a lot of other children in terrible ways. If this child is allowed to grow up, he will become very evil and might even kill me and the other fathers and children in the facility." I am listening, but still don't feel quite right. "You want to protect us from that kind of evil, don't you?" he asks, looking at me tenderly.

I feel a deep conflict inside. I don't want to hurt the child, but I don't want Mattheo or the others that I love so much to be hurt. I know all about evil adults, I have met them in setups: terrible people who claw, torture, rape and hurt children and babies, making them scream. Mattheo seems to think that I can prevent this, if I hit this child hard. So, hesitantly, I do what Mattheo asks: I hit the child with a theta blow. The child falls over dead, bleeding from his nose and mouth. It is very much like killing an animal, but with much more sadness.

"Very, very good, Nemesis," he tells me. As Nemesis, I am named after one of the beautiful immortals who has visited my crib since birth. I carry this name proudly because I want to be like her. "I am so proud of you. I love you." He takes me out of the room and plays with me for a whole extra hour that day. I love this extra attention, and know that next time, I will do even better.

By the time I am three years old, I can kill teens and small adults with my theta abilities. I have learned that if I have sexual activity with someone first, it is much easier to create the spiritual connection that will enable the theta killing. There are two other theta controllers along with me, Nemesis, inside: Phobos and Chaos. Along with their systems, they have also learned to do their jobs well. Controllers often come in groups of three. They consider one another "sisters" inside, helping each other to do their jobs well, and also monitoring one another inside for signs of failure which are instantly reported to the programmers.

Phobos has the job of sending dreams of extreme terror to those she visits, while Chaos has the job of creating insanity in those she visits. Phobos has an easy job; she has thousands of terrible memories and feelings of terror that she can draw on from my less than ideal childhood to send out. Chaos takes the memories of being drugged and tortured, and the awful horror she experienced, to send out to others. We three controllers live in a special area internally, with temples dedicated to each of us. When called to present to the outside world, we are treated as "deities", with sacrifices and worship done to us. It is thrilling, but still feels a bit strange, to be called a "god" and to have adults bow to me, but this is part of being an immortal, and I learn to accept it as my due.

Theta training involves training parts to stay in the theta brainwave state. Parts are taught to stay in this state through a course of punishment and reward: punishment for going into a different state, reward for staying in it. The training of theta parts also include much indoctrination regarding the benefits of being in theta state.

Many occultists believe that this is a state wherein the individual has increased spiritual sensitivity and abilities, including the ability to do remote viewing and psychic killing. Based on my adult memories in the cult, the occult societies and government agencies prize psychic killing because the source of the death is completely undetectable: there is no poison, no physical wound, and so it allows an assassination that cannot be explained using physical methods.

Theta state can also enhance physical abilities, such as running faster than would otherwise be physically possible. I have seen individuals walk up a wall and back down when in this state, levitate above the ground, and bend spoons and other objects with their minds. While many in the western world, where logic and scientific "proof" methods have created a worldview that does not allow for the supernatural interventions in the physical world, my own experiences growing up contradict that view.

Spiritual Systems Training

Q'bala Training

I am four years old. I have entered a room that has special black and white patterns, with white and black squares, diamonds and half squares, as well as numbers and runes written on different squares in beautiful white or gold letters. This is a depiction of a part of the Q'bala. I must learn to carefully walk the various patterns and numbers and runes in an exacting, precise sequence. In one of my systems, the Q'bala is the pathway to enlightenment, one which involves learning complex numerical sequences with spiritual meanings.

At the various doors into this room are older children dressed as either a "black angel" or a "white angel". These are the guardians of the Q'bala. They do not allow unauthorized intruders to enter the Q'bala, and at times, I myself play the part of angelic guardian as well, glowering fiercely at anyone who attempts to enter this magical room without the proper codes. I have already internalized this room and am now learning to walk the paths and do complex equations that will provide answers to difficult questions with the help of spiritual beings. I am also learning to internalize my own guardians who are being taught how to do their jobs inside through watching these guardians and interacting with them. My trainers understand that at this young age, an experience is worth more than a thousand explanations, and that the beliefs and behaviors will be internalized much more quickly and longer term if they are experienced concretely. "Experiencing is believing" is their thinking, and I experience many, many setups during my first few years of life.

I am five years old. I am stretched out with arms and legs restrained on a cold, white marble floor. There are demonic beings hovering over each of the points of the sephiroth, special areas on my body which open up portals that enter into the demonic realms. These portals are used for traveling out of body. A special ritual is being done to reinforce the power and to keep open the portal at a point on my upper body. A sacrifice is done, and a bloody baby is laid on top of this area, where it is dying, as I chant the appropriate words.

"Receive this sacrifice, Chokmah", I chant, asking that the entity – an immortal being- that lives in this point of my body will receive my offering to him. I will rely on him and others to help me travel the dimensions, as well as to travel to various locations for remote viewing and other activities. I have been doing this for several years. I barely notice the increased weight and depression as this ritual is done, or how as Chokmah sits on top of me, he seems to suffocate me. I have been taught that should I do these rituals regularly, that the beings at the points of the sephiroth will take my life if I do not feed them myself in return for their "help" and "power". I do not fail to perform regular rituals to them and have also internalized the rituals: my internal points of the sephiroth all do internal sacrifices on internalized altars, to continue to maintain their power.

The scenes I describe are only a small portion of the cabalistic training that children in the Jesuit order go through. The full training takes years. These memories illustrate some of the terrible feelings experienced by a young child being forced to go through such training. When these memories came back, I tried to get rid of the dark spiritual beings sitting on these points in my body. I knew they were evil and did not want any good for me. However, I experienced extreme panic for several days because the very young parts of me who had gone through these experiences completely believed that these entities protected them. They also believed that these spirits would take vengeance on them or their loved ones, should I ever try to stop being loyal to them. For examples, parts believed that these demons "protected" them from other demons in the dimensions they had traveled. Parts also believed that these demons are able to come from the dimensions and "eat" them if they are not protected, and none of them wanted a creature such as a harpy to come into our dimension and kill them.

It took weeks of grounding and bringing truth to these very young parts to help them realize that we have a protection that is much greater than the power of any demon: the loving authority of the true Jesus. Yes, there were spiritual attacks because the people who had trained me were not happy when they felt in the spiritual realm that something had changed. But at the name of Jesus, those spirits trying to attack me – it felt like a cult loyal parts split from Cerachnid become the system parts that she will oversee and eventually learn to control.

Cerachnid will eventually learn to forget that these other parts originally came from her, and instead, will see herself as protecting them from "further harm" (going through the agonizing pain, pain that made her feel as if she was dying, of her original splitting memory). She is told that she can only keep them "safe" by ensuring that they are always "good" by being obedient to programming cues and commands. Her desire to protect these parts dissociated from herself from experiencing further pain and trauma actually reflects the deep, instinctive self-love that all babies have for themselves, which the programmers are counting upon as they cause her and other primary controller parts to dissociate and then re-organize into subsidiary, system parts.

It is several weeks later, and I am four and a half months old. Cerachnid is taken to a special room in the programming lab. There is a huge tree pattern laid out on the floor, with a trunk, roots, branches and leaves. She has already met "Gnossis" (the tree of knowledge), a woman dressed in a tree costume, who visited her crib numerous times over the past few months, and explained to her who she is. Cerachnid now sees the face of this woman embedded in the center of the tree, inlaid with the bark, and wiggles with recognition.

"Cerachnid, it is time for you to learn where you live on the tree," the soft, beautiful voice says. "Come to your place." At that moment, a special pattern (Cerachnid's code), a small green light and the musical sequence play on a specific branch, close to the trunk. Cerachnid is guided by the trainer to this spot, and she sits.

"This is where you will live," says the soft voice of the tree. "This is your special place where you can feel safe; if you leave your special place, you and those you protect and help – your system – will be unsafe". The trainer then comes and hugs Cerachnid, and gives her a soft, sweet rusk to suck on. They spend time in peaceful activity, while one limb of the tree slowly strokes Cerachnid's back and the trainer murmurs loving words to her. After a few minutes, the trainer calls out another part whose job is to not remember the programming session, Cerachnid goes back in, and the trainer picks me up and carries me out of the lab. I have no memory of what happened inside the lab; only Cerachnid will remember learning her place on the tree.

It is not until this program, and the deep feeling of love and safety for going to the correct place on the tree, and remaining there, is instilled, that the punishments for leaving the designated place or disobedience are installed. For the rest of her life, Cerachnid will always seek to return to that initial sense of peace, safety and being loved that underpinned her programming. And for her, this means complete, unquestioning obedience and belief in what her trainers tell her.

The above memory illustrates how the Jesuit trainers use a combination of concrete, physical structures and activities for their training of infants and young children, combined with rewards and punishments to ensure that expected behaviors will be instilled. But this, like all programming, will often rest upon an earlier, primary memory, of a time when the controller was loved and felt safe; in essence, a "resting place" that the controller will always try to return to whenever possible. The trainers provide a framework for the only way this feeling of security and attachment can be attained: being programmable, and obedient to the programs being installed by the trainers.

I love the other infants I am living with in the large nursery filled with cribs. We are fed bottles of milk at the same time, and later sit at a short table and eat together as we become able to sit up. During free time, we play together. Most of all, we learn to do things together.

I am a year old. I and the other infants my age are being told to sit in groups of four at small child-sized tables with colored blocks.

"I want you all to build a tower with all blue blocks on the bottom, all red in the row above, and then all yellow blocks at the top. I want you to do this together when you hear the bell ring," Mattie is telling us. She is one of the top 11-year-olds in programming. Behind her is Father Timothy, her mentor. She enjoys working with us babies, and he is watching her as well as us.

Timothy and Mattie go from table to table, giving each the same instructions. In a bit, a bell rings and we start. This is fun, and I laugh as the other one-year-olds and I do this simple task. We create a small tower of blocks as instructed.

"Good, very good," Mattie praises us. I like her; she is warm and caring and tries to praise us whenever we do well. The other toddlers and I grin at each other. As we look around the room, we see that the other toddlers are finishing up, too.

"You all did really well," Timothy says. "You can have lunch now."

Lunch is brought in, and we enjoy the soft fruit, vegetables and liver. The food is always, always very healthy and tasty, and because we are so physically active, all of us are hungry. The food doesn't last long.

There are other small group activities given over the next few months: figuring out how to share four apples among twelve of us, or how to climb a wall that is too high to simply put a leg over. As we do these things, and learn to work as a team, the fathers praise us, and give us extra "free time" to simply play with each other. Free time is a precious commodity in this highly structured environment, and we all decide to perform well to gain as much free time as possible, in order to simply be toddlers.

This pattern will continue throughout my life. When my class did well, or I am part of a mission team that does well, we can sometimes choose our reward, and we choose time off. The programmers and facility heads knew that we valued most of all the times when we could simply be human beings without expectations of performance. They allowed for this, but it had to be earned.

Because of genetic engineering for intelligence, all the babies in the nursery had high IQs, and we all achieved behavioral milestones very early. Most of us were toddling by six to seven months of age on plump but muscular baby legs, and we were starting to talk as well, in high-pitched baby voices. We understand what those around us are saying, although we are still unable to follow complex, abstract discussions, and can only respond in simple phrases.

During the early years, we are assessed and sorted according to leadership gifts, intelligence, strength and creativity, as well as other qualities, into groups of similar abilities. These sortings are held loosely during the first three years of life, with ongoing testing and assessments throughout life. The activities described here function not only to teach the children skills, but also enable the fathers to assess the children. But by age six, we will be sorted into classes of 12 of similar abilities for further training and education at the specialized 'school' run by the Order. As children, we attend this school from six until twelve years old. I recall my cohort as having four classes of 12 children.

I am four months old. Like the other infants in the nursery, I am sleeping soundly. It is the middle of the night, and we have had a busy day learning new tasks and doing all the things that little babies growing up in a programming facility do. It is quiet, the lights are down, and the darkened room is silent except for the occasional rustle of a baby moving a bit on soft sheets.

Suddenly, something wakes me up. I look around and see a figure walking through the nursery. This figure looks like one of the immortals, but something about it is very different. The robes are soft, almost transparent, and shine with a soft light. This being has golden hair and a kind face. I watch as it stops by a crib and places its hand on a baby's head. The baby wakes up and smiles at the being.

As it walks nearer to my crib, I see white wings folded behind him. I feel that this is a male being, without being sure why. As it gets closer and closer, placing his hand softly on each baby's head, the babies smile. Some sit up and lean towards him, reaching after him as he goes to another crib. Finally, he comes to my crib. I smile at him, and his golden eyes look at me with tenderness and love. He places his hand on my head, as if in benediction, and suddenly I feel something I have never felt before. I feel peace, utter peace, and safety. I want this feeling to go on forever. This being does not smell like the other immortals who visit, but instead, seems to bring the smell of a beautiful breeze from somewhere else that floats around him. This smell is wonderful, and I want him to stay with me. But the being keeps going until the babies in the nursery have all had a hand placed on them. Then, the being silently, quietly disappears.

After the being is gone, several fathers come into the lab. Father Mattheo comes to my crib. "You should not have let that malak – that messenger from the enemy – touch you," he says. His voice is angry, I have no idea what I did wrong. Don't beings come at night all the time? Why shouldn't I let him touch me? Don't all the immortals touch me? I think all of these things, but cannot speak them yet. "That was one of the liar's messengers; that was not an immortal," Mattheo says. He must have seen the being come into the nursery. But it is not until I am much older that I learn that he and the other fathers could not stop it. They had to wait until it left.

I feel bewildered. This being was kind, and the peace and love I felt coming from its touch was even better than the words and cake that the "immortals" were bringing me at night. How could a being this nice be an "enemy"?

The next morning, Father Mattheo shows me a depiction of an angel, and shocks me over and over as he shows it to me, telling me, "These are the enemy. Send them away if they come to you." I understand that he wants me to hate this gentle visitor in the night and start to associate him with the shocks. The shocks are my enemy, but my baby brain thinks they are caused by the picture of the angel that I am being shown.

I am 18 months old, and my hand is being held by an adult dressed in a costume to represent Gnossis, the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil. She has a crown of leafy branches on her head, and her arms have numerous leafy branches that appear to sprout out of them; even her fingers look like small twigs. Her middle is covered by rough looking "bark", and her feet are covered with what appeared to be several layers of roots. Her voice is calm, patient, and melodious as she takes me by the hand, and leads me down a pathway that is outlined with wide, white brick pavers.

"You must always, always stay on the path, and never depart," she instructs me. "Only by staying on the path of righteousness and knowledge can you ascend and reach the celestial heights. Otherwise, you will descend into mortality and suffer the torments of the wicked – those who choose the flesh over immortality." As she leads me, the pavers under our feet light up with a soft, diffuse glow; it seems wonderful and magical to me as a toddler. "If you follow the path, your way will be lighted with increasing knowledge," she assures me. When we come to the end of this part of the path, it divides, and we go to the right. We then rest on a small bench, and she gives me a sweet treat as a reward for being such a good child and following the path with her so well.

These walks along the path continue at intervals over the next few months. I learn exactly where to go and am warned where not to go each time by one of the three trees who lead me along this path: Althea, the tree of life; Gnossis, the tree of knowledge (of good and evil); and the Servant tree. These paths actually represent following my internal programming, which I have been told is the path to immortality. But at this young age, my main concern right now is to always stay on the path. I have been told that dreadful things will happen if I fail to, and I don't want these sweet, caring trees to become angry with me.

After another month, when I am almost two years old, Althea starts me on the path, and then smiling, she says, "You know the way, child. Remember to always stay on it, and all will be well." She then leaves me, and I start to follow the path. But along the way, I see to the side of the path some chocolate treats on a table, just a few feet off of the path. I start to go past, but then pause, and look longingly at the treat. I love chocolates, and want one very much. I think Maybe no one will know if I go off for just a few seconds, grab a treat, then go back on the path.

I step off of the path, and suddenly the room grows dark, a cold wind blows, and I feel terrible, hot, sharp electric shocks beneath my feet that cause me to cry out in pain. I hear shrieks and screams, and demonic looking figures lurking in the now completely darkened room start coming towards me; I can hear their snarls and hisses, and back away.

I can't find the path! It is hidden in this dark place, and I am terrified. I scream aloud, asking Althea to help, and suddenly I see a soft glow in the distance that comes closer. It is Althea, and she looks very sad and concerned.

"Why did you go off the path, child?" she asks with great sorrow. Her beautiful crystal clear blue eyes are filled with tears.

Terrified, I look at her, then stutter, "I…I…I w-w-wanted chocolate…" Tears are streaming down my face, and I feel deeply ashamed and guilty about my disobedience.

She sighs. "You let your mortal flesh, your mortal desires take over, instead of staying on the path," she says sternly. "Don't you realize that I warned you to stay on for your own good? Staying on the path is the only path to safety."

I realize that she is right, because even taking a small step off the path brought disaster in the form of extreme pain and terror.

"Will you stay on the path, and not go off again?" she asks.

"Y-y-yes," I say, having no desire to experience the terrors and pain of mortality and descending again. It hurt, badly. Althea then smiles, and her clear blue eyes light up with joy.

"Good." She stoops down to eye level, looks me in the eyes, and says, "I trust you to desire immortality more than to gratify your flesh." She then leaves me on a portion of the path near where I started out. I walk along the path for a time, and suddenly see candies in a bowl on the side of the path, just out of reach. But this time, I do not step off the path, a path which represents my staying within the prescribed programming for my system, of which I am a controller. Instead, this time, I ignore the candy and continue on, until I am greeted by a delighted Althea who praises me warmly.

"You are learning not to give in to the flesh, and to desire immortality," she says in loving tones. "You are doing well, indeed." She then takes me into her arms (I am still quite small) and ascends the celestial stairway – a golden stairway that goes up and up towards the ceiling, taking me to the celestial realms – another part of the programming lab up above that has fluffy clouds to walk on and beautiful, sparkly stars all around on the walls. Together, Althea and I enjoy a wonderful treat of cream cake. The other celestials there praise me and tell me how glad they are that I am learning to overcome my mortal flesh.

While I was too young at the time to fully understand why I had to stay on the path, I came to understand over time that the path was my programming, and that stepping off of it, even a little bit, would bring pain and terror. During these initial early years of programming, the costumed adults and children who represent celestial beings such as the trees are loving, kind and instill the belief that these beings – who are also internalized, or become part of my internal mental landscape, as important controllers – want only what is best for the child and their systems.

This makes the very young child want to obey them, want to make them happy, which is a much stronger underpinning for obedience than simply terror. Even as an adult, the young system parts and controllers will still want to obey their internal primary controllers, believing that they want what is best and safest for their survival. This makes the programming even more difficult to break later in life, than if a simple desire to avoid punishment was used. An analogy that can be used – although imperfect – is the difference between a child who is abused and maltreated growing up, without any display of love to the child, and a child who has experiences of being deeply loved and attached to a parent who often sorrowfully takes off a belt and thrashes them until they are covered with black and blue stripes from neck to ankle, saying "This is for your own good." Both children have experienced severe abuse, but the latter child, who believes the parent genuinely cares for them, may find it more difficult to define their treatment as "abuse" and will be more likely to internalize their parent's beliefs.

There was only one time when the constant demand to perform was relaxed.

I am about seven months old. I have stopped eating and I am beginning to lose weight. I turn my head away, even with threats from the trainers. I simply don't care, even if they kill me.

I am feeling utter, complete despair. Somewhere in the depths of my developing mind is a dawning understanding that my life is one of frequent abuse, paired with the demand to perform, and then perform still harder, and do things repugnant to me even as a baby. I have no control, and this is to be my life, and this knowledge overwhelms me. I want choice, I desperately want a choice, and it is not allowed. So, I make the only choice that I can make. I choose to die and fail to thrive.

In later years, as a trainer myself, I saw this phenomenon many times in infants. In fact, it was expected at some point in infants who are pushed to the limit of their emotional, physical and spiritual endurance. Most survived, but some did end up dying. The threat of death is real.

As soon as the symptoms occur, a change is made in my routine. The programming stops. Mattheo, Jerome and Carlotti come, and hold me and rock me in the rocking chair near my crib. "I love you," Mattheo whispers. "Don't die, little one; I would feel so sad." He believes what he is telling me, and I feel his words. But I still cannot eat. The despair is too deep.

Jerome and Carlotti also come and hold me and talk to me. My twin siblings – I am part of a triplet set, which is what the Jesuits raise instead of twins- Daniel (Danny) and Elizabeth (Lizzy), who I love and am bonded to, are placed in my crib with me. This is unheard of, but the fathers are desperate. I am losing more weight and have pale skin and dull eyes. Danny coos to me, and holds a small bottle out to me, trying to get me to eat a little and to play with him. I smile, just a little, at this brother who I love so much. His love reaches me, and very hesitantly, I pick up the bottle and take a tiny sip. Lizzie, my other twin, looks at my face and pats it with her little baby hands. She tries to make me smile by blowing loud raspberries at me. I smile weakly at her.

Soon, one of the female fathers comes over to my crib, picks me up, and nurses me in the rocking chair nearby. She is my "birth mother," not the real one, of course, but the one my parts have bonded to after the death of the real one. She whispers to me, "I love you, I love you," over and over, her light brown hair falling softly forward as she looks me in the eyes with her grey eyes filled with tenderness. I nurse a bit and fall asleep. I am exhausted with the exhaustion of deep depression, even at this young age. But the rocking is soothing, and for this time, being treated almost like a real baby, and less like a circus performer, something in me unwinds a bit. Maybe there are good things in life, too.

The next day, two of the fathers walk by. I hear them discussing Danny, Lizzie and me. "If she doesn't make the decision to live, we will have to put the other two to death, too," I hear them say. I am horrified. Even if I don't want to live, I want my little brother and sister to live. Danny and Lizzie, sitting in the crib next to me, are looking at me with big, sad brown eyes. I realize that they, too, have overheard the fathers discussing us. A small tear falls down Dannie's cheek; he wants to live, I can feel it as strongly as if he has spoken to me. His brown curls tremble slightly as he leans over and gives me a little kiss on my cheek.

I take the bottle that is lying in my crib, and start drinking from it. I have decided to live, to save my little brother and sister, whose lives I now realize depend on mine. As I drink the formula, Dannie and Lizzie smile with baby joy, and Lizzie claps her little hands with a soft "pat, pat" noise.

It is not until years later that I realize that this conversation by the fathers was meant to be overheard; it was no accident. They wanted me to believe that my siblings would die if I died, to motivate me. But as an infant, I had no way of realizing that they were using my love for others against me.

I survive, I start gaining back the weight that I had lost. After a few more days of rest, I am put back into the daily routine, but am carefully monitored for any further signs of failing to thrive.

And the bonding continues with the fathers, these fathers who caused me to want to die with their abuse, their torture, their demands. Each day, usually at the end of the day, Mattheo comes in to spend special time with me, for 15 to 30 minutes each day. He holds me and talks to me with loving words. "You are such a beautiful daughter," he tells me as he rocks and comforts me. "I love you," he says as he holds me close to his warm chest, treating me the way a father would treat their beloved baby. "I'm so proud of you; you are wonderful," he says at the end of a long, hard day of learning and performing.

I look forward to this special time with great eagerness. This is what makes all the hard work, the terrible abuse, the punishments and rewards, all worth it: to earn the love of this human being that I adore so much. I will do anything for him, even live.

Infants in the Jesuit nurseries are allowed to bond deeply with both the fathers, and their genetic triplets; these babies are allowed extra time together in simple play. But the fathers are masters at manipulating these love bonds in order to gain the behaviors they want. When I first had this memory, I felt enraged. Enraged that my very ability to love others, to care, was used so callously against me. Enraged that even the choice to die and escape as a baby was wrested away from me, due to my inability to allow my siblings to die. This desire to rescue others will be used again and again throughout the rest of my life to control me, and it is a heavy weight to bear indeed, until I learn that no human being can truly "rescue" another; that there is only one who can rescue without manipulation or demands, and that is Jesus.

I am only a few weeks old, and I am lying in my crib. Suddenly, two beautiful women in soft, glowing silvery dresses and two men in glowing robes of the same color come and stand by my bed. I am enthralled at these beautiful people who walk softly and talk with melodious voices. They lean over my crib and speak.

"Child, we are the immortals," they say in unison. Their voices are sweet and musical, and sound like those of angels. "Because you are blessed, we have chosen to visit you. You are fortunate indeed." I grin a toothless baby grin and wiggle my arms and legs happily. These people seem nice, and they seem to like me.

"My name is Calexa" says the woman with beautiful silvery hair, as she picks me up and holds me tenderly. She holds me upright so that I can clearly see the other woman, whose soft golden brown hair seems to be waving about her face in the nearly darkened room.

"My name is Althea, and I bring wisdom to those who seek me," the brown-haired woman says. On her dress is a golden rune, a picture of a tree. She continues, "You will grow to love me, as I already love you, chosen one."

Then a man with golden hair and beautiful blue eyes approaches me next. "I am Paltheus, and will teach you how to do difficult things; but you will grow strong and beautiful as a result. I want you to be strong, and to one day join us where we live." He takes me from Calexa and cuddles me gently in his strong arms. I feel warm and secure against his chest, as I smell his wonderful smell; he smells like roses and lavender and sweet things. These immortals are wonderful people.

Baltheus is the next "immortal" to talk to me. He has silver-white hair and grey eyes that look suspiciously like those of Mattheo, my primary trainer. "If you learn to love me as I love you and do all that I and my mortal representatives tell you to do, then I will give you the gift of seeing what is to come in the future, and to look into and see what is in men's hearts." I am still too young to fully understand all of this, but I recognize his kind tone and the loving way he holds and rocks me. I am filled with joy at the attention they are giving me.

Several times a week, they and other fathers dressed as "immortals" visit me in the nursery. During each visit, they teach me about who they are, and what abilities they can give me. This is an important part of my spiritual training. I also see them visit the other babies in the nursery and tell them the same or similar things. I feel I must be a lucky baby indeed to be visited by such loving, beautiful people – or "immortals", the "divine" as I am learning to call them. My only confusion is that they feel and smell like real people to me, in spite of their words; they actually smell like some of the fathers I know. I wonder why, but go back to sleep, dreaming about being held and loved by these people in silvery soft robes.

The Jesuit fathers use very concrete setups to teach infants and young children their spiritual beliefs, which include ascending towards immortality, or else descending towards mortality (and pain). An infant and young child will willingly believe what they are taught at this age, especially if their lessons are conveyed through concrete experiences like the 'role-playing' and 'acting' by the fathers and older children in costumes, as depicted in this account.

Celestial Heaven

A few weeks later, I and the other babies in my nursery are awakened in the middle of the night by the soft tread of the "immortals" who walk into our room on silver slippers. I am picked up and carried by an "immortal", Charydon, a man with beautiful long white hair and green eyes, He says, "I am going to take you to a very special place – the place where I live. I want you to see what the celestial realms look like. This is where you can one day live if you are very, very good." I already know that "good" means being obedient and doing all that the programmers tell me; the "immortals" have already been telling me that my programmers are the "mortal representatives" of the "immortals" and that obeying them is the same as obeying an "immortal".

Charydon carries me in his strong, muscular arms and walks up a beautiful golden spiral staircase that is strung with glittering stars and what looks like planets along the darkened areas beside it. Up, up we go, until finally, he is walking on what looks like soft, puffy white clouds with glitter and rainbow lights everywhere. It is beautiful, and I hear lovely singing from far away, by voices that sound like angels. It is not until I am much older that I will learn that these voices are actually older children singing, with their voices piped in. As a little baby, I have no idea that as I get older, when I am eleven or twelve years old, I will also be singing songs of the 'celestial realm' for new groups of babies.

I look everywhere about me. Charydon holds me carefully upright in his arms so that I can see as much as possible. I see beautiful, ethereal figures with wings flitting by in the background. The smell is wonderful, like flowers and perfume and rose candy all at once.

"Little one, would you like to try some celestial food?" Charydon asks in a loving, gentle voice. I look at him wonderingly, and he places a bit of a very soft, sweet substance on my tongue; it tastes like whipped cream and fruit together, and the taste is wonderful. "This is the food of the gods," he explains, "and those who ascend and overcome their mortality are able to come here and enjoy it." I think it is wonderful, that this whole place is absolutely wonderful. I want to be able to come here and eat things like this, so I decide to ascend as soon as possible.

After a while, Charydon's voice becomes tinged with sorrow. "We must now descend back to the mortal realms," he explains, with a pathos that makes me realize that he, too, hates to leave this wonderful place. He looks into my eyes and smiles, and says, "But if you are very good, and I know you will be, we will come back here soon." I smile back, and he gently carries me back down the golden stairs, down past the stars, as we descend. Finally, we are at the bottom, and he carries me back into the nursery and gently lays me in my crib.

I am so excited from this experience that it takes me a while to settle back into sleep. But the fathers and Mengele start training the next day several hours later than normal. It is as if they, too, understand how important it is to spend time with the immortals, and are willing to change the daily routine to allow for this.

I remember that Charydon, Althea and the other immortals told me that my trainers were their mortal representatives, and how important it is to always obey them if I want to "ascend" and visit the celestial realms again. I am very obedient for the next few days, and as promised, another immortal, Baltheus, comes and visits me a few nights later. He also helps me to "ascend" the beautiful staircase to visit the celestial realms. They are teaching me that I need the help of an immortal to visit this spiritual place as they must carry me there. This lays the foundation, for me to later in life allow the demonic to 'carry me' or 'help me to ascend' into the 'celestial realms'.

These visits occur regularly during my first two years of life. As a toddler, I toddle around the clouds, which feel like soft puffs of cotton beneath my slippered feet. I am given wonderful cake to eat and learn from these beautiful beings many of the rules of the immortals and how to enter these realms. I am being inculcated in the belief system that underlies all of the programming, all of the rituals, all of the hard work being done by the Order: the desire to allow the immortals to visit earth, and to ascend in order to be with them in the celestial realms.

I am much too young to recognize that these immortals are adults dressed in costumes or that the stairway is part of a programming lab. Nor am I yet able to recognize that the celestial realms are a programming studio with special props. I will only learn this years later. By that time, however, I believe utterly in the celestials. I have also by that time become completely indoctrinated with my mentors' teaching that the celestial programming studio is a necessary teaching tool for babies too young to grasp the spiritual realities of the immortals and am blind to the fact that it is nothing but trickery to manipulate the babies into obedience to satanic agendas.

Again, this is an example of the extremely elaborate setups that are used to indoctrinate the very young infants with a belief in the immortals – this belief that underpins the Jesuit Order in its occult side. Readers may wonder how on earth setups this elaborate are possible. But the Jesuits have lots of money that comes from their human trafficking and intelligence work as well as other dark operations. With billions of dollars at their disposal, and state-of-the-art technology that is many years ahead of current technologies, they have had no trouble constructing advanced programming facilities. They have facilities in numerous countries with the largest and best-funded ones being in Italy.

The older children and adults enjoy dressing up in costumes, and everyone loves the celestial scenes, hoping to be chosen to take the young babies and toddlers up the golden studio stairs, and watch their delight in the beauty and sweet treats. While the fathers, due to their own dissociation, mind control, and erroneous beliefs, feel that these young children must be abused during programming, the truth is that everyone feels a sense of relief when they are scheduled to participate in a happy training setup such as described above. The fathers view the abusive programming as a "necessary thing" but still dislike it, in spite of a lifetime of training to normalize it.

Typically, immediately after the older children or adults put costumes on for particular setups, other programmers who are overseeing that particular setup will first call up the appropriate parts in those individuals. For instance, in the setup described here where they will play 'immortals', 'angels' and other roles, parts who have been programmed to be 'immortals' and so on will be the ones called up. This means that when the adults and children participate in these indoctrination scenarios through these parts, they are not aware that they are 'acting' out roles in a studio but are personally convinced that they are taking a baby to the celestial realms, or that they are angels singing in the realms. Their utter conviction is part of what causes the scenarios to feel absolutely authentic to the babies. Besides helping to program the babies, using the programmed parts of other cult members serves to reinforce that programming of these cult members themselves, as their internal parts are called out to present, and act out their roles in those programming studios under the programmers' supervision.

It is a few weeks after Althea and the other immortals last visited me. I am awakened in the middle of the night by a dark and malevolent being. Years later, I will learn that this is an older child dressed in a costume, but in the darkened nursery, this creature looks and sounds terrifying, with long, dark claws, long sharp fangs, red glowing eyes, and a twisted, dark shape.

"You were bad today, and you are coming with me," it croaks in a demonic voice, with sibilant hissing. Now, I am really scared. I wonder what I could have possibly done that got the attention of this…thing… Obviously, I must have broken some unwritten, not understood rule. The creature picks me up roughly, its claws biting into my tiny arm as it does so. It carries me out of the nursery. I am struggling hard to free myself from its grasp, but to no avail. This creature takes me into a room with a large, black, cavernous hole in the middle. There are steps going down into the dark, scary looking steps. I struggle even harder, but I am held in its iron grip.

"We are going to descend," the creature croaks, and it carries me down, down, down into a place where the air smells smoky, and there are red flames flickering on the walls. I see black poles that fill this room. Men and women are tied to them by chains. "Demons" (as usual, the older cult children dressed in costumes) are whipping them with long whips with bits of bone attached. The men and women are screaming in tortured pain.

"Because you were disobedient, you will join the other mortals who chose to give in to their flesh, and to descend. They caused themselves to come here because they did not listen to the wise counsel of the immortals," the demonic actor hisses in my ear.

I begin crying, but the dark creature doesn't care. He ties me to a pole that has a small stand to hold me, almost like an infant seat, since I am too young to stand yet. The small chain bites into my little arms and chest. The creature then takes out a small whip and lashes my tiny arms and legs. While there is no real injury, the lashes sting sharply and add to my terror. I am now screaming at the top of my lungs.

Suddenly, Father Mattheo appears, dressed in the silvery robes of an immortal. "Do you promise to always obey me, and to try to never give in to your mortal desires again; to try and listen to the wisdom of the immortals?" he asks.

I look at him with huge eyes, and raise my right fist, the sign language I have learned for "yes", since I have forgotten in my terror how to speak.

Father Mattheo then turns to the "demon" and says, "Let her loose, I will vouch for her."

The twisted, grimacing, dark creature reluctantly looses the tiny jangly chains that hold me in place, and Mattheo picks me up and soothes me, in spite of the fact that I have had a loose bowel movement due to stress.

"Let's go and ascend back up, out of here," he says. "I can help you ascend." We walk up, up, up, out of this terrible place, to my great relief. His strong arms hold me securely, and I am so glad that he came to rescue me. Mattheo then cleans and changes me and spends time rocking me until I have calmed down. This takes quite a while.

"This is why we ask you to do difficult and painful things at times; we are teaching you how to overcome your mortal flesh and its desires, so that you will not descend and remain forever in hell," he tells me. I am so traumatized, and so relieved that he rescued me, that I absorb and believe everything he is telling me without question. I have been rescued from hell by a father that loves me enough to go down into that terrible place after me, and I think that there can be no greater love. I love Mattheo at that moment with everything within me.

A female father, Joanna, one of the 12 fathers that I am bonded to and love deeply, then comes, and nurses me at the breast for a while, rocking me and singing to me softly. Hours later, I finally fall asleep. I decide to always, always do what the immortals say, and to never, ever give in to my mortal desires again.

This has been my introduction to "hell", one of the many horrible programming studios constructed by the Order to terrify their children into obedience. Many years later that I will learn that there are three stages located on three floors. Each level can be entered through winding stairs that go down into each level. Hell levels "one", "two" and "three" can be changed with a change of scenery, lighting, and children and/or adults dressed into costumes who either act as 'demons' or as 'tortured mortals', with appropriate props (including fake blood and gore), into hell levels "four", "five" and "six." The final and deepest level, utter darkness, reserved for the worst "sinners" who are completely "descended" is accomplished through time spent in an isolation tank or a negative sound room. There are usually about six or seven people being "tortured" at each level in this fake hell, but these rooms have mirrors that multiply the images until the scene appears to be filled with hundreds of writhing, tormented figures and flames, or screens that will playback such scenes.

But as an infant, and later as a toddler, I do not know these things. I fully believe that I have gone to hell. I have screaming nightmares at intervals about this place for years, until my systems learned to suppress them fully. But deep inside, I fear hell more than anything else. Every part inside of me fears this terrible place, the place where the worst possible punishments occur – or so I think, until there is a new, more terrible setup.

I am now a very young child, about age two years and two months. During the day, I disobeyed a direct command given to me by the father I love most, Mattheo. He has asked me to perform an act of sexual abuse on another child, and I can't. By this age, it is very, very rare that I say "no". Somehow, I identified too much with the child, who is close to my own age and who even looks like me, with curly brown hair and sad brown eyes. Mattheo is quietly angry, but he then goes on to abuse the child himself. Then, in order to punish me, he kills the child. I am heartbroken, but also feel glad that at least now, this child can no longer feel any pain or torment; she, at least, is set "free".

I later verbalize this feeling to Father Carlotti. "I know that she hurt, but now she will never hurt again," I say, using childish logic. "Nothing can hurt her anymore," I tell him. The fathers will view this a dangerous line of thinking, as rather than feeling remorseful and guilty about my disobedience, I am feeling that the child who died was "lucky". I am too young to realize that such thinking is unacceptable to the order, however.

In the middle of the night that follows this conversation, I am awakened by a "demon" who is older and larger than many that have visited me before. The "demon" takes me by the arm, yanking me roughly out of bed with claws that bite into my flesh until it bleeds. It hurries me down the black, winding staircase that descends into "hell". There are many adults and children tied to poles, and to my horror, right in front of me, in the center, is Father Mattheo. He is tied with rattling chains to a large pole of black stone. He is being lashed with a large flagellum, a whip that has bits of sharp rock and metal attached, and is screaming in pain.

"Satan" (another adult in costume) comes up to me and says, "You were supposed to take this punishment for disobedience, but Mattheo offered to take it instead. He is taking the punishment for your disobedience."

Horrified, I scream and weep as I see the blood pouring from Mattheo's wounds and the flagellum cuts deeper and deeper into him. I am terrified that he will die, this person who means so much to me, this person without whose love I don't believe I can survive.

"I'm sorry, I'm sorry," I scream.

Satan then turns to me, and says, "Do you vow to never disobey my mortal representative again?"

I stutter in my terror as I reply, "Y-y-yes."

Satan says, "Then take this spirit of obedience inside; it will punish you if you even think of disobeying." I do a short ritual, accept the spirit, bow low, and then "Satan" releases Mattheo from the pole with a golden knife. Mattheo is weak and shaky, but stumbles with me up the stairs, looking pale as we enter the room above.

"I knew the punishment for your disobedience today would kill you, and I love you too much to lose you. I am older and stronger and offered to take it instead," he says. "You must learn that the actions of each of us affect those around us. The obedience or disobedience of one affects many others." He holds me as I cry for a long time, and then says, "I know you won't disobey me again; I know you love me too much."

This is the communal thinking of the Jesuit order. It is based upon loving one another and the terrible manipulation of attachment, and I am being indoctrinated into it in a very concrete way. I am learning that my rebellious thoughts, my saying "no", will cause pain to the people I love most, and it causes deep emotional pain. I am caught in a terrible place. I cannot choose what I truly want which is not obey commands to hurt others, because it will cause even more pain to the people I am attached to, and the child or person I try to save will just end up dying anyway. The cost of doing what I really want – to not hurt another child – could cause someone I love to be flogged to death. I fall asleep crying, wondering why the world is such as terrible place.

It is not until I am older, and learning to program other children, that I learn that the fathers take pain medication ahead of time during these setups and wear special rubber layers over their skin that releases 'blood' as they are being 'whipped'. Much of the screaming is acting, because the fathers are very, very good actors. As an older child, I am taught that these setups are a necessary thing to teach infants and young children about the real spiritual realities that they are too young to grasp yet. I accept this since I have already learned, even as a child, to never question my own programming.

When I remembered how the setups are done, and how the fathers I was bonded to manipulated me in this way, I was furious. I could not understand how one human being could do this to another. But then, I realized: they were afraid. If there is one thread that tied us all together, it was the deep, deep, terrifying fear that underlaid everything we did, the fear that sabotaged our real desire to love each other. We were all terribly, terribly afraid of these "immortals" who while appearing kind and loving, could also unleash terrible beings. The "immortals" are beings that the fathers believe control the universe and who oversee creation, and they worship them and give them unquestioning obedience. We were all slaves to our fear of these beings, and thus we could not act the way we truly wanted to. It would take finding a source of protection from this terror, much, much later in life, to break free of this slavery.

I am two years old. The part of me who is out is a master controller named Galatea who is over the presentation systems. My hair has been dyed a beautiful silvery color, and I am wearing a black robe that has beautiful sparkly stars splashed over it. These little stars twinkle and glow as I walk. I love being the beautiful Galatea, one of the immortals who has been meeting with me since I was a tiny baby in my crib. I even speak with her soft, musical voice and inflection.

Pleiades is in the room with me. He is another master controller. Polaris, the third controller, sits on the other side. Satan, an adult in costume, is also there. He has more authority than even the master controllers in this setup.

In the room beneath the platform that the master controllers are sitting on, are other children my age dressed in costumes to represent various system controllers who will be working under me: Athena, Andromeda, and Saturn. Their sitting beneath the master controllers shows that they are lower in status – and thus obedient to – the master controllers who are sitting on an elevated platform. The children turn and look at me as Galatea, and at Satan.

Satan gives me the order. I must always, always immediately obey him, immediately and unfailingly. "Take Andromeda, place her on her controller platform, and then have her give Athena the golden key. Athena will then leave the room, and in five minutes, will return with one of the presentation children".

I hurry to obey him. As a master controller, my obedience must be as quick as thought, or so I have been trained. I run to Andromeda, put her on her controller platform, and then tell Andromeda to give Athena the golden key and have her bring a child representing one of the presenters back into the room, going through a door marked with a special golden rune that means 'Wonderland'.

Andromeda stands, waiting. Athena goes to her, receives a golden key, and then goes through the door. We wait. And wait. Finally, she comes back through the special door with a child that resembles me. This child represents a presenter.

Satan then tells me, "Have Athena lock the child into her French shell." The shell is a clear plastic shell that will fit over the whole child. The child will be able to breathe due to special air holes.

The child is put into the shell, locked in, but then the trouble starts. The child starts screaming, saying that she wants out; that she doesn't want to be in the shell. Worse, she is not following her profile; the child is supposed to be speaking only French, but she is screaming in four different languages.

I hear a loud noise, and the child is knocked unconscious. But worse follows. The room that we, the immortal star systems are located in, turns black. The whole floor beneath us begins tilting, moving and spinning, as stars in the ceiling above begin falling, at times hitting me and the others in the room with sharp, biting pain. "The destruction of the universe has begun," Satan's voice thunders. "Andromeda, Athena, you both failed and allowed the presenter to fail, and now the universe will fall into chaos. You have become the bringers of chaos into the universe."

Pleiades, Polaris and others are screaming behind me. These are fathers I love, and I am causing them and everything and everyone I have ever loved to be destroyed, because of my failure. As a master controller, I must never, ever fail, and those who I oversee must never, ever fail, either. And I did. I failed to control the presenter.

I cower, screaming, as this terrible scene continues. I am overwhelmed with terror. Finally, Satan intervenes. "Do you swear that you will never allow failure in those beneath you?" he asks. "That as my representative to these mortals inside, that you will ensure that there will never be failure?" The shaking, tilting and spinning have slowed down while he talks, but the room is still dark.

"Receive this spirit to help you," he then says. I look up, and a dark presence is standing next to him. I don't like it, but I don't want the universe to fail, so I nod "yes." It seems to melt into my body, and I feel terrible.

"I will give you another chance," Satan says. Instantly, the room completely stops shaking, tilting and spinning, and the lights come back on. I still feel shaken and disoriented by it all. I look, and Athena, played by my twin sister, also looks dazed and white-faced. The little girl in the shell is unconscious, and we have to pull her out after Athena unlocks the shell.

When the little girl comes back to consciousness, I tell her, "You must never, ever scream when you are put in the shell. It isn't forever; but if you scream or fight, worse happens than being in that shell."

The little girl nods her understanding. We redo the scene, and the little girl does not scream or fight this time. We all have just learned how very, very important it is to do our roles perfectly. The fate of the universe depends on it.

As the above memory shows, not only the master presentation controller Galatea, but also the sub-controller Athena, and the presenter part beneath all of them, are all being taught the 'terrible consequences of disobedience' through the use of sophisticated programming studios that convincingly create terrible scenarios of devastation, disaster and pain. The Order uses many, many setups like these to instill complete obedience in all levels of a system. There will be other setups like this, until all of the controllers learn to do their jobs, including instantly punishing parts brutally for disobeying programming. These internal punishments that systems use to perpetuate programming long after the original programming sessions are usually memories, threats of, or internal reenactments of these terrifying traumas to keep parts in line. The capacity of parts to stop running such programs, i.e., stop obeying the original programming directives, can be greatly improved when parts realize that the 'disasters' were not natural consequences but staged trickery with no basis at all in any reality outside a programming studio, and that obedience only serves to benefit the cult without really protecting the child or his/her parts.

I am a year old, and a part inside that has been created through intense, agonizing pain has been called forward. This part, called "Mortal Flesh" is greeted by adults dressed in dark brown robes, the Council of the Flesh. "Flesh" is always associated with terrible pain, since it represents my mortal wants and desires, the things that keep me from ascending, according to the theology that I have been taught by the fathers.

The council head greets me, saying, “Welcome, mortal child. You are here to learn more about why it is important to overcome the flesh.” I tremble a bit, because I do not like pain, but am able to cover my response and look expectantly at the figures.

I have given the correct responses and they nod with satisfaction. Then Lovent, the council head, comes near me. This dark-clad figure takes my arm with one hand. In the other is a small candle. He speaks an incantation, and it lights with a flickering flame. He holds the candle flame to my arm for a period of time. I am in intense pain, sweating with the agony, but I do not pull away. Finally, with a deep burn on my arm, Lovent grunts his satisfaction with my desire to “overcome the flesh”. If I had pulled away, or screamed, I know that I would have been subjected to something even more painful. Terrible pain has been part of my life intermittently since I was in the womb, and my obedience to this council represents my deep-felt, instinctive desire to not experience even more pain.

I have been taught that the Council of the Flesh wants my best good and is teaching me to overcome my flesh so that I can ascend and join others who live in the celestial realms. Their greatest desire, they assure me, is to help me to avoid mortal hell, the fate for those who descend due to unbelief, doubt, and disobedience. By now, I have visited all seven levels of “hell” at the programming studio and agree heartily with them that this place is to be avoided at all costs. The Council of the Flesh has an eager, believing pupil for their theology.

I have already internalized this council, along with other councils such as the 12 members of the Mage Council, the Council of the Immortals, and the secret Vatican Council (which is not the public Vatican Council) inside. All leadership councils have 12 members, the number of governance, with it understood that Satan is the 13th member.

The Council of the Flesh by now has been internalized within me as well, and can cause intense pain in my body, and punish inside parts who seem to be following “fleshly desires” (e.g., not following their programming directives) instead of seeking immortality. If I seek eternity, and obey my programming, a member of the Council of the Immortals will call out one of my immortals inside and will take me up the golden stairway to the celestial realms as a reward.

At a year old, the celestial realms setup is more elaborate than when I was just a few weeks old. There are mists that glow everywhere, created by dry ice, and even a display of what looks like an aurora borealis above in the sky. The rich, fruity cream cake I am allowed to eat there makes me want to work hard to achieve permanent immortality, which I am assured I will be able to do one day.

I have a full operant conditioning system, reward and punishment, deeply installed by this age of one year old. The celestial realms are the “reward”, and “hell” is the punishment system, for obedience and disobedience, respectively. If I disobey a command, I not only fear the anger of my programmer, I now fear descending for all of eternity into hell.

By this age, I have also internalized within my mind the hierarchy of councils that I have interacted with and been programmed by for the past year. These councils inside are the high controllers in my systems. They can mete out both punishment and reward internally, even in the absence of the external setups. This has been the real goal of these setups: to teach me to internalize the beliefs and behaviors and responses that the programmers have patiently been training me in over my time in the womb and the first year of my life. That is, they have made me a collaborator to and a perpetuator of my own abuse and control.

My birth name is Lucient, but my daily name is Lucia. I am usually called Luce. This is the name of my 'cult host', or the part that presents during my cult life in the facility. As my cult life was the majority of my life until my escape in 2007, with only limited time in the presentations in different countries, Luce is the part of me who feels most like the 'real me'.

Mengele and Hilde work with me still, although my main influence are the fathers I love. Mengele and Hilde praise me for doing well and acting "intelligently" in different situations, but as Luce, I looked forward each day to the time I get to spend with the fathers I love.

For the first three years of life, life was regimented according to a strict routine. Early morning assessments are done quickly, with the fathers checking at regular intervals if prior programs installed are still intact. In between, there is holding and cuddling; these times too is scheduled. Later in the day, I learn the new day's task(s). There is always, always something new to be learned or practice designed to build further on old skills previously learned.

I felt like a miniature performer as the tasks continued day after day: learn to swim (and see how long I could endure in the water in one early test); learn to crawl across a narrow bridge with water on both sides, and see if I could push another baby crawling across the same bridge into the water; learn to open my little legs on cue from a trainer (for sexual training); learn to switch out parts on cue with colored lights and tones, and many more tasks.

For the first three years, the children in the order are dressed in short white robes. Between three and five years old, the children wear brown tunics and leggings, then graduate to an acolyte's hooded brown robes at six years old. The older children find us younger children adorable. They enjoy interacting with me and the other infants, and will often come by and stroke our little cheeks and hands, or tell us that one day we will be big and have fun like they do. I love this attention and want to grow up to wear an acolyte's brown robe one day, and eventually at 13 years old, complete the coming of age ceremony and earn my adult name. I know that this will require learning many, many new skills and knowledge, and at this age, as the cult host, I am eager to learn.

Years later, when I was healing, I had trouble with the term "host", and especially its definition: an amnesic part that lives a life without abuse, or any knowledge of abuse. My host knew well that she was being raised within an occultic society. This was the only world she knew both as a child and as an adult. She knew about much of the abuse, and about the parts. She was allowed to watch and help monitor the different parts that presented when living in various countries. She was also one of my most deeply cult-loyal parts, because with all of her heart, she loved the fathers she had attached to. This feeling was true even during adulthood, which made leaving the order later in life very, very difficult. I missed the fathers when I didn't see or hear from them regularly, and not talking to them would trigger intense grief.

I am 12 months old. Father Jerome has tied me to his waist with a thick rope. He is playing the role of a system controller. My role is to obey everything he tells me, quickly and without error.

"Pick up those blocks," he says, "and stack the red ones together and the blue ones together." I quickly kneel by the blocks and do this task. When I am done, he says, "Good, good." In my role as a system part, I am learning how important instant obedience to my controllers is. The rope represents authority. The controller, being played today by Father Jerome, is always wearing the rope, and the system parts are tied to the controller by ropes.

It is a few days later. We are walking quickly and go to a field with lots of rocks. "Pick up the rocks, and put them in this corner of the field," he orders, pointing near the intersection of two stone walls. I begin picking up rocks while he oversees what I do. I am little and tire quickly, and his job is to encourage me to complete the task. Finally, we rest.

"You are listening well, and I am proud of you, Delta 34" he says. Jerome is dressed as Orgus, one of my delta controllers, and even in this menial task, I must obey him. The rocks represent memories, and he is teaching me to take them and put them in the correct area of the field. The field is divided up into squares labeled with various names and runes. I must match the rock and its rune with the storage rune.

After a period of rest, we eat some bread and drink some water then go back to our task. "Delta 34, put these memories into this storage file," Orgus commands, pointing to an area of the field marked with a rune that means "Low security". Quickly, obediently, I do so. "Delta 34, pass this memory into this file," he commands again, and I take the rock into a storage file marked "Medium security." I already know that rocks that are "high security" must be passed back to Orgus, to put into a special high security vault deep beneath us.

I am 18 months old. I have a rope tied around my waist. I am a gamma system controller, and tied to me by thick ropes are small children of my own age. There are six children. I have been told that my job is to ensure that they are completely obedient to me. These children represent my system parts. My job is to protect them by ensuring obedience to all commands from the programmers.

"You can walk around this house, but do not touch any of the candy in the yellow room," I am told by Father Carlotti, who is dressed in the costume of a master controller from the galaxy Pleiades. He has the stars of Pleiades scattered over a dark, midnight blue sky, and is wearing the runes and codes that signify his status. System controllers such as gamma system controllers take their orders from master controllers inside. Their orders must always, always, be utterly obeyed.

The children and I walk together into different rooms in the house. I have to tug on the ropes of a few to get them to follow. One room is painted with bright yellow walls, and this color, and the huge table in the middle of the room, attract us all. The children and I eagerly walk towards the table, where there are piles of candies in glass bowls.

I try to pull them away, but I am not strong enough to stop all of them pulling at me at once. One little girl, who looks so much like me, grabs a piece of soft divinity off the table and starts eating it. I try to pull her away, but it is too late; she has disobeyed the order.

Suddenly, she jerks in a violent seizure, turning blue. The other children stop their own rush towards the table. With frightened eyes we watch as this child continues seizing, and then dies. The candy must have poison in it, and she has disobeyed and died as a result. But I am responsible for her obedience, and with guilt and shame, realize that it is my fault that she died.

Pleiades (Father Carlotti) comes into the room and looks with anger and disgust at what has happened. "You killed her!" he tells me. "You didn't make sure she obeyed you! A controller always makes sure that their system obeys them. You failed her!"

I feel terrible, but worse is to come. Now, as I move with the children around the house, I must drag this dead child around with me.

"You are feeling the weight of your failure," Pleiades (Father Carlotti) says. I feel terrible, and start crying. A child, one put into my care, has died, because I failed to ensure her obedience to a command from the master controller for my system. I crumple to the floor, heartbroken, as I weep.

"Stop crying and do your job," he says sternly. "Don't let any more of your children die."

He then gives another command. "Do not let any of the children touch the toys in the blue room." The blue room is one we saw when walking through, but on this round of the house, I see toys on the floor: blocks of various colors, puzzles, picture books, and sparkly, beautiful dolls and balls. The children, who seem intent on disobeying me in spite of what happened in the yellow room, try to pull me over with them to the toys on the floor.

"No, no, children, no!" I scream. I pull with all of my strength, trying to pull them away. But the children wear me down, and one of them picks up a shiny red ball. Suddenly, there is a scream, and the child falls down dead. With a feeling of despair, I realize that this toy, too, contains poison. I am now dragging two dead children around from the ropes tied to my waist, and I am very tired. But the other children are now very quiet and seem willing to listen to me when I tell them not to touch anything at all in the house unless I give them permission. We sit in the middle of a red room, and Pleiades (Father Carlotti) enters. "You may all have a drink of juice," he says, and he pours out a cup for each of us. The juice tastes good, and I am relieved that no death results.

"Only allow them to do the things I tell you to," he says. "This is the only way to ensure their safety." I nod my understanding.

The children and I stay in this terrible house for two days. I am dragging the two dead children, reminders of what happens when system controller allows parts to disobey their master controller. During the day, Pleiades (Father Carlotti) comes at intervals, and lets us eat, or allows us to play with only certain toys, or rest. The children, who are still alive, and I sleep together, utterly exhausted by the end of the day, tied together, on a mat on the floor.

By the second day, the bodies of the two children who died begin to smell. The other children and I feel ill from the smell, and Pleiades (Father Carlotti) returns. "You are smelling the stench of disobedience," he tells us. I wonder how long I must drag these bodies around. I am feeling tired, ill, and sick of it all.

Finally, Pleiades returns again, gives a code, and I go inside. He then unties me from the children, and Lucia, my cult host, is sent out to take a shower and then rest in my dorm room. I am tired indeed and realize that being a controller is a great responsibility. The lives of those under me depend upon my ensuring complete obedience. I go to sleep, dreaming of saving children, while I am yelling orders at them, frantic to save their lives.

This memory caused me to cry for days when I first had it. I felt overwhelmed by guilt, sadness, grief, and then, finally, anger at Carlotti and the other fathers for putting me through such a terrible setup at such a young age. This is how the Jesuits train the internal controllers and master controllers to do their jobs: it is at the threat of loss of life if they should fail, not just for them, but for those they are supposed to protect.

I now realized why for years, my system controllers had been fighting me so hard, when I asked them to stop doing their cult jobs. They were desperately, desperately, trying to save the lives of children that they loved. They were terrified to disobey the master controllers over them inside, who I had yet to meet at that point in my healing. The lessons of absolute obedience, of never failing, and of controlling inside parts, had been instilled through this and numerous similar setups.

I am two years old. I am sitting in a small metal cage that is just big enough for me to curl up in. I am in a cage on the bottom row of a small pyramid comprised of four levels of cages, stacked one on top of each other. The bottom row has six cages, the next row above has four cages, then two cages in the next row above, and finally one cage at the very top. Each cage contains a child. We are all close in age.

I feel liquid dripping down on me. Someone in one of the cages above me has urinated on me. I hate the sticky, smelly urine. But my hair is matted with worse: the soft liquid stool that another stressed child in one of the upper cages has evacuated. I feel filthy, frightened, and the smell is horrible. I can see Mengele and Hilde, his assistant, in another part of the room.

I am hungry and thirsty. It has been a whole day since I have had anything to eat or drink. I whimper, and a guard comes by, looks into my cage, and drags me out. He rapes me roughly, and then puts me back into the cage. I feel utterly humiliated and utterly defiled.

Mengele walks towards the cages and opens the door to mine. He draws me out of the cage, and then takes me into another room where Hilde is waiting. He places me onto a mark chalked on the floor; it is a small blue square.

"Stand in the square," he orders me. I do so.

In front of me is a large red circle painted on the floor, and in the middle of the circle is a small infant. Mengele places a knife in my hand, and then gives a single command: "Kill!" I hesitate for a second, struggling with killing this tiny, defenseless baby with red, wrinkled face and fisted up, tiny hands. I have practiced before with kittens, strangling them with my bare hands at his order, but this is different.

Finally, I stab the infant. But I had hesitated. Mengele is displeased with me. "You must never hesitate!" he yells at me. Delayed obedience will not work with him. I am put back in the same cage, and am told by Hilde, "No food or water until you don't hesitate". I am trembling with hunger and thirst. The terrible smell in my cage and on my body makes me retch. I wonder if I will die here.

Eight hours later, Hilde comes and takes me out of the cage. I am being given a second chance to be obedient. Once again, I am placed on the blue square. Once again, there is a tiny baby inside the red circle. Mengele is there. I am weaving a bit from trauma and exhaustion, but I listen carefully. The order comes abruptly again: "Kill!" and this time, without hesitation, I obey.

"Good girl, I knew you would learn," Mengele praises me. Hilde smiles, and gives me a drink of water, and some soft pudding. "Not too fast, eat slowly," she warns, since I have not eaten in almost two days.

Hilde then takes out a sponge, and with warm water that feels wonderful, washes the feces out of my hair. She then sponges the filth off of my naked body. "Good girls get to smell good," she murmurs to me in German. "No one wants to smell bad, like a bad girl." I am grateful for the food and bath, and already feel a little better. Maybe I won't die. But I am also feeling sad deep inside about the little baby that has just died. But I know, oh how I know, that I cannot show any of this sadness to these two. I lock the tears deep, deep inside, handing the emotion over to parts whose job is to contain the sadness and grief.

Mengele and Hilde then take my hand, and together, they put me into one of the cages on the second tier. I have performed well, and so now only three cages are above mine. This tier gets a little bit of water and a slice of bread twice a day, and there are fewer feces and showers of urine to endure. Best of all, I am only raped once a day, instead of four times a day as I was on the lowest tier.

After this, each day, twice a day, I am taken into the room with the blue square and the red circle with a baby in the middle, and I am given the order to "Kill!" I perform well. I have seen children on the bottom row weaken and lay in their cages without moving, and I wonder how many times they have hesitated. Some end up dying, and their bodies remain there for several days as a warning to those who fail to obey instantly.

On the fourth day, instead of a baby, it is a toddler tied up in the middle of the red circle. The child is struggling and screaming, and when the order "Kill!" comes, I hesitate.

Mengele looks furious. Without a word, Hilde takes me back to the cages. I am back in one of the bottom ones, starting out all over again. The rapes every six hours start back up, and I am covered with urine and feces at the end of the next day, hungry and thirsty once more.

I know that if I stay here, I will die. The smell of the decomposing body in the cage next to mine is an object lesson in what happens to children who are on the bottom row too long.

After 24 hours, Hilde comes and gets me, and takes me back into the room with the blue square and red circle. Once again, a struggling toddler is tied up in the middle of the circle. Mengele gives the order again, and this time, I obey his command instantly, without hesitation.

"Good girl, you have learned," he croons. "My little killer is learning." Hilde again bathes me, feeds me, and once again, I am moved back to the second tier of cages. I never hesitate again. Over and over, I am given the command to kill, twice a day, and soon my response is automatic; I obey without conscious thought.

After another few days, I am in the cage at the top. I am now killing on command using various weapons – knife, a needle, a garrote. Finally, I am praised heavily, and allowed to leave the cages, the terrible cages. I was 25 months old and have learned to disconnect how much I hated taking a life from conscious thought.

Mengele's methods of programming children were cruel beyond belief. But the occultic societies recognized that he got results: a child who survived his methods would be completely programmed and obedient. This is why he was so sought after by various occultic groups around the world. For a large fee, he would go in and train children of all ages, using his primitive but effective methods which were based on data collected for years.

Sadly, he was a head trainer for the Jesuits in their main training facility and labs. He used these labs to continue his experimentation on humans, which meant that the infants and children who lived in this facility would be exposed to his merciless training. I was extremely relieved when he died when I was 19 years old, and another, younger head trainer who used better methods that did not cause such needless loss of life (or sanity, in some children) took charge of the training and experiments. The younger head trainer was my mentor, and when I became older, I replaced her as head of this facility. But I consulted with her frequently, because I admired her more humane approach and her deep insights into human behavior. She was one of my best friends, and I loved her deeply.

In Jesuit programming, when presenters are not 'out' in the body, they are living in 'Wonderland' inside. In the Order, Alice in Wonderland programming is used to ensure that presenters: never communicate with or be aware of other parts inside; completely believe that their memories of an ordinary life is the only life that that person is living;

stay completely amnesic to any cult activity; and stay completely unaware of any loss of time when they are not 'out' in the body. Key characters in Wonderland, such as the White Rabbit, remind presenters of these tasks, and reward and punish for compliance or disobedience as needed. As these memories relate, Alice in Wonderland programming begins at a very early age.

I am 18 months old. I am in a special place in the outdoor programming lab. It is a sunny, warm day, and the sun falls on my face and shoulders as I walk on slightly chubby but muscular legs into an opening within a boxwood maze. This opening is a beautiful arched trellis covered with roses and other climbing flowers, with sweet perfume filling the springtime air.

There is a path that I can see that leads through this maze, which is augmented in various places with trees, shrubs, and even a fake "seashore" on the shores of a small lake. I wait, enjoying the weather, which is sunny and bright. Soon, an older child dressed as Alice from Wonderland appears. She is about 11 years old, has beautiful curly, dark blond hair and light blue eyes. She is dressed in a blue dress covered with a white pinafore, and she has a big blue bow in her hair that matches her pretty eyes perfectly.

The girl guides me by the hand along the path. An adult, Mattheo, my primary trainer, is dressed like a large white rabbit, and I toddle along behind him, being guided by "Alice". I am a French presenter named "Jean". This will be my name when I spend time in France with my French family, starting at age three. As 'Jean', I have had careful programming since birth to come out and go back in on cue, and to understand French when it is spoken to me. It is the only language that I, as Jean, have ever heard in this presentation.

As Alice guides me, she warns me, "Never, ever leave the path. If you do, terrible, terrible things will happen. The only safety is to follow the white rabbit, and to stay on the path. Never leave it, regardless of what happens." I wonder what could happen that is so terrible but prefer not to find out. I have already experienced "terrible, terrible" already numerous times in my young life, and have no desire to experience it again.

The white rabbit leads us to a special area with a small stone bench, and pretty stone pavers cover the ground in the center. This area is in a large room-like area in the maze surrounded by boxwood "walls" to nearly enclose it. At the entrance that we pass through is a sign overhead written in golden runes that signify "France". I follow the white rabbit and Alice inside.

"Jean, this is where you will live in Wonderland," both Alice and the white rabbit tell me in unison. "This is your special place," the white rabbit repeats. I have heard these same instructions before, on previous visits. On the walls of the boxwoods, which are high – nearly seven feet in height – are large television screens that display pictures of my family in France playing with me as a baby, talking to me in French. The screens show me the cottage that I will live in when I go to France for the first time in another year and a half. On the video display, I hear my French mother, Jeanine, talking to me as a baby in loving tones, as she changes me. I see her take me outside to see the flowers in the cottage garden outside the house. These are the 'memories' of 'France' that Jean is supposed to have.

Alice cautions me, "You must never, ever leave this area when you are not called outside to present," she tells me sternly.

The white rabbit looks at me and repeats her warning. "You must not leave, even to go to other parts of Wonderland, ever," he insists.

I have heard this warning before, since this is not my first visit to the French part of Wonderland. The first few times, Alice and the white rabbit stayed with me and played, speaking French to me. There are toys, games, and other things to play with, even picture books with words in French on the cover. And the fascinating, fascinating videos of a wonderful life with a loving family in France play constantly. I will not be bored here.

"You must remain here when you are told to," Alice says again, and then she and the white rabbit leave. This is the first time I have been left here, and I wonder how long I will be alone.

In a little while, I hear a little girl singing and laughing outside the entrance to my special place. I look out, and see that she is about three years old, and has curly brown hair and merry green eyes. The little girl stops at the entrance to French wonderland, peeks her head in, and in English says, "Little girl, come out and play with me."

She seems to be very nice, her smile is welcoming, and I am getting tired of playing alone. The sun is shining, and she beckons with her hand outstretched to me. I walk over to her and take her hand, and we walk together down the path.

But suddenly, a large, dark bird-like creature swoops overhead. "The Jabberwocky!" the little girl screams, letting go of my hand and diving under a bush. I try to do the same, but rough hands grab me and pinch me, and two fat people take me to a corner, and rape me. The hands belong to two men dressed in striped costumes, and I learn that they are "Tweedle Dee" and "Tweedle Dum" and that they enjoy hurting little presenters who leave the place they are supposed to stay in.

"A foreigner, a foreigner!" The family jumps to their feet, shouting in rage. Then they all rise up and stab me with their sharp forks and knives, and hurt me, including hurting me in my privates. I am screaming in terror at this point, as the German speakers say "We hate French speakers who come into our area. Stay out, you are NOT welcome here!" Traumatized and shaking, I am thrown out of this part of Wonderland, and lay on the ground, terrified. Suddenly, the white rabbit and Alice are bending over me.

"Why didn't you stay in your area, where you would be safe?" Alice asks sorrowfully.

"We tried to spare you this type of pain, but you didn't believe us," says the white rabbit with heartbreak in his eyes.

Slowly, they lead me back to the French area of Wonderland, where the French videos are playing. I try to explain about the little girl who tricked me into leaving.

"You will see and hear a lot of people and things that might seem to be fun, or that might make you want to leave your area," cautions Alice. "But you must never, ever listen to them. Only leave when the white rabbit tells you to; and only go where he tells you to. He will make sure that you stay safe."

The white rabbit looks at me tenderly, and I realize that he really does want to protect me from the terrible things that happen outside of the French part of wonderland.

"Why were the German people so mean to me?" I sob. "I haven't done anything to make them hate me!"

I am horrified at the thought. I am a French presenter, and so am completely amnesic to the rituals and sacrifices that I have attended, including the ones I have done to seal me into my own presentation and create barriers between me and other presentations. The hedges in Wonderland are a physical representation of these barriers, which I had crossed in my terror a few minutes before.

I certainly have. Alice and the White Rabbit leave again, and this time, in spite of hearing children skipping and singing outside my boxwood enclosure, calling out to me in various languages, inviting me to play with them, I refuse to leave, and obediently stay in my area. I am learning to ignore the other presentations in this very concrete way, and to stay inside, immune to the attractions of other lives and other languages, staying exactly where I am told internally. As I get older and start training to be a programmer myself, only then do I learn that the 'Jabberwocky' is a flying animatronic or a drone controlled by the programmers.

The setup described above is used to teach parts to never cross the perimeters and barriers between the different presentations, thus isolating parts from each other. This isolation makes the person more controllable as each part will only have a partial view of the person's lived reality. Most importantly, it terrifies the presenters into obeying the rules to never communicate with each other and to never pay attention to anything outside their designated internal zones. Otherwise, because children have natural curiosity, the different presenters might be tempted talk to each other, or to "peek out" when the other parts are presenting in their respective countries. This kind of internal communication or shared presenting would overcome the amnesia or barriers between presentations, which is considered critical to maintaining security and covers. Many exposures to these setups and special rituals are used to make the child internalize the mazes and Wonderland, and to keep presenters in their designated zones when they are not cued out.

When not out presenting, the parts will be trained to watch the videos within their special area, augmented with videos of actual events, and to accept these videos as their own 'memories'. This creates the perception of a sustained and unbroken timeline for the presenters who will believe that they are continuously "living life". They are thus not able to perceive that they are 'inside' and have in fact 'lost time' from the time intervals (which can be significant, lasting months) between being called out to present. For instance, if a child has not been sent to a presentation for many months, they will be shown videos of significant events that the child allegedly experienced during this time. Thus, Jean will have her own "memories" of childhood, with many important events "remembered", in spite of the fact that in reality, she only spends three weeks a year in France, trading out with her twin sister and other children who look like her in this role. All have been equally programmed to look, act, and sound like "Jean", and the families are also programmed to not notice when 'Jean' is played by different children at different times. The Order will typically conceive several children (two to four is an average number) that look alike, making such 'swapping' possible when necessary.

I am two and a half years old. I am outside a special room in the programming lab, dressed in a bright blue dress that falls just beneath my knees, and a white pinafore. My hair has been dyed yellow with a temporary dye. I have a large white bow in my hair, along with white stockings and shiny shoes. I am Alice, one of the main presentation controllers, and I am going to a tea party. I love tea parties, with cakes and tea to eat and drink, and I look forward to this. Next to me, holding my hand, is Mnemosyn. In my Alice in Wonderland programming, she is a mother figure to me, Alice. Mnemosyn takes me places, reminding me of what to remember and what to forget. Mnemosyn also helps me to "remember to forget". I look at her and smile, and she smiles back.

We enter the room and sit at the tea party table. Several fathers I love are sitting at the table. But there is something wrong, terribly wrong. As I look at them, to my horror, I realize that these beloved fathers have been killed in terrible, gruesome ways: one father has his eyes gouged out, and is slumped blankly on his chair, unseeing with dark, bloody holes in his face. Another father has blood pouring out of his mouth, as he sits in pale, bloody death. The one next to him has his arms amputated. Blood has been pouring out in spurts and covers his robes. Across from him, a father has her chest stabbed and her breasts cut off. Her mutilated body leans at a grotesque angle in her chair. Each of the twelve chairs holds a gruesome, terrible scene of a recent death of a father I love.

I cannot believe what she is saying. It is obvious what I am upset about! “The fathers!” I cry out in anguish. “They’re dead! Someone has killed them!”

Mnemosyn stops, looks at me, and says, “Alice, there are no dead fathers here. It’s just you and I. Now stop being silly, and let’s enjoy our tea”. She points to an empty chair for me to sit in, and fills my cup with tea, passing me a plate with biscuits on it. “Have one, they’re especially good,” she says, completely ignoring the gruesome scene around us.

I feel green, but have learned to always obey Mnemosyn, whose job is to tell me what to believe and what not to believe – or remember. As she calmly munches on a biscuit and sips tea, she tries to discuss the outing that we will have in a bit to the beach. But I am white-faced and have difficulty not looking at the gruesome scene around the table.

“Alice, you must stop imagining such things,” she scolds. “If I say they aren’t here, they aren’t here. Why can’t you listen to me? Don’t you think I would be upset if there was something here to see?” As she continues to lecture me, I finally calm down and have a sip of tea with sugar from the beautifully decorated teapot: it has lovely roses and flowers on it, and golden runes in a lovely design.

She is reassuring in her tone. Then, she says, “Do you agree to believe everything – and I mean everything – that I tell you, and to ignore completely the things I tell you to?” Her eyes look fierce as she says this, and I say “Yes” in a low voice.

She then takes me to a small altar in one corner of the room, and we do a sacrifice together; I put a small child on the altar and stab it through the eyes, as I say “I will only see what you, Mnemosyn, tell me to see,” and then stab it in the head, saying “I will only remember what you, Mnemosyn, tell me to remember.” She pats me on the head, praising me, as I invoke a demonic spirit of memory control to come inside and help me to always listen to Mnemosyn. Afterwards, we turn around, and I am startled. The table has been completely cleaned up; there are no gruesome bodies, and the tablecloth is sparkling white. The tea party looks just as it should, with colorful flowers in a vase. I join Mnemosyn at the table who with a smile says, “See, Alice? There were no bodies here. You were just having a bad dream. Always, always bring your bad dreams to me, and I will help them go away.”

I feel rather dazed. Deep inside, I wonder if the fathers I love are okay, dream or no dream. It was all too real, what I saw before the sacrifice. But Mnemosyn carries on a bright, happy conversation. I finish having tea with her and the other characters from Wonderland who have come to join us: Dormouse, the Mad Hatter, the White Rabbit. These are all children or fathers I love, dressed in costumes, but they play their parts perfectly, and we have a good time.

Later, I tremble just slightly as I leave the programming lab to return to my room. On the way, I see Mattheo and Jerome together; they smile at me and look just fine; they act as if nothing at all has happened in that terrible room; they certainly aren’t dead, or even hurt. I wonder, then, if it really was all just a bad dream as Mnemosyn insisted.

This “tea party” setup was an essential part of developing my presenter amnesia controllers, Alice and Mnemosyn. In these setups, Mnemosyn, the adult programmer and a mother figure to young Alice, is modeling to her the behaviors and beliefs expected of the non-cult presentations if they ever remember any cult-related memories, and shows her how to handle them with denial and amnesia. The two of them work together to take memories of violent cult rituals or other events that a presenter might have, and to consign these memories into the categories of "bad dreams" which are not to be believed. That is, they are dedicated to ensuring presenter amnesia and denial of cult life. This enables the presenters to keep believing that their 'ordinary lives' are the only life they have ever lived, and that they have never experienced ritual abuse or mind control.

By the time I am five, Alice is able to check if any non-cult presenter is experiencing any unauthorized or 'bleed through' memories of their cult life, cult events, or lives of other presenters. If this is happening, she can help the presenter to completely forget them with the help of the ever-watchful and careful Mnemosyn. Of course, my cult host is allowed to remember cult life so Alice does not interact with her. If Lucia, my cult host, has any memories that need to be forgotten, these will be stored within a completely different high-security storage system that has different guardians and barriers.

Because Alice, Mnemosyn, and the other Wonderland parts have critical controller roles, they undergo frequent reinforcement of their programming through not only physical setups but the use of virtual reality and other technologies. As usual, the setups are designed to create complete amnesia, and to teach Alice to help the presenters to only remember what they are told to remember. These setups are at times brutally violent in order to make the threat of what could happen, if a presenter remembers things that they shouldn't, seem absolutely believable.

Over the next few months, the presenters themselves will be hosted in the various countries they are to live in at times. Before doing so, they will experience numerous physical setups in which the lives of their (beloved) family members – father, mother, sister, brother, aunt, grandmother, etc. – in various countries will be threatened should they ever remember their cult experiences, or the memories of parts that present in other countries. Finally, before starting to live with the family for a few weeks in France, or Germany, or another country, a "baby" brother in each of these families is killed by the young child who is to live and present in these countries. This creates extra guilt (along with terror created by the threat of the family "telling" and the child being sent to "prison") which will help to maintain the complete amnesia required.

I am a presentation controller named Andromeda. I am two and a half years old. My job is to make sure that the presentation shells are working correctly, and that only the parts in the presenting shell are allowed to see, hear or speak. Other presentation parts, while not out in their respective shells, are not allowed to see, speak or hear. My instructions are clear: ONLY the child locked into the shell (with a special key) is allowed to see, hear or speak. The others must be silent, and unaware of what the child in the shell says or does.

Today, I am practicing controlling the French shell and the French parts who present through this shell. My twin sister, Lizzie, is playing the role of the French presenter today. She is wearing the clear flexible plastic shell that represents the shell program. My twin sister Lizzie, as Jean (we both play this presentation role in France, so she plays her role perfectly) is speaking in French to her French mother, who is in the programming studio to assist with this program. To help teach the other presentation parts who are not currently out in their respective shells that they must not see, hear or speak, children labeled with runes that represent other presentations are standing behind me. They are wearing eye patches, ear plugs, and blindfolds over their mouths to prevent their seeing, hearing, or speaking anything

While Lizzie is talking, I am doing my other, critical job: as a presentation controller, I am monitoring Jean to ensure that her language, her apparent intellect, her body language, and her motor skills are perfectly in line with her presentation profile designed by the programmers. If she deviates even slightly, or tries to take her shell off, she will be tortured terribly, and so will I. If I fail to report even the slightest deviation to Pleiades, Polaris, or Galatea, my own controllers and the triad of master controllers over all of the presentation systems, they and I will be tortured terribly. Father Mattheo, the person I love most, is Pleiades, and I am desperate that I perform well and not fail. I don't want him tortured. The three master controllers are sitting quietly on an elevated platform above the scene, which represents their more ascended status: the higher the controller, the higher in the room they sit. These master controllers are dressed in robes covered with stars representing their galaxy, watching, just as they will do internally as I grow and the program is fully installed.

Jean performs perfectly, even not understanding English when one of her mother's friends comes by, looks at Jean, and asks her a question in English. Since in her French presentation, Jean does not understand English, she gives the woman a smile, and a look of bewilderment. Jean has passed her test, and I am relieved.

Pleiades approaches me where I am standing on my little, raised platform above the children representing various presenters. He gives a verbal code, flashes a special pattern on the handheld device that he shows me, and also shows me his golden key. I must see all of these things, along with his voice and face, in order to obey his command to change shells. This has been practiced thousands of times over the past two years. I obey instantly. He has given me the code to change shells, replacing the French shell out in front with the Russian shell. I have a lever that rotates the correct shell out to the place in the room that represents the shell being out in the body. I relay the command to Athena, my sub-controller, who goes and gets another little girl. This little girl represents Katerina, or Katya as she is called by friends and family, and she is my Russian presenter. I must make sure that the shell is in place perfectly, locked in so that the little girl cannot remove it, and then monitor her performance as Katya. I give the key to Athena, the controller under me, who locks the shell with the little girl in it into place, and returns the key to me.

Katya's sister in the family that she will live with when she is in Russia, who is also a Jesuit child, comes into the room, and starts speaking Russian. Katya is performing well: her body language, language skills and abilities seem consistent with her profile. Then, an older man with white hair comes into the room. He is holding another little girl by the hand. The little girl comes over to Katya, and asks her in German, "What is your name?" as she smiles.

Katya answers, "Katya." I am horrified. She has broken with her presentation profile, disobeying her programming to only know Russian. I hear a sharp "zap!" and Katya falls over unconscious. I hear another zap, and I am shocked throughout my body with terrible, excruciating pain.

Pleiades and the other master controllers come over. They are angry. "She failed, and that means you failed!" they tell me. "Your life, and the lives of your presenters, depend upon never, ever breaking profile. Things like this can never, ever be allowed to happen!"

I am heartbroken. I failed, and Katya almost died. I am responsible for her, and her failure means that I had failed her.

The next day I am given another chance. Another little girl, one of my sisters who is presenting as Katya, plays her part perfectly. I have been given a new tool: a wand that can instantly stun a presenter into unconsciousness if they falter or deviate slightly from their profile. This way, they won't have to get hurt and possibly die, as I am told could happen if they continue to fail.

"You can prevent their deaths, if you discipline them swiftly and correctly," Polaris tells me. "Punishing them for disobeying – even slightly – will save their lives, and mine."

I feel the weight of this responsibility. Being a high-level controller over presentations is a very difficult job. But I desperately, desperately want to save the lives of the people I love, and my own life, so I will learn to do this job, and do it well.

As time goes on, there are fewer and fewer infractions or variances from the presentation profiles, under my watchful eye. These are punished immediately and painfully, and as I have been taught to do, I report the deviations to the three master controllers over me. They will notify Saturn, my presentation reprogramming system, and tell him which internal reprogramming sequences to run that night to fix the errors and repair the system. The fathers want our systems to be able to self-reprogram, because we may be in situations where we are away from Rome, and unable to get to a programming facility for a period of time.

As this memory shows, the presentation programming that I underwent was quite complex, where my internal controllers and master controllers were taught to do their jobs by the programmers using concrete setups to model the expected behaviors and train these controllers. The punishments for any infractions are very severe in order to instill the importance of never breaking presentation when being hosted in another country outside of the facility. Internally, Athena, the part who works under Andromeda, goes to the entrance portal of Wonderland and tells the white rabbit to bring the correct presenter. Pleiades informs Andromeda which presenter this is, and Andromeda will pass this command on to Athena. The white rabbit and Alice together will bring the correct presenter to Athena, who will then go to Andromeda, get the key to lock the presenter into her shell, and then return the key to Andromeda.

When the child's designated time in the presentation is over for the time being, Andromeda will give Athena the key to unlock the presenter from the shell. She then returns the presenter to the rabbit hole where Alice will be waiting for the presenter. Alice then takes the presenter by the hand and leads her down the rabbit hole and back into Wonderland, taking her back to the correct area within it. At this point, depending on the orders given by Pleiades, Andromeda will have another presenter brought out, to be locked into the appropriate shell, or other controllers may have the cult host or other cult parts present, according to what the cult needs at that point.

The concern about breaking presentation is a concern that if a child acts "differently" and their profiles are not "perfect", then the cover story that the little girl has only lived in America, or that she grew up in France and has never traveled elsewhere, could be questioned. If a child looks "multiple", or "abused", this could also draw undue attention and scrutiny from others, which is the last thing that the Jesuits want. For the children are used to help conceal the criminal activities worldwide that the Order is involved in, once they are hosted in various nations.

Chapter 4: Theta and Spiritual Systems Training

Some of the events described in this chapter on theta and spiritual training may stretch the limits of believability. Based on my memories, in order to train their children in these skills and indoctrinate them in their occult teachings, the Order uses real spiritual experiences as well as elaborate setups with costumes and props, virtual reality and other technologies, drugs and hypnosis. Both types of experiences will feel very real to the child who is going through it. It can be difficult to distinguish whether a memory is of a real spiritual experience, or of a contrived scenario carefully staged by the adults. In this chapter, I describe the events as I experienced them as a child, when they felt completely real to me. While I personally believe that the events I have chosen to describe in this chapter were indeed authentic spiritual experiences, I am also open to the possibility that they were staged and based upon trickery.

Theta Training

The room is dark with absolutely no light in it. I am only three months old, in a crib. I am gumming on a toy that I have been given to play with: a severed human head. With my tiny fingers, I explore its matted hair, its eyes, its mouth. I am a theta controller named Nemesis in training. Darkness has been the main realm that I live in. I only feel comfortable in this dark. This and similar body parts have been my playthings.

Later, Father Carlotti comes into the room. He places steel blades on the ends of my little feet, and tells me to kick hard. I kick as hard as I can. They encounter the soft fur of a rabbit that squeals. My kicks have killed it. Carlotti lifts me up, hugs me, and praises me. “This is where your power comes from,” he tells me in a soft voice. “You really are a little killer.” I feel funny about his praise. I am glad that he is happy, but deep inside, I don’t like being called a “killer”.

A few months later, Father Jerome comes into the room to take me for my daily training. I am not feeling good, in fact, I feel ill, and do not want to go. So, I think about hitting Jerome in the head with a tiny fist, even though he is too far away to reach, to let him know where I hurt. I simply think it. Father Jerome steps back, looking surprised, and then goes to get Father Carlotti. “She hit me with theta skill,” he tells Carlotti. Carlotti is surprised and objects, “That’s impossible. She’s much too young.”

Jerome lifts me up and praises me for what I have done. He checks my head and gives me some medicine to help with the headache and slight fever. “You were trying to tell me what was wrong, weren’t you?” he says in a loving voice. I had and am glad that he figured it out. But I am also pondering the fact that I can think something, will it, and others feel it. It seems like a wonderful new thing to be able to do.

I am nine months old and have been taught by Father Mattheo to direct my theta blows at animals. I can now kill an animal easily with a quick blow. For some reason, he and the other fathers seem excited by this ability. I hate the terrible scream the animals make as I kill them, but they tell me that what I am doing is good, very, very good indeed.

I wonder why an activity that makes me so sad makes them so happy. It makes me feel strange and dirty inside. I hate the rituals that have to be done before and after the kills to “give power”. I hate the killing. But I cannot let them know this. They will be angry, and I might even have to visit “hell”. I don’t want that.

Today is a bit different. Mattheo brings a small child that I have never seen before into the room and tells me to hit the child hard with my theta ability. I don’t want to do this and look upset. Mattheo sits me on his lap and talks to me. “Nemesis, this is a very, very bad child that has hurt a lot of other children in terrible ways. If this child is allowed to grow up, he will become very evil and might even kill me and the other fathers and children in the facility." I am listening, but still don't feel quite right. "You want to protect us from that kind of evil, don't you?" he asks, looking at me tenderly.

I feel a deep conflict inside. I don't want to hurt the child, but I don't want Mattheo or the others that I love so much to be hurt. I know all about evil adults, I have met them in setups: terrible people who claw, torture, rape and hurt children and babies, making them scream. Mattheo seems to think that I can prevent this, if I hit this child hard. So, hesitantly, I do what Mattheo asks: I hit the child with a theta blow. The child falls over dead, bleeding from his nose and mouth. It is very much like killing an animal, but with much more sadness.

"Very, very good, Nemesis," he tells me. As Nemesis, I am named after one of the beautiful immortals who has visited my crib since birth. I carry this name proudly because I want to be like her. "I am so proud of you. I love you." He takes me out of the room and plays with me for a whole extra hour that day. I love this extra attention, and know that next time, I will do even better.

By the time I am three years old, I can kill teens and small adults with my theta abilities. I have learned that if I have sexual activity with someone first, it is much easier to create the spiritual connection that will enable the theta killing. There are two other theta controllers along with me, Nemesis, inside: Phobos and Chaos. Along with their systems, they have also learned to do their jobs well. Controllers often come in groups of three. They consider one another "sisters" inside, helping each other to do their jobs well, and also monitoring one another inside for signs of failure which are instantly reported to the programmers.

Phobos has the job of sending dreams of extreme terror to those she visits, while Chaos has the job of creating insanity in those she visits. Phobos has an easy job; she has thousands of terrible memories and feelings of terror that she can draw on from my less than ideal childhood to send out. Chaos takes the memories of being drugged and tortured, and the awful horror she experienced, to send out to others. We three controllers live in a special area internally, with temples dedicated to each of us. When called to present to the outside world, we are treated as "deities", with sacrifices and worship done to us. It is thrilling, but still feels a bit strange, to be called a "god" and to have adults bow to me, but this is part of being an immortal, and I learn to accept it as my due.

Theta training involves training parts to stay in the theta brainwave state. Parts are taught to stay in this state through a course of punishment and reward: punishment for going into a different state, reward for staying in it. The training of theta parts also include much indoctrination regarding the benefits of being in theta state.

Many occultists believe that this is a state wherein the individual has increased spiritual sensitivity and abilities, including the ability to do remote viewing and psychic killing. Based on my adult memories in the cult, the occult societies and government agencies prize psychic killing because the source of the death is completely undetectable: there is no poison, no physical wound, and so it allows an assassination that cannot be explained using physical methods.

Theta state can also enhance physical abilities, such as running faster than would otherwise be physically possible. I have seen individuals walk up a wall and back down when in this state, levitate above the ground, and bend spoons and other objects with their minds. While many in the western world, where logic and scientific "proof" methods have created a worldview that does not allow for the supernatural interventions in the physical world, my own experiences growing up contradict that view.

Spiritual Systems Training

I am four years old. I have entered a room that has special black and white patterns, with white and black squares, diamonds and half squares, as well as numbers and runes written on different squares in beautiful white or gold letters. This is a depiction of a part of the Q'bala. I must learn to carefully walk the various patterns and numbers and runes in an exacting, precise sequence. In one of my systems, the Q'bala is the pathway to enlightenment, one which involves learning complex numerical sequences with spiritual meanings.

At the various doors into this room are older children dressed as either a "black angel" or a "white angel". These are the guardians of the Q'bala. They do not allow unauthorized intruders to enter the Q'bala, and at times, I myself play the part of angelic guardian as well, glowering fiercely at anyone who attempts to enter this magical room without the proper codes. I have already internalized this room and am now learning to walk the paths and do complex equations that will provide answers to difficult questions with the help of spiritual beings. I am also learning to internalize my own guardians who are being taught how to do their jobs inside through watching these guardians and interacting with them. My trainers understand that at this young age, an experience is worth more than a thousand explanations, and that the beliefs and behaviors will be internalized much more quickly and longer term if they are experienced concretely. "Experiencing is believing" is their thinking, and I experience many, many setups during my first few years of life.

I am five years old. I am stretched out with arms and legs restrained on a cold, white marble floor. There are demonic beings hovering over each of the points of the sephiroth, special areas on my body which open up portals that enter into the demonic realms. These portals are used for traveling out of body. A special ritual is being done to reinforce the power and to keep open the portal at a point on my upper body. A sacrifice is done, and a bloody baby is laid on top of this area, where it is dying, as I chant the appropriate words.

"Receive this sacrifice, Chokmah", I chant, asking that the entity – an immortal being- that lives in this point of my body will receive my offering to him. I will rely on him and others to help me travel the dimensions, as well as to travel to various locations for remote viewing and other activities. I have been doing this for several years. I barely notice the increased weight and depression as this ritual is done, or how as Chokmah sits on top of me, he seems to suffocate me. I have been taught that should I do these rituals regularly, that the beings at the points of the sephiroth will take my life if I do not feed them myself in return for their "help" and "power". I do not fail to perform regular rituals to them and have also internalized the rituals: my internal points of the sephiroth all do internal sacrifices on internalized altars, to continue to maintain their power.

The scenes I describe are only a small portion of the cabalistic training that children in the Jesuit order go through. The full training takes years. These memories illustrate some of the terrible feelings experienced by a young child being forced to go through such training. When these memories came back, I tried to get rid of the dark spiritual beings sitting on these points in my body. I knew they were evil and did not want any good for me. However, I experienced extreme panic for several days because the very young parts of me who had gone through these experiences completely believed that these entities protected them. They also believed that these spirits would take vengeance on them or their loved ones, should I ever try to stop being loyal to them. For examples, parts believed that these demons "protected" them from other demons in the dimensions they had traveled. Parts also believed that these demons are able to come from the dimensions and "eat" them if they are not protected, and none of them wanted a creature such as a harpy to come into our dimension and kill them.

It took weeks of grounding and bringing truth to these very young parts to help them realize that we have a protection that is much greater than the power of any demon: the loving authority of the true Jesus. Yes, there were spiritual attacks because the people who had trained me were not happy when they felt in the spiritual realm that something had changed. But at the name of Jesus, those spirits trying to attack me – it felt like a flood of utter darkness and death that tried to enter the room - fled. These spirits were powerless when I cried out to Jesus, and He answered. In fact, when His love entered the room, they were terrified and left. After a few experiences like this, the young parts inside calmed down, and the panic lifted.

Egyptian

I am three and a half years old. I am completely naked and chained to a huge granite statue of Anubis, who has an altar that holds sacrifices between his outstretched arms. I am terrified and trembling. I am in a dark, cold vault beneath a large pyramid structure, lit only by a tiny candle at the other end of the vault. I have been told that I must spend the night here to wait for Anubis. I know all too well that I must please Anubis or he will tear my heart out. I have heard stories about children that did not make him…happy. I am not sure what he will ask and desperately hope it will not be too difficult for me.

It is hours later, the middle of the night, and I am still awake, too frightened to sleep. The statue I am chained to shifts slightly, and then I see it move – literally move – as if it coming to life. It is breathing and talking to me and is asking me a question.

"What did you bring me?" Anubis demands in a low, commanding voice.

I have learned what Anubis requires through careful training. I take the heart of a small child out of the bag I have brought with me, and place it above me, reaching backwards, into his outstretched arms. To my horror, Anubis bends forward and eats the heart. It disappears as he makes terrible chewing noises. Finally, he is done.

"I want more," Anubis says in his deep voice. I place another heart into his outstretched arms, and he consumes this as well. He keeps asking for more, so one at a time, I place the remaining hearts in the bag into his arms, and he repeats this terrible eating. There is a dark, dark presence like a black cloud in the room. I feel terrified and exhausted, as if I have been hiking on a high mountain for hours. This exhaustion intensifies the longer I am in the presence of this entity.

Finally, the red eyes of Anubis turn to me, and he asks the question I dread. "Have you nothing more?" he demands. I know that he is asking to weigh my heart, so I tell him, "Only myself."

"Then, mortal child, you know what to do." Yes, I know, I have been carefully taught what to do, and slowly, reluctantly, with cold sweat dripping off of me, I climb into the waiting arms and lay myself out on the altar.

"Is your heart pure and willing to always obey me?" Annubis asks.

Trembling, I respond, "Yes, my lord."

"Then, I will weigh your heart, and see if you are telling the truth," he says. At that moment, a dark cloud hovers over me, then covers me and seems to enter deep within me. I can feel it probing, seeking, questioning. I feel intense pain and repulsion at this spiritual invasion, but I do not show it or cry out, realizing from my training that to do so would be to anger this being and invite death. I wait in utter fear.

After what seems like a very long time, he finally pronounces, "You are worthy." I have been weighed and found obedient (and frightened) enough. The dark cloud lifts. I am allowed to crawl off of the altar and get down. I have trouble standing or walking, and feel extremely weak and depleted, as if my life force has been sucked out of me. I sit down and the statue changes. Now it is simply a statue and not a "divine being."

After a while, Father Jerome comes into the room. He picks me up, seeing immediately that I am too weak to walk. He puts me into my bed in the room I share with the other children, and brings me a special drink with electrolytes and other things to help renew my strength. I go to sleep while he holds my hand. This special amount of affection and attention is due to his understanding how difficult this ritual has been, a ritual which helps to spiritually install my own internal Anubis, a major controller in my inside Egyptian system. Each child must go through this, and I have heard of some that never return from this terrible room. Fortunately, all of the children in my dorm room pass this terrible rite, and we all are now chained within part of our souls to the demonic spirit that represents Anubis. We will undergo similar rituals for the other Egyptian deities over the next year until we have a full internal pantheon.

Babylonian

I am four years old. I am suspended from the ceiling of a large chamber by hundreds of small golden needles attached to golden wires that have been threaded throughout my body. This is a special ritual for Bel, a Babylonian god. The pain I endure during this ceremony is part of my sacrifice to him. My internal Bel is out, calling on the demonic to help us endure this torture.

It seems as if every cell in my body is in agony, is on fire, as the needles pull and stretch nerve and skin and flesh. Sweat is streaming over my body. After what seems like days, but is only hours, I am finally lowered and the needles and wires are slowly pulled out. I give a special sacrifice to Bel, placing the needles on an altar along with a child I have killed with a golden knife. I feel Bel within me, proud and arrogant, glad that he has shown his strength.

Everyone in the room bows in worship because Bel is a divine being and they are honoring his presence within me. Soon a young girl, my twin sister, dressed as Ashtarte, joins me on two golden thrones at one end of the room. A feast is given in our honor, a meal consisting of wonderful dainties and sweet drinks made of fermented honey. Afterwards, there is a sexual orgy. Many of the adults want to honor Bel with sexual activity with me, his current mortal representative. I am tired, and much, much later, my cult host, who has been called out after the activities are over, climbs into bed and falls immediately asleep. Tomorrow is a rest day, and I am glad, because being Bel has exhausted me emotionally, physically, and spiritually.

Druidic

I am five years old and I am in a remote part of Ireland. My spiritual trainer is with me, and we go into a small forest. The air is very humid with a fine mist. As we walk along a path lined with green, leafy plants, ferns and shrubs, he takes me to an area that is surrounded by very distinctive large rocks with runes on them. Because of my training, I can read the runes: they are a warning to others that this place is sacred to the druids, and outsiders who enter will be killed. Brogan, my trainer, is a druid as well as a Jesuit father, so he can enter this spot and not be harmed. He has been training me for years in the magic of the druids, and signs to me to join him in front of a very large, ancient looking tree in the center of the grove. This tree is huge, at least six feet thick, with twisting, distorted limbs.

I instinctively draw back a bit. I do not like this tree. I have a bad feeling about it. A smell of decay seems to emanate from the moist earth around it, and I have an unpleasant feeling that the tree is watching me. Brogan takes a long, thick rope and ties me to the tree's huge trunk, making sure that I cannot escape. This rope has been anointed with the blood of a sacrifice that we both did before coming to the grove.

"You must spend the night and live," Brogan tells me quietly. This reminds me uncomfortably of the rituals with Anubis and other beings. I realize that this will be a night that I will not sleep and will be tested yet again. "I have full confidence you can do this," he says, smiling at me, but I do not smile back. In some small part of my mind, I wonder why I must go through all of this testing, enduring terrible nights that nightmares are made of. I know I cannot tell Brogan this. Instead, I am silent and pale, and nod my understanding.

"Luce, I wish this was easier for you," he says. "I know this is hard, I do. I went through it myself." It is as if he can read my mind and my feelings, and I realize it is quite possible, with the spiritual bonds between us, that he can. Or, at least, he can pick up on what I am feeling from my body language which I cannot control completely when I am this frightened.

"I will be back for you at dawn," he says. "We will go out for a special breakfast then." I wish that I had his confidence that I will survive. This feels to me like one mean tree, and I don't look forward to being tested by it. I nod and say goodbye, and he quickly leaves.

I have a small canvas bag that contains the required hearts, livers and internal organs that this ancient tree prefers. Brogan has left my right arm partially free so that I can reach into the bag and grab an item as needed. But I cannot wiggle free. I have tested the strength of the ropes already, and I am no match for these inch-thick ropes that have been carefully tied, with the knots far out of my reach.

I sit and wait and wait. It feels like too much of my young life has been spent in waiting on capricious beings, who one moment are smiling and benevolent, but can quickly turn violent, angry, and even murderous. I reflect on how much of the time, our rituals and incantations are spent placating these beings in return for the small favors that they toss our way. Is it really worth it to travel to a remote place and look at documents or to travel back in time, if it means risking our lives or even our sanity to do so?

I think of the poor oracles of Rome, young women permanently chained to pedestals who go slowly insane from their job of giving oracles to all who walk into the dark places, the hidden places of the Vatican. I shudder at the thought. I never want to be an oracle of Rome. It takes a terrible price on the women selected to do so, and I am terrified of these wretched creatures who are chained naked to their pedestals whose hair becomes matted and whose finger and toe nails grow out in strange shapes. I have watched them eat like animals, growling, when they are fed bits of meat, bread and vegetables, or given water from special, dedicated urns, water that is mixed with a bit of blood from the daily sacrifice. I comfort myself with the thought that I have never heard of a child from a top class being assigned by the fathers to be an oracle. If the predictions of my trainers and the older children are correct, I will be in the top class next year.

Hours pass with these and other musings as the night sky darkens. There is no moon and the night is completely black, completely silent, with a growing oppression coalescing in the darkness. Suddenly, I hear a rustle, and a low, sinister voice speaks.

"Who are you child, and why are you here?"

The voice is speaking ancient Celtic, which I have learned in my mage classes. I respond in the same tongue, "I am here to learn from you, and to serve you," as I have been coached to say.

"And what does a mortal child want to learn from me?" the tree asks in a malignant tone.

I shudder a bit, and respond with the lines that Brogan and other mages have taught me. "I want to learn the secrets contained deep in the earth, the secrets of what the wind tells you when it whispers in your leaves, and the secret of long life, from one who has lived as long as you, ancient one."

The tree takes some time before it responds, as if thinking. Finally, it asks, "What will you give me for these secrets? For surely even one as young as you realizes that secrets come at a price – a dear price."

I reach with my one free hand into the bag, take out a child's heart, and throw it up towards the leaves of the tree. I hear a rustling in the leaves, and then a terrible sucking noise. After a while, the tree says, "Ask me one question. If it is a good one, I will answer. If not, I will take your life."

I then ask the tree a question that I have previously been told to ask by Brogan. The tree ponders, then answers me. This back-and-forth goes on for hours, with the tree demanding a sacrifice, and in return, answering the questions I have been coached to ask. Finally, at the end of the night, there are no more questions, and I have run out of sacrifices.

"And what will YOU give me?" the tree then asks malevolently.

I am terrified, and reply, "What do you ask?"

The tree reaches over with one of its woody, twiggy limbs, and painfully, terrifyingly, rapes me with it. I feel as if I am being torn apart inside, and wonder if I am dying. But a minute later, Brogan returns, and the tree stops what it is doing. I look up and see that the sky is turning light in the early dawn.

The tree has turned back into a tree, with no voice, no movement. It is completely, utterly still in the center of this grove where the tree lives.

"I knew you would make it," says Brogan in a hearty voice. He takes a careful look at me, since I don't respond, and places a hand on my shoulder. "I'm going to untie you, and we will leave here," he says.

He unties me, coiling the huge rope into a backpack that he leaves for another to carry out. He then bends, and gently picks me up, realizing that I am unable to walk. I am bleeding between my legs, but the blood loss is not great. It is my mind and spirit that are in shock. I am unable to process what I have just been through and need time to recover from it. In spite of my years of spiritual training so far, this has traumatized me deeply, and Brogan realizes this.

He carries me like a small child in his arms, murmuring, "I love you, and I am glad you made it. I am proud of you." I am glad that I made it, too, and fall asleep, exhausted, as he carries me to a waiting vehicle that will take me to a warm room at a private estate. I will sip hot, sweetened tea and rest for a day before I fly back to Rome with Brogan. A major part of my druid training is almost complete, and I am glad that it is over.

Ancients

I am five years old. I am in a dark part of a large wood in Germany, in an area known for its bogs and huge trees. There is a part of these woods where centuries ago, faces were carved into the ancient trunks of trees. These faces have been re-shaped and chiseled over the years and look startlingly lifelike. Only authorized visitors are allowed in this part of the Black Forest. Intruders kept out by security guards and other measures. A few unfortunate ones end up "stumbling" into peaty bogs where their bodies are sucked deep within, and they are never heard from again.

I am here with Father Jerome to do a ritual before we travel further to some hills. At the hills, we will visit the cave where Grunwald and Grenalyn, two of the ancients, live. I have been taught that these two giants have held up the world since it began. Grunwald goes out daily, seeking prey, to bring back to Grenalyn, his ancient wife who sits continuously stirring her cauldron and adding the flesh and bones of this prey to it.

We travel to the hilly area. After walking around the hills, I shudder as these hills feel forbidding. Finally, Father Jerome and I come to a large cave located on the side of a hill. There is a tunnel-like entrance, and I can smell the unmistakable odor of boiling human flesh wafting out from within the cave. I have smelled it numerous times during my mage training over the past few years. Littered around the entrance, I see the yellowish bones of unfortunate humans who have been caught by Grunwald. I wish fervently that we could leave this dreadful place.

However, I have learned to unfailingly obey my spiritual mentors, and Jerome wants us to be here today. "You are going inside" he says. I look into the dark, menacing opening, and hesitate. I really, really don't want to go in there, but I know that as part of my spiritual training, I must.

I take a deep breath, and enter the low, narrow, dark opening. As I go in, I see the glow of a fire ahead. I hear the hiss of water boiling and steaming, and the sickening smell fills the entrance. I walk more and more slowly, but finally, I am in a large, cavernous cave whose ceiling rises many feet up. The only light comes from a fire beneath a large cauldron, and from a few candles on stone ledges in this rocky room.

There are two large beings in the cave. They look almost like the rock that their dwelling is made of, with huge gray-green arms and legs like bent pillars as they huddle over the boiling stew. They have large, human-looking heads and faces. I can see a few human bones sticking out of the cauldron. The two gigantic figures look at me with malevolent, black eyes that almost glow with hatred.

"Who are you, mortal child?" the larger, male giant asks. "What gives you the audacity to come into my dwelling?"

Trembling, I answer as Jerome and the other mage mentors have taught me. "I am seeking to learn how to become immortal, like you, and have brought gifts to you, for I have heard of your wisdom." Somehow, in these encounters with immortals, I must always be humble, obeisant, and always, always bring gifts; this seems to be a rule of the encounters.

While his eyes are still malevolent, the giant man, Grunwald, looks with more interest at me. "I see that you have been taught by those older and wiser than you, human child," he says. "If they had not taught you, you would be in this stew right now."

A loud cackle emerges from the female giant, Grenalyn, his wife. "As skinny as you are, you wouldn't add much, but it is often the young ones that have the most tender meat." She is sniffing the air, and to my horror, I realize that she is smelling my blood. I act quickly before she decides to pitch me to the stew.

I say, "I have brought you gifts that I was told you might enjoy," as I lift a small infant that is alive and wiggling, in my hands. I hold it towards the two giants, and Grunwald examines it, sniffing it in the same manner that Grenalyn had been sniffing the air before.

"This one has pure blood. It would make a fine addition to our meal," he says. Grenalyn moves next to him, sniffs the infant, and nods. She takes the infant and puts it into the boiling water. We hear its screams that are silenced as it dies. Grunwald and Grenalyn close their eyes in pleasure as the infant is slowly boiled in the thick stew.

"I like your gift, so I will not kill you," says Grunwald. "The infant screamed well before it died. It made a good sound." I am horrified at the pleasure that this giant takes in pain and suffering, and at the same time relieved that I will be allowed to live.

Grunwald then asks, "What do you want to learn about becoming an immortal?"

I respond with the question my mentors had coached me to ask, "How may a human enter the depths of the earth, and mine the precious metal questral without dying?" The fathers know that there are metals deep in the earth that could be used to create the new materials necessary for some of the technologies that they wanted to develop.

Grunwald looks thoughtful, and responds, "A question like this requires an added gift. Do you have one?"

Fortunately, the mages were prepared for this. I bring out a second infant from my bag, which undergoes the same inspection and sniffing as the first one. Finally, both giants nod, add it to the stew, and close their eyes with pleasure as they hear its dying screams.

I am feeling increasingly uncomfortable here, in the presence of these dangerous creatures, and I want to leave as soon as possible. As the fathers want the answer to this question though, I force myself to remain despite the deepening oppression. In spite of the candles, it seems darker in here than when I first entered the cave.

"To go into the earth, you must find the correct gates – you mortals call them portals – and do the correct ceremony to enter," Grunwald says. He then draws a picture on the dirt floor of the cave of the location of the portals which I memorize and will draw later for Father Jerome and Father Mattheo. He tells me the words of the incantation and describes the ritual that will allow a human being to go through the portal and find the treasured metal.

"You must never fail to give a gift to the guardians of the portals, both when you enter and when you leave, or they will shut the doors and you will be buried alive," he cautions. "You must also bring a gift to Teklon, the guardian of this metal deep within the earth."

I memorize his instructions, knowing that the lives of any who attempt this mining depend on my remembering fully and accurately. Fortunately, I have recorder parts, developed and programmed since I was an infant, who can record all visual and auditory details. They will later come out, and share with the fathers everything that they saw, heard, felt, and experienced. I will also share the same, and the fathers will compare what we both say to ensure accuracy.

I turn to leave, and Grunwald says in a deep voice "You are fortunate indeed, mortal child, to be allowed to leave my home. Many mortals come to visit and remain forever." I feel a chill down my spine at the threat in his voice as Grenalyn cackles next to him. I realize that he enjoys frightening me, but it does not stop the instinctual fear that I feel in the presence of this being who I suspect would rather see me dead than alive.

I also wonder, once I am outside the tunnel, where Father Jerome greets me with joy in his voice, why Grenalyn is willing to share this information with me. Why would he give me something that would help us mortals? I wonder. And so, I ponder these and other questions about the metal and the technology that will be developed from it. I wonder if it will really be "good" and for mankind's benefit, as I have been told. These creatures do not seem to want to be helpful at all.

I know that for some, the experiences of Jesuit spiritual training will sound unbelievable. However, to me, these experiences were very real indeed.

These memories are one reason why I talk more about my faith in my recent writings than I had in my original svali posts twenty years ago. As I went deeper into my own healing journey, I recovered memories like these and they filled my little parts with fear. They truly believed that if I remembered, 'the demons will eat us', among other horrors. I needed to find someone, something, that was the direct opposite of these creatures, someone who was loving and could protect me from them.

I found that someone in my faith in the God of the Bible, and His son, Jesus Christ. The kind of love that is caring, protective, and provided the nurture and compassion – and mercy – that I never experienced in the terribly legalistic world of the occult, where rules broken meant death, or at the least, torture. I have been amazed that the true God is not like this at all; that He is not 'performance- based', but instead, freely offered me life.

I would never, ever have had the courage to share these memories publicly otherwise. When I do so, my desire is not to glorify evil', but to show that it is possible to break free from the deepest depths of fear and bondage to such evil. I hope that those from a similar background will recognize that by sharing these things, I am breaking the "vows and oaths of secrecy" that those who become ascended masters make. Yet, in contradiction to their threats and indoctrination, I am alive and less tormented than I have ever been in my life.

I will be honest about having struggled with whether it is okay to break these vows and oaths made during childhood and adulthood. Isn't a promise a promise, and aren't I "wicked and faithless" to be breaking my promises by revealing these things? However, I now believe that these promises to never tell were made under coercion, and these creatures and the adults who coerced my promise to such evil do not deserve loyalty. Promises made to liars who ask for them for evil purposes can and should be broken.

The beings I encountered were universal in their desire for sacrifice, obedience, and worship. They were trying to pre-empt a god role from the human beings (like me) who foolishly sought their "help" or to converse with them. The story I am sharing is the result of this misguided belief, passed on through generations of the Jesuit Order and other occult societies that these fallen angels want to help humans. No, they do not! They only want to destroy human beings, I can say this completely and unequivocally, based upon my own encounters.

The question will be raised, "But can these demons really take on physical form?" I only report my own experiences. I do believe the Bible also illustrates this possibility in its accounts of angels taking on physical manifestation that are visible to human beings with their natural eyes. Examples include when God was sharing his plans with Abraham regarding Sodom and Gomorrah, the angels who physically manifested when rescuing Lot and his family from destruction, and the chorus of angels that were seen and heard in Bethlehem two millennia ago, declaring the birth of Jesus to shepherds. If good angels who are not fallen can manifest, why shouldn't fallen angels also be able to? These are just some issues for thought that I am raising here; I am not a theologian. Most importantly, however, I have come to believe in a loving God whose authority is greater than the evil I encountered as a child. He is more than able to send them away with one breath, or through one word spoken by a believer in the true Jesus with His authority.

I am now going to address the issue of alien encounters as a possible interpretation of these experiences that I have shared. I do NOT believe that these creatures are "aliens". I do realize that beliefs on this topic can differ greatly, and I am only sharing my own belief. I do not believe that these are a technologically advanced, evil race that is enslaving mankind. I have encountered them, and they are spirits, demons or fallen angels who have tried to turn mankind against the true God of the Bible. I am aware that people have memories of encounters with aliens. I do have memories of meeting "aliens", being abducted by them, being invited to visit them, and so on. However, these memories have always eventually been revealed to be staged trickery: studios that were the 'alien spaceships' and the aliens I encountered were cult members dressed in costumes. In my programming, these alien memories were installed as a smokescreens or distractions to 'real' cult memories, i.e., if presenters started to have any cult-related memories that they did not immediately deny or forget, they were then supposed to attribute the memories to 'alien activity'.

Theo

I am three years old. I am sitting on a stone bench in a beautiful indoor garden located near the Vatican. Although we call it the Vatican Garden, it is located outside of the Vatican itself. It is large and filled with trees, shrubs, and flowers, and sunlight filters down from a large glass roof above. I love it here, and the sweet perfume of the flowers fills the air.

Mattheo has brought me here and has told me to wait on the bench. He leaves. A short time later, an extremely handsome young man appears who looks like he is in his early 20s appears. He is dressed in a black tuxedo with a snow white shirt and black tie, a top hat, and white gloves. He sits next to me and takes off his hat. His jet black hair comes to a widow's peak at the top of his forehead. I know who this is because I have had glimpses of him before at various times during the past few years. This is Theo, the beautiful form of Satan; I know that he can also take on a hideous, frightening form during rituals.

"Hello, Lucient," he says with a smile. I smile back. He is charming and quite seductive in a strange way that has nothing to do with sex. I feel his fascinating attraction. "I'm glad that we can meet together today." I love this special attention and smile some more. "You do know, don't you, that you are very special to me?" he says. "You are very gifted, and one day you will do great things for me." He pulls me towards him and gives me a kiss on my lips.

Then, he releases me. Suddenly, beautiful glass bubbles that reflect the light in rainbow colors appear in his hands. I am awed and amazed, as effortlessly, he juggles these bubbles, first one, then two, then three, four, five, six. They float up, then come down, seeming as light as soap bubbles but much sturdier. "Would you like to touch one?" he offers.

I eagerly reach out and touch the glass, it is so beautiful. I wonder how he can possibly juggle them without a single one falling or breaking. I have seen juggling before, but nothing like this, as these delicate, shimmering objects continue to seemingly float gently upwards and then down.

Theo then turns around and juggles the glass objects behind his back! He doesn't even need to see them to juggle them! I am mesmerized as I watch. Finally, he stops and lets me hold one in my lap as we talk.

"Lucient, I will be asking you to do some very hard things for me during the next few years," he says. His teeth are very white and his skin is pale. He is very handsome and somehow endearing to my heart, which wants to be loved. His look is very loving.

"At times, you won't understand what I will ask, but can you believe that I love you, and want what is best for you?"

I nod. Yes, I can believe him, although I feel a bit uneasy as well, for a reason that I can't quite define.

"Will you show me that you love me?" he asks. Suddenly, I know what he wants.

On the stone paver in front of him, I kneel and bow down, and worship him. He places his hand on my head, and then gets up and disappears. He vanishes into thin air, and I wonder if I have been dreaming. But next to me, on the ground, is a small glass object that reflects the sun like a rainbow. I pick it up wonderingly, and take it to Mattheo who is in his private office.

Mattheo seems pleased. "He favored you with a gift," he says. "I will keep it safe for you here." He unlocks a cabinet in his office and places the glass ball into it. He and I both know that until I am a father, I am not allowed to keep anything that I own, except for medals and a candle, in the dorm room which I share with other children my age. I am happy, because Mattheo is happy, and he takes me out for a gelato, spending special time together as an added reward.

Satan's Throne

I am just a few months older, and I am in the room beneath the Vatican, on a level securely hidden from public access, where Satan's throne is located. The elevators to this level are carefully hidden. No one without using the correct biometric security and codes, which are changed daily, can enter here.

It is many, many levels beneath the public areas. I have visited here before many times during the past three years, watching as penitents and those seeking favors crawl on their knees across shards of glass in order to approach Satan on his throne. He demands this type of act, supposedly to show humility and how much a petitioner really wants what they ask for. Sometimes, he changes the approach to his throne, putting hot stones there, and other objects that inflict pain.

Many people come to this throne room, accompanied by the fathers, including world leaders, and heads of occultic organizations. They line the walls of the room, waiting patiently.

Today is different from the other times I have visited this place. I am sitting in Satan's lap, on the huge, golden throne at the end of the painful pathway. Satan is in his hideous form, and is huge, dark, and frightening in appearance.

A petitioner, a government head, comes towards the throne. He brings a large heart-shaped ruby and a human heart in a golden casket. On his hands and knees, bowing, he opens the casket, and says, "I have a petition to ask, master."

Satan takes this act of worship and the sacrifice as his due. He enjoys watching people groveling before him, and enjoys the numerous sacrifices done earlier in the day to please him before his appearance. Sitting on his lap, I feel this pleasure, too. I am half hidden in the dark, almost cloud-like density of his being.

"What is your petition?" I hear Satan think it, but it is my mouth that opens and voices the question. It is as if Satan and I are someone joined, and I can speak what he is thinking. It feels odd, somewhat filthy, but also very powerful, and very confusing. I am a small child, but here is a leader of a country listening to me because I am representing Satan to him.

I am not the only child to do this. It is part of our training in the Order. This is considered a huge honor and an important responsibility. The fathers have prepared me over the previous weeks for this day, helping me to do the required sacrifices and teaching me how to prepare myself to be a "worthy vessel". Even though I am still young, I am advancing in my theta and omega training, and the mages feel I am ready to do this.

The petitioner keeps his head down, and asks, "I would like to see the downfall of a major enemy." He mentions a warring faction in his country, one that would like to put him out of leadership. "I would like these individuals who are its leaders put to death in a way that makes them an example to the other members of his faction."

This is not an unusual request. People come to Satan asking for wealth, wisdom, and other things, but the most common request is power, whether that power is political, spiritual or in another realm of influence. I have seen church leaders come here and bow, as well as men and women of all ages. The one common thing is that they are all willing to painfully crawl before Satan, bow down, and bring him a sacrifice. Without fail, they are all occultists of a high degree, who are familiar with this dark spiritual reality and willing to pay the price – part of their humanity – in return for a favor.

I listen intently as the man speaks, then hear a whisper in my head. "What do you think should be done?" Satan is asking me what I think. I am surprised and a little terrified. What if I make a mistake? "Give him his request, in return for a yearly tithe of money and people, including children," I think back.

"Very good" Satan thinks in my head. Then, he is thinking very loudly indeed, and the words come out in my childish voice in unison with his. "You will be granted your petition, but on one condition: I require a yearly tithe of your income, which can include the price for young children who can be brought to me instead of part of the money," I proclaim in a loud voice. "Do you agree to this demand?" The petitioner nods his head, and then says softly, "I agree."

He turns around, still on hands and knees, and crawls back to the wall to stand next to the other petitioners who line it. Not all will be seen today, and many will return another day. One after another, Satan and I listen and pronounce his judgments and thoughts regarding each.

By the late afternoon, I am weary and feel that if this goes on much longer, I will faint. It would not do to faint off of Satan's throne, but it is very, very hard and very, very horrible to sit here engulfed by him. I am fascinated that these world leaders are coming and bowing and crawling to Satan, but I am also sick of doing this.

Suddenly, Father Mattheo, who is a top general in the Jesuit army, announces that there will be no more petitions, to my great relief. The petitioners lining the walls bow, and leave, with quiet dignity. Mattheo beckons to me, and dazed, I get off of the large golden throne, and go to him. He holds me in his arms in a hug, and takes me to his private office, where I will lie down on a couch and be brought a meal of soft puddings and liquids. All the while, he is telling me how proud he is of me, how much he loves me. Even so, I feel so very dirty inside, completely defiled. I wonder if I will ever feel clean again.

I understand that these experiences will sound unbelievable to some. Satan appearing in the form of a beautiful young man and talking to a young child? Satan appearing in a hideous form, sitting on a regular basis on a throne under the Vatican? Seriously? I am only sharing what I saw and experienced here. But as I noted previously, I do believe that demons can manifest physically at times especially in situations where they are receiving worship and other things they love best, such as seeing human beings tortured and killed. Whether this was actually "Satan" or another spirit sitting there could certainly be debated, though.

What I do know is that these creatures are absolutely cruel, and their desire is to use people to accomplish what they want on the earth. This includes infiltrating the highest levels of governance in many areas. Demons cannot destroy mankind without mankind's cooperation, which is what they are trying to gain through the misguided obedience of the occultists around the world. This type of evil only has power when people seek and submit themselves to it. When people say "No!" to it and place their faith in the God of the Bible and His Son, these dark creatures lose all power. They are then thwarted in their plans. THIS is why I talk about Christianity so much on my blog and in my interviews. I want people to know that regardless of how evil on earth tries to manifest, God is the answer who brings freedom from the fear that this type of experience can instill in children and adults.

Chapter 5: Other Memories

Being programmed to be a 'presenter'

From early infancy, the programmers created and trained a specific group of parts: the presenters. These are parts that are tasked with presenting in various countries outside of the facility. The fathers design the 'life story' of each presentation according to the needs of the cult. They decide which countries the presentation will live in and where, who their 'families' will be, and the presenter's personality traits and abilities. For instance, while my cult host was extremely athletic, my American presentation was programmed to be clumsy and slow, and to completely believe that she was naturally clumsy and slow.

Presenters are carefully programmed to have no memories of cult life, and to only have memories of an ordinary life with no cult activity in the respective families and countries that they lived in. They are also programmed to be unaware of other parts, and to believe that they are the entire person. Presenters enable the cult-raised, dissociative person with many parts to seem like an ordinary non-dissociative person when interacting with people outside the cult. Alice in Wonderland programming (see chapter 3) is one of the main programs used to control the presenters.

Presentation parts are created through trauma. The programmers than carefully provide the experiences that will teach each presenter part their 'identities' and 'lives' in their respective families and countries. "Rooms" are set up in the programming studios that look just like the rooms in the houses that the presenter will eventually live in with their 'family' in these countries. The cult members who will play the 'father', 'mother', and siblings' of the respective presentations will interact with the respective presenters by name in these rooms. These experiences create early memories of being in these 'families' for the presenters. Various normal, culturally appropriate family scenarios common for babies and toddlers, e.g., first birthday cake, are staged and photographs of these events are taken. These activities build an authentic seeming life story with evidence such as baby photographs for the presenters. The cult creates complete cover biographies for each presentation in their respective countries.

A very important part of presenter programming is teaching them to only have the abilities (e.g., language skills) that would be expected for a child from that country. For example, when an American, Canadian, or UK presenter was out, I only heard and was allowed to speak in English with the appropriate accent for that country. If I spoke Italian, Latin, French, or German in an English-speaking presentation, I was tortured heavily, and then sent to "hell", staged scenarios where again, I would be tortured. In this "hell", the presenter would be told she had caused the whole system to become more mortal and less immortal, or to "descend". I felt absolute terror as a presenter in these "hell" scenes, and was relieved when "Satan" or another "divine being" would come and rescue me upon my promise to never forget again and to accept a demonic spirit to ensure permanent barriers between systems. The divine being (an older cult member dressed in a costume, but at times, what seemed to be a real spiritual entity when I was older) would then take me to an altar to do a sacrifice and escort me out of "hell" and back into the presentation setting.

After a few terrifying experiences of "hell", I never forgot again. I have lived with a lifelong fear of going to hell while in my presentations. I could never quite understand this, since the presenter families I was raised in were not religious. All the presentations, including the American, UK, French, German, Russian and Israeli ones, went through such programming until the amnesia barriers between presentations were complete. Presenters are even programmed with amnesia barriers to prevent them from dreaming about one another, or seeing one another's dreams during sleep. Upon hearing special tones, seeing a specific code pattern, and seeing visually one of my primary trainers, I could switch out any of the nationalities desired, and this part would have absolutely no knowledge that I had fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, aunts, uncles and friends in other countries.

At the age of three, I began being hosted and living in these various families around the world for two or three weeks at a time each year, rotating presentations with three or four other Jesuit children who looked just like me, genetically identical sisters, including Lizzie. These children had been programmed with the same presentation as I had, and were capable of looking and sounding like the cover person they and I were supposed to be in each one. It helped that many of my programmers in the group I was infiltrating (the Illuminati) were also Jesuit fathers, and so they were able to help maintain the cover. In order to maintain the cover when needed, the families would sometimes have an infant or toddler that looked like me to live with them in the presentations before my own hosting started proper at three years old.

While I lived 12 weeks a year in several different presentations, rotating through various presentations and countries as commanded to by my trainers, I always spent most of the year in the facility in Rome. This is what I considered my real "home". This is where my main host Lucia (the cult host) could relax and be myself the most, and where I was able to see my twin brother and sister, my classmates, and the fathers I loved most. Because I was dissociative, I felt no confusion. When a French, Israeli, or other presenter was not out, there was no felt loss of time for several reasons. They had learned very early on to go and stay in Wonderland (see chapter 3), in the area where the presentation language was spoken (overseen by "Alice", a strict controller, along with various punishers such as the Jabberwocky).

It can be difficult to understand how parts can be hosted in different countries, while still spending most of their "real" (cult) life in a facility or occultic training school. This is one reason why the Jesuits raise several children at a time who look identical, who have the same presenters programmed into their system. Having several children who look alike at one time is not difficult for the Order to produce due to their genetics program. For instance, the Order would have four children who are capable of presenting as 'Jane Dupont' (not a real presenter name) in Virginia, USA. They carefully schedule where these children will be at any time, so that there can be one child in the presentations when needed, while the others are in the cult facilities or other places. The other children will be given 'updates' on what each one is doing while presenting so that the narratives remain seamless between the different children with the same presentations. For these updates, the presenters are called out in the labs and watch videos of what the other children programmed to have the same presentations were doing when in France, Italy, etc., in order to add their memories to their own. They are programmed to believe that these videos are their actual memories.

Many highly organized occult societies also have more than one presentation for each person and use twins or other lookalike siblings to cover the presentation roles. For instance, members of the Illuminati are also often programmed to present in several countries, such as the United States, Germany and France. As they know that the same child or twins are playing these multiple roles, the Illuminati would only expect the child or the other children to be in one presentation at a time. E.g., one twin may be at a training facility while the other is presenting in France as an 'ordinary child', while the German and USA roles are left empty for the time being. Because everyone in these children's families is also cult-involved, the parents or family friends in Germany and the USA will not even notice that the child is absent and will have 'memories' of the child being continuously there.

This made it simpler for the Jesuits when they were infiltrating the Illuminati because they would only need to schedule for a child (or their identical siblings) to be in one Illuminati presentation at a time. Their identical siblings can then be in training at the cult facilities or in other non-Illuminati presentations at the same time. But even when programmed to have parts that present in other countries, always the child will believe deep within that their real life is at "home" – the cult training facility.

Learning to do sacrifices

One part of the training that we all underwent, starting very young, was to do sacrifices properly. There was a science and an art to it, and since earliest infancy, our little hands had been led by adults in the proper procedure. By the age of three, we had to be able to hold a ritual knife correctly and stab a sacrifice in the proper spot without hesitation. As we got older, the expectations became greater, until by age ten, we could do all the sacrifices correctly for a major ritual, including skinning and torturing the victim when required.

But there was another type of sacrifice that was especially horrifying, one that was used as a severe punishment.

I am three and half years old, and have disobeyed Mattheo again, making him angry. He had told me to torture a homeless person to death by peeling off all of his skin. This is part of my training in torture methods, and I must learn this and other methods of torture if I want to join the Torturers Guild when I am older, fathers who are highly respected for their skills in torture. For some reason, today I was sick of hurting others, and in a rare surge of saying what I wanted, I said “No!”

This was unthinkable, of course, and I knew that I would be punished, and would probably go to hell for my disobedience. Guilt flooded me, but I still refused to pick up the skinning knife. Mattheo commanded me to torture the man again, and then with rage in my eyes, I did not skin the homeless man; I stabbed him through the heart, ensuring a quick and much more painless death than he would have endured if I had skinned him. But I was also looking Mattheo in the eyes when I stabbed the man, and he saw the unspoken meaning in my act.

Now, I knew I was in real trouble, but if he killed me, so what? I was sick of hearing people scream in slow, agonizing pain. I am trembling inside but struggled not to show it.

Instead of physically punishing me, Father Mattheo takes me into another part of the training school, to a room that contains the small children who are considered “expendable”, those used for various rituals. “I want you to find a child that looks like you. I will make you come back for two others if you don’t do this,” he says.

I go into the room, filled with children in cages, and after looking, I see a three-year-old with brown, curly hair and brown eyes. While not exactly like me, she is the closest I can find. I take her out of the cage, talking softly to her, and lead the terrified little girl by the hand down the hall. She and I follow Mattheo down a corridor into another hall. In the center of the hall is a large, round pit covered with a metal cover. I feel sick inside. I know what lives down deep inside that pit and I taste the bile in my throat that rises.

This time, I obey. I slide the cover off. I can hear the noises from below: first a loud rustling noise, then a chorus of squeaks that send chills down my spine. Down below, the pit is filled with rats specially bred for largeness of size; rats that are hungry. Rats are one of my prime terrors, instilled in me as an infant when Father Carlotti had held a rat over me, and let it bite my hand. This terror was reinforced over the past three years with upsetting scenarios.

I hate rats, and this noise fills me with an unspeakable horror.

“Throw the child down into the pit,” Mattheo tells me.

I hesitate, but I know that if I do not, I will be lowered into the pit and the rats allowed to scramble over my feet and bite at me. I can’t endure that thought. I push her in and she falls in screaming. Her screams continue as the rats scramble and crawl over her. The screams go on and on, until suddenly they are silenced.

"This is what happens to little children who disobey" Mattheo says sternly. "She paid the price for your sin today; but if you sin again, you will have to go into the pit yourself."

I feel shaken with horror and guilt at the thought that my disobedience has caused another child to die in such a terrible way. I feel despair as I realize that I would not say "No" to skinning someone again. My lesson has been learned: there are worse horrors than hearing someone scream.

What made the lesson especially difficult is that Mattheo was a father figure to me, the person I loved most on earth; whose love and attention I craved. Confused, I wonder how such a loving and wise man could force me to do an act like this. He lets me go, and I am given two hours off to think things over, before returning to my regular training schedule.

That night, I have nightmares about squeaking rats trying to climb up out of a pit, rats that want to bite me. I wake up screaming, and Mary Margaret, who sleeps in my dorm room, comes into my bed and holds me for a while.

Learning to Play Chess

I am five years old, sitting in a large, cushioned chair. Across from me sits one of the three fathers I love best, Father Jerome. He is teaching me how to play a special form of chess. While I already know how to play a basic game, he, an accomplished chess master, is going to work with me on my spiritual training at this special chessboard.

First, he sets up the board, using beautiful pieces carved from pure white ivory and pure black onyx. The kings look like real kings, the queens are beautiful royal ladies in long dresses; the knights look like medieval knights, the pawns like young pages, and the rooks like hunched creatures.

Jerome warns me, "Be sure not to touch any of the pieces while we play." I am an obedient pupil and watch as he uses his mind only to move one of the black pawns forward onto the next square.

"Try to do this, but only move a white pawn. The white pieces are easier to control than the black ones," Jerome tells me. "Use your mind and think about the pawn moving where you want it to go. Be sure to only try to move it one square."

I try to move a white pawn. One budges, edging forward. Excited, I realize that I can play this game, too. Without caution, I try to move other white pieces. Suddenly, the white king, queen and knights turn around, snarling at me, and fly towards me, attacking me.

I scream as they lunge at my throat. I can feel the terrible pain of their biting and scratching me with their sharp, cold edges. I hear a command, "Stop!" from Father Jerome. The white pieces stop and go back to their places on the board.

I feel shaken and terrified. I realize that this game is dangerous. "It is very difficult to control the pieces, especially for those without much training," Father Jerome warns me. I have already experienced this fact. "Never, ever attempt to try something for which you are not spiritually prepared yet," he says. "This game is part of your mage training and will take great work, and concentration and practice to do well. One day, you will be able to control all pieces on the board, even the black ones." I listen to the rules that I will follow, in order to avoid attacks like the one I just suffered.

Jerome continues, "You are only to play for the next few years with my or another father's supervision". I readily agree, having seen what can happen if I can't control these pieces. Jerome then takes all the white pieces off of the board except for one white pawn and says "We will start here." At the end of an hour, I can move the white pawn one square in any direction, and he praises me. It has taken all of my concentration to learn to do this. I feel exhausted, physically and mentally.

When I am older, Father Jerome will teach me to play a full game. The winner can then ask the chess board a question, and the answer will light up at the end of the winner's side, in silver or gold script. This is considered a high form of mage craft which will take me many years to learn. But one day, I hope to become an ascended master like Father Jerome and playing this game is part of the training process to become one.

The German Father's House

My programming was also intended to help me infiltrate the Illuminati. My biological mother was a Jesuit whose roots were with the German Illuminati. In fact, she was the mistress of Philip Battenberg in Germany for several years. In my cover story, I was his illegitimate child. Therefore, I spent holidays and high ritual days in Germany. I rotated this role with Lizzie and two other sisters, with my mother and others in the Jesuits helping to cover for my occasional absences with plausible explanations.

The Battenbergs were cold, sadistic people and I hated going there. I was called "the bastard" by the legitimate children, who felt that I was permissible to abuse and torment, but not to actually kill. Nonetheless, I had to talk my way out of several close calls as a child.

They had a large, dank, cold basement area under their family castle that was enormous, with a large medieval looking stone altar at one end. I was forced to participate in the rituals and had been carefully coached on how to survive my visits there (and not end up being fed to these demons by the members of the family) by the fathers, prior to my visits.

I remember being very young, about age three during one visit. My biological mother was dressed in a designer gown, looking beautiful, just before a large ballroom event. She let me watch as one of the family came and opened up a huge walk-in vault containing the family jewels, using biometric security. The dark blue velvet casings covering each wall were filled with necklaces, bracelets, pendants, earrings and other jewelry made of diamonds, emeralds, rubies, sapphires, pearls and other jewels. She put on a brilliantly flashing diamond necklace and matching earrings for the event. Later, I peeked over the stone bannister leading downstairs and caught glimpses of the men and women dressed in formal wear. Ladies were in flowing dresses and men were in evening suits, while they danced to a live orchestra. The women looked like exotic butterflies as they were twirled around.

I am just a few weeks older. The night before there was a terrible ritual, and I decide to run away. I want to escape this terrible house. Since I am still quite young, my running involves fleeing into the woods that surround the German father's (Philip's) castle, running over fallen leaves, going down a stream, and then going up to the opposite shore and hiding up in a tree. I hope that the piney branches that I am sitting behind will hide me.

Within a few hours, I am missed. I can tell because I hear the sound of dogs baying and the voices of the German father's servants as they search for me. I am trembling, heart pounding. But the dogs pick up my scent, the servants find me, and they drag me back, shaking and upset at being found. I am thrown down at Battenberg's feet.

"Never, ever run away" the German father tells me in a cold, quiet tone that brooks no disobedience. "I will show you why doing this is a very bad idea."

He then takes me outside where a child my age has been tied to a tree at the edge of the woods. He takes a golden whistle hanging on a golden chain around his neck and blows an eerie pattern on it. Within a few minutes, large silver and black wolves come running up.

There is something strange about these wolves. They have red, oddly intelligent eyes.

As the German father and I stand there, he gives a signal with his hand, and the wolves bound over eagerly to the child that is tied up. They tear into the screaming child with their fangs and sharp claws. The screams continue for a time until they are silenced. The wolves continue their gruesome meal.

Afterwards, to my utter amazement, the wolves stand up on two legs, and turn into young men who salute the German father, and then walk back into the woods. "I have special guards over my property" he explains to me, "very hungry guards." I am stunned, as I contemplate the unbelievable scene I have just seen. "You are very young and foolish, so I will let this pass this time," he continues. "But should you ever try to escape again, I will call my wolves to take care of you." As I look into his eyes, I realize that take care really means kill. I never tried to run away from the castle again.

I am just a bit older, around four years old. I have been carefully tutored for the past year in etiquette and how to act like a "little lady" by a strict German tutor. Today, I am allowed to sit at the table with the German father and his guests. The plates, silverware and even the flower bowls and candle holders are of pure, softly shining gold. At this young age, I feel overwhelmed and anxious, and when reaching for my glass of milk, a glass that is made of beautiful cut crystal, I accidentally spill the milk, and the cup turns onto its side.

There is a horrified silence at the table, as all the guests turn to look at Battenberg, who is seated at the head of the table. He looks at me with rage. "If you act like a dog at my table, you will be treated as a dog!" he yells. He commands servants to come, saying "Strip her and put a collar on her!"

I am stripped naked, and a lavishly jeweled dog collar is placed around my neck. One of the servants snaps a golden, silken cord to the collar. Battenberg looks at me with angry eyes, and says, "For the rest of the evening, you will be a dog. You will stay down on your hands and feet and will be treated as you deserve."

During the rest of the dinner, I crawl on my hands and knees. "Bark like a dog!" he orders, and humiliated, I do so. I know better than to disobey him. "Beg for your food like a dog!" he orders, and I sit on my haunches and beg like a canine. He then throws me a tiny piece of bread, and his guests titter with amusement.

I feel enraged, humiliated, and shamed beyond belief, but do not dare show these emotions in front of this dangerous man. Instead, I play my role to perfection, even wagging my rear to the laughter of the guests. Maybe if I am cute enough, I will live.

After dinner, the German father gives another order. "Bring in the dogs; since she is a dog, she should spend time with her little playmates."

The dogs are brought in, and they sexually abuse me in front of the guests for their amusement. I am feeling sick and faint but cannot show that I am near collapse. Finally, finally, I am allowed to flee to my room in another part of the palace.

Later, when my mother and I are alone, I yell "I hate him! I hate him! How can you stand to be near him!" My mother holds me, and comforts me.

“You are lucky to be alive,” she tells me. “Other children your age often do not survive this type of event. The only reason Philip spared your life is that you are my daughter, and I am his current favorite mistress. He knows how much you mean to me.” I go still with the realization that I came so close to death this night.

“Never believe that you aren’t expendable, regardless of your rank or status,” she warns me. “Always act with caution around these people.” Still pouting, I agree. But while I will externally act well, internally I will continue to hate these people who have treated me so badly. This is how three-year-olds think, and I vow one day to take revenge when I am older.

A German Christmas

I am five years old. It is my turn to spend Christmas at the Battenberg palace. Lizzie and my other lookalike sisters are enjoying Christmas at the Vatican. I am outside with other children and adults. A large circle has been tramped in the deep snow, and in the center is a large deer with tan fur, and large brown eyes. The deer is trembling, its eyes wild, but it is carefully tied so that it cannot move, with gold and scarlet silken ropes.

One of the adults dressed in scarlet robes sticks the deer in the neck, and blood spatters onto the cold, white snow in a pumping fountain: the scarlet red against the white is startling, and the snow steams a little as the blood hits it. One by one, each of adults and children go forward, including me. A golden chalice has caught the deer’s blood, and we each take a drink from this cup.

Then, the deer is butchered while it is still twitching. Its heart is taken out and cut into small pieces, and we each eat one piece. As I continue watching, one young child, younger than me, is put into the deer in a baptism and rebirth ceremony, with incantations and ritual words chanted by the adults and other children throughout the ceremony. The child looks terrified and sickened by this experience, and I do not envy her the “high honor” she has been shown.

It is later in the day during the solstice, this same year. I am standing with a dozen other children indoors in a room in the German father’s castle. This room has a huge hearth, with a log burning in it that is the length and size of a man. As we stand there, a man enters the room, dressed in clothes similar to those seen at times on very old-fashioned Santa Clauses: he wears a long white robe with golden decorations, a white cap with white fur lining, a golden belt, and is carrying a large sack over his shoulder. In his hand he holds a golden scepter.

“I am Father Yule,” the white-bearded man with long silver white hair tells us. “I am able to tell which children have been good, obedient children this past year, and which have been bad children that don’t obey their elders.” As he slowly turns around the room and gazes at each of us, looking deep into our eyes, we tremble. None of us want to be the bad one, and thoughts of times I resented things my trainers asked of me flit through my mind.

Then, with a shout, Father Yule raises his scepter. A white light shoots out from it, and to my horror, one of the little boys standing near me falls down dead. “He was bad,” Father Yule proclaims. We children are all stunned and quiet, not daring to move or speak. “Who will help me put his body into the fire?” Yule asks. I didn’t want to do this, none of us do, but we also realize that not doing so would mark us as “bad”. We all quickly volunteer to help, and we all help to carry the little body and put it in the fire in the large hearth.

As the smell of roasting flesh fills the room, Father Yule then opens his sack, and gives each of us a small treat such as marzipan, for being good, helpful children. He then leaves, to my great relief. I realize that I never want to spend Christmas in Germany again. I suspect none of the other children want to, either. But the choice is not ours. My visits will be determined by the Jesuit trainers who fill the holiday schedules. But I also know that in three more days, I get to fly to Rome and enjoy Christmas there. The German father will be told that I am due to present in America, but Lizzie, my twin, will be filling that role.

Because the Jesuits were infiltrating the Illuminati, I had several Illuminati presentations (United States, France, Germany). My cover there was that I was the bastard daughter of Philip Battenberg. As an "Illuminati child", I had to spend time with both the French (Rothschild) family, and the German family, as well as build an identity as a skilled trainer in the United States. This ability to infiltrate them was aided by those who had gone before me: my "mother" in the United States was actually a Jesuit father. She had attained a high spiritual rank in the Illuminati. She was also the German father's mistress. Several of the U.S. trainers who worked with me (such as Timothy Brogan) were also actually Jesuit fathers. They could cover for me if I needed to be scheduled to be out of the country for a time, or if they needed to reinforce the strict barriers between my true (Jesuit) core, and the false core and parts created to be my Illuminati systems.

All the occultic societies try to infiltrate each other and learn their secrets. This is a given. What is amazing to me is the century and a half of patient work and development of impeccable identities that the Jesuits have given to their infiltration. This organization is very patient. When I first tried to leave the Illuminati in 1996, they had no idea that I was a Jesuit. Illuminati leadership wanted me not only stripped of my rank and humiliated publicly, but they wanted me killed in front of everyone. But an order from above said "No." The Jesuits didn't want me to die. I was flown to Rome for reprogramming, since at that time, much of my loyalty to Rome was still intact. But I was allowed to suffer greatly in my American, French and German presentations in order to placate the Illuminati leaders.

Chapter 6: Military and Academic Training

Starting School

I am six years old, and I and the other members of my class are excited on this very special day.

At last, we are going to give up our brown pre-school tunic and leggings that we have been wearing since we were three years old, and graduate to wearing the hooded brown robes with rope belts. These are the robes of an acolyte, the uniform that school-aged Jesuit children wear in the special school located north of Rome.

For years, as a preschooler in my little brown top and leggings, I watched the older children who went to school, grouped in classes of twelve each, when they sat in the dining facility together. They laughed and teased together, did pranks together, and were my heroes. Now, today, I get to wear the brown robe, and start attending the school myself!

At the ceremony later in the day, I and the other children getting ready to enter the school are all together, grouped by class. I am in the first class of twelve children, Dannie and Lizzie are in the second class, and I see others in the third and fourth class looking excited and happy. Father Jerome is on the platform in front of the large auditorium style room, and he calls my name. I walk towards him. He gives me a brown robe and rope belt; the brown fabric is soft in my arms and I carry it offstage. There, I take off my leggings and tunic, and put on the robe that I will be wearing for the next seven years.

One by one, the other children do the same. As we go back onto the stage, dressed in our robes, there is clapping and cheering, first from the older classes at the school, then by the fathers. The older children all look happy that we will be joining them in the school classes. Learning is very, very valued by the fathers, and this advancement to a new level of study is celebrated by all.

I feel proud in my robe, which makes me look like a miniature monk, as I go into the dining area and sit at my new table, a table that is on the side of the room where the "big kids" sit. I see all of the younger kids looking at me and my classmates with a mixture of joy and envy; they can't wait to wear a robe themselves. It represents a lot of hard work and training, to survive the programming and training of the past six years, and this robe reflects this achievement.

In this specialized school, my classmates and I will learn a large variety of subjects, with demanding standards of scholarship required. The courses will range from anatomy and physiology, to surgical and torture techniques; to ancient languages, to history, to political science, to mage craft, to sciences such as physics, and human behavior and psychology. There is also a daily gym period when we learn to climb ropes, do strengthening exercises, learn gymnastics to a more advanced level than before, and learn more advanced martial arts than we did when we were preschoolers.

Our teachers often remind us that we are receiving "the best schooling in the world" and this is believable to us, with our demanding schedule and the extremely high academic and athletic standards. I am greatly pleased to be a "big kid" at last and look affectionately at the younger preschoolers and toddlers. Later that day, I tell one of them that one day, if they are good and work hard, they, too, will be able to wear a robe like mine

Anatomy Class

I am sitting at a wooden desk in a classroom with the eleven other members of my class. I am anxious not to disappoint, so I listen carefully to the lecture delivered by one of the fathers. In front of him is a live human being, a homeless man, who looks bewildered and terrified, not understanding what is going on. I feel sorry for him but suppress the feeling and listen.

"This is the skin, and I am going to peel it away to allow you to see what it looks like underneath." We have already seen flaying at torture rituals and have already learned how to peel the skin off a human being, but now we must learn more: where the veins, arteries, nerves, bones, and ligaments for each section of the body are located, and their correct names. I know I will be tested on this later, and must memorize everything.

The father slowly peels off the skin with a razor-sharp knife; I watch his technique, how he holds the knife, the angle of his wrist and fingers. Next, he slowly peels away the various dermal layers and fat, discussing the various parts such as sweat glands and nerves, until finally he is showing the muscles and ligaments, then the bones beneath. The man has been screaming the whole time during this demonstration, until he finally faints and mercifully goes unconscious. This is also part of our training, to be able to endure hearing human pain.

The other students and I feel green by the end of this class, but we have learned to suppress, cover, and dissociate our feelings to other parts inside. While feeling a bit dazed, we go out later for lunch, followed by the daily half hour of free play. Our thoughts turn away from what we witnessed in this classroom and towards wondering who will make the most goals with a soccer ball after lunch. There is an intense competition going on between two teams composed of various classes. I look forward to seeing which team scores the highest today.

A couple of weeks later, during anatomy class, I walk in and see that there are three cadavers on tables in the middle of the room. My class is divided into three groups of four each. Each group is assigned to a cadaver in order to take turns practicing the careful peeling and dissection techniques we watched during previous classes. While learning human anatomy, we are also laying the foundation for later doing surgery, and also for performing advanced torture techniques, which we know that all members of the Torturer's Guild must master.

The fathers who teach us are very patient, realizing that it will take time for our young hands and muscles to develop the fine control required to master these techniques. At this stage, they praise us for every success, regardless of how small, and we beam at their praise, choosing not to wonder where these bodies we are dissecting came from. Instead, we focus on the positive aspects of our training; after all, it is the "best in the world" as we are told frequently. We should feel grateful, we continually remind ourselves.

During another lesson, all four classes are taken to a glass window of a large freezer for a lesson that will help us understand better how to prevent cold-related injuries when we do missions in cold climates. A homeless man is brought through the door into a freezer that we are told is at a temperature of ten degrees below zero (C). We watch closely as he shivers, and after a period of time, gets sleepy. At one point, while he is still alive, the man is taken out. Our instructor shows us the effects of severe hypothermia on his hands and feet: they have turned a dusky grey color, and he has no sensation in them. "His fingers and toes are dead, because he had insufficient protection," our teacher warns. "Always wear sufficient protective equipment when working in severe cold." This object lesson makes a deep impression on our young minds. I determine to always do equipment checks on my teammates when we do military or other training in cold climates. I don't want myself or anyone else I love to go through this.

This lesson is repeated a week later with an individual placed into an enclosed room at 49 degrees C, without water. We observe first-hand over several hours what happens when a person begins sweating and losing water and electrolytes, and does not replenish them. We all vow to always bring sufficient water and electrolytes with us when training or working in a hot climate.

The fathers who teach us realize that at age six, children are still very concrete in their thinking, and that actually seeing or experiencing these things will make much more of an impression than a lecture ever could. They are very "hands on" in their teaching methods, and these lessons were imprinted on my mind forever in the parts who attended these classes.

History and Political Classes

The Jesuits firmly believe in understanding politics, since their agents will "pull the strings" behind the scenes in numerous countries where they have both a presence and influence. This includes significant influence over leaders around the world (but not all, thankfully!). To prepare the children for future leadership roles on the world stage, they must understand the history, culture, economic and political movements within countries around the world, and the complex factors that drive the leaders of these countries.

In the early years of schooling, we not only heard lectures, but saw re-enactments of famous scenes of history, often put on by the older students as part of their own study, with help from the fathers. These scenes included scenes of key military and political leaders conducting strategic planning for major wars; the intense politics behind the scenes in the early church, both in Rome and Constantinople; the breaking apart of the Roman Empire, and the forces behind this; the feudal systems of Europe, China and Japan; the cultural and religious development of these and other countries, such as Tibet and India. We also studied factors that influence poverty and wealth; the role of tribal culture and ethnicity in the politics and distribution of wealth in various nations, and many other aspects of politics and society.

Part of our training in politics was also learning how to recognize power, such as being able to sit at a table and identify who was the most important person at the table by watching the body language of those sitting. Another skill taught was how to discover the subtle information that can help with gaining influence without appearing to do so. We also learned how to negotiate to gain concessions while leaving those conceding feeling as if they have triumphed in the negotiations. These skills will be practiced for many years, into early adulthood.

As older students, we often accompanied the fathers on political missions as part of our training. For instance, at student might be taken along for negotiations with members of a Muslim nation for oil drilling rights for a key member of the Illuminati, who the Jesuits would be representing in return for an important favor. The Jesuit father would be attended by a ten-year-old student who would stand quietly in a corner, observing, and later report everything they saw going on in the room. The student was told to appear as if they did not understand the language of the negotiators, to smile and nod stupidly if addressed, so that if the father left the room, they could listen and report what was said while they were gone.

Older students would be responsible for packing for these trips and organizing the delivery of luggage and other items. They also checked hotel or private rooms stayed in for "bugs" and bombs, since some negotiations at times occurred in less than friendly situations, and these types of things were anticipated.

I am eleven years old. Father Mattheo, Father Timothy, Father Andrew and I, along with Conner, are staying in a private suite with three rooms in a large mansion in St. Petersburg. It is cold and snowy outside in this bitterly cold Russian city.

Father Mattheo signs silently to Conner and me to do a complete sweep of the room. This is one of the skills that we must learn if we are going to go on missions in other countries. We all joked on the plane over that it is an assumption that they will try to monitor us and learn confidential information while we are in our private rooms.

Conner and I take out our equipment, and check everything in the rooms of the suite, using state-of-the-art technology. After doing the complete sweep, we both identified numerous listening devices which we then brought to the fathers and deactivated. We also found and deactivated a tiny video camera hidden within the beautiful chandelier over one of the beds. I discovered a small bomb located in one of the bathrooms, and Conner found another beneath one of the chairs. We quickly disabled them under the supervision of the fathers.

"Somebody doesn't seem to like us," Conner jokes, and we all laugh. These types of things are to be expected, but even so, the bombs were particularly unfriendly for a group that is supposedly wanting to secretly negotiate with the Vatican. This is the reason for our presence here; there will be no media coverage or publicity as these fathers, all skilled negotiators, sharpen their wits and hold their bargaining chips close to their chests in preparation for the day's meetings.

"Well, this will give them something to think about," Mattheo says. "I will also remind them of what could happen if any of us are harmed while we are here. I think they didn't believe me when I mentioned the need for cordial relations while we are here."

Later, we all walk into the conference room, unharmed and with our private conservations unheard by those we were meeting. I laugh inside to see the look of complete surprise on the faces of our hosts for the meetings. They had not counted on our technology having the capability of detecting and disabling theirs, which took away any unfair advantage they might have brought to the negotiating table. This impressed upon me that one can never be too careful when negotiating with those who are hostile.

Baby Soldiers (Military Training)

The Jesuits start the military training for their children very young, almost as soon as they can walk. Toddlers are taught to stand in a straight line for a few minutes at first, then for longer time periods. Two-year-olds are taught to do short marches together. By age three, the children can march, stand, and practice with guns. They are taught to take apart, clean, and fire small, light guns. By age four, can shoot together at a target on command.

The children are very proud of these accomplishments and I was no exception. I looked with envy at the older children, who by age six were allowed to wear real camouflage uniforms with starting ranks. We were not ranked yet, and our "uniform" consisted of small leggings and a tunic. The older children constantly told us how great it was to be in a real "unit", to do the military exercises, and told us that if we did well, one day we also could do the same.

This peer modeling was a very important factor in our early training. The older children we admired and looked up to, children that played with us at times and many of whom we loved, constantly reinforced performing well in the military training, emphasizing both how fun and how important it was. They even shared some of the pranks they played on the teen leaders with us, to our wide-eyed, admiring stares. By the time I was five, I wanted to be a "good soldier" with rank more than anything else in the world; to be like the strong, brave, talented older "brothers and sisters" who had achieved this already.

By age five, we could march, stand in formation, shoot, and even climb a small mountain with guidance. We were learning to read maps; to use equipment to communicate with each other and other teams and the adults supervising us, in preparation for the real military exercises we would be doing in a few years.

I am seven years old. I am in a hot, dry desert area that has sand everywhere., and I have a canteen of water. My eleven classmates also have water. We have been given a map of the area and terrain and have been told that within 12 hours we need to reach a certain point on the map. We have already learned to read maps and we pull out our compasses (no cheating with modern GPS allowed, the fathers want us to learn to do this the old-fashioned way first).

"I think we should go here first," I point to the left of a large hill in the distance. "That way, we will get more shade than if we try the other side or try to climb the hill."

"I agree," Conner, my second says. "We can take a rest there before we go on."

We look at the other ten. It is important to listen to input from everyone on this team, in case they see something we don't as we plan. This working together is the whole point of this exercise.

"I think it's a good plan," Mary Margaret, my third, says. The other children nod their agreement.

Because we have been doing hikes for years, we are in good condition for children our age, condition augmented by our genetics for increased muscle strength and our excellent physical health. We slog through the sand, which is harder to walk through than a harder surface would be. In spite of seeing the hill ahead, we carefully use our compasses to verify direction. We have been taught that deserts can be tricky, with mirages making objects appear in places very different than the actuality; or they can appear closer than they actually are. So instead of just our eyes, we rely on our compasses as well, checking the readings with each other.

Eventually, after several hours, we reach the hill. We are all sweating, but we have been careful to only drink small amounts of our water in sips. We still have over half a canteen full to get us through the rest of the hike. We reach the shaded side, and collapse on the sandy ground together.

"Boy, it's hot!" Timothy exclaims. "I wish I could pour this water on my head." He and the rest of us know better than to do this, but the thought is tempting.

"Hey, you complained it was cold when we did that hike in the mountain snow a few months ago," Conner teases him, referring to some training done during winter in the alps in northern Italy. "I think you want it to always be a balmy 25 degrees (Celsius)."

"Well, it will be balmy when we get home," I say, thinking of the beautiful weather in Rome this time of year, now that it is late spring.

We each eat a small biscuit that is dense with electrolytes, minerals, protein and other necessary nutrients. We were given the biscuit and put it in our pockets before we started out. Its taste is not unpleasant, and we know that we need to replace some of the salts we have been losing from sweating. This knowledge came from the desert survival training classes that we attended before attempting this hike, including a practice hike for several days with two of the fathers who were dressed in camouflage, like we were.

We learned then that if we need water, there are certain plants to look for that may grow in an area, plants that we can suck water out of, and were able to practice this under supervision. We also know to pace ourselves, and not push too hard in the heat – the reason for this rest in the shade.

After an hour, I get up and stretch. "It's time to keep going, if we want to get there in time," I say. I am leading this hike today; I am the class leader. Conner and the others have also led other hikes and missions, as training to lead others is another important skill to learn. After a quick sip of water, we all get underway, with maps in hand and our compasses ready to guide us.

I enjoyed the military training a lot. It was fun to go outdoors; to learn to purify water; to forage for food, to hike through different terrain, to read maps, to learn to read tracks and eventually to follow a track left by an adult in preparation for the more difficult training once I became older. During this time, I learned to go downhill to look for water; to tell direction by looking for moss on trees and other signs.

At times, I wished that we could do military all the time and not have to do the other training. The only parts I didn't like was having to learn to shoot people and interrogate them with torture; I wish those parts had been left out.

Climbing the Mountain and Teamwork

Each year, my classmates and I were being taught more and more difficult maneuvers, including specialized military maneuvers. We learned how to survive in all types of terrain: desert, mountains, tropical, arctic cold, and moderate climates. I learned how to pitch a tent in a short period of time; how to build a fire using any variety of fuels available; how to use chlorine tablets and filters to clean water, boiling it afterwards to prevent illness; how to identify native plants and animals, and determine which were safe to eat, and which to leave alone.

By the age of ten, I could hike many miles; could climb with a rope and mountain pick up and down a mountainside; was well-trained in the martial arts and could take down adults who were trained in these arts; and shoot well, hitting the target every time. I was also leader of my class, and as such, was responsible for leading them through the training exercises that we were expected to complete as a group. Conner was my second, and marched behind me; while Mary Margaret was my third, and marched in the rear, keeping an eye on anyone who appeared to be in trouble. I had learned over the years to completely rely on them, and they on me, and we worked well together.

I am ten years old. Our class has been told to cross a rope bridge over a high ravine. My classmates are all excellent at these things, and I do not anticipate any problems as we cross, using the two upper ropes to steady ourselves as we walk across the thick bottom. I cross first, testing the ropes and seeing what it is like. This is part of a timed exercise, with two more miles to hike before we reach bravo base, the camp where we will spend the night.

Conner follows, then one after another, they all cross except one. For some unknown reason, John is slow to start crossing. Halfway across, a breeze hits the ropes and he slips, then recovers, but he freezes in the middle of the bridge. I look at him, and realize that he has panicked. "John, come on across, it's okay," I say, in a calm, quiet voice, staring at his eyes from the edge of the gorge. "You can do it."

John is gripping the ropes with tight hands, as if for dear life. He is truly frozen, something quite unusual for this normally extremely brave brother. John looks at me with terrified eyes, and I realize that he simply cannot do what I am requesting.

"John, I am coming for you", I say, as I move onto the rope bridge. I have walked it and know that it can bear both of our weight, by its feel and the thickness of the ropes. "Keep looking at me, and don't look down," I tell him, keeping my eyes on his as I come closer. I then hook a rope to his belt, telling him, "Now, you can't fall; I've got you." I tell him, "Keep looking at me, don't look down," and I back across the rope bridge backwards, slowly, feeling for the rope with my feet, keeping my eyes on John's the whole time. I don't want him panicking and falling, since I can't fully trust that I wouldn't fall into the steep gorge with him. I am literally willing him with my mind to take a step, to not feel afraid, using my theta ability. John takes a hesitant step forward, then another, and I breathe with relief. Finally, we are on the other side; Conner grabs me and Mary Margaret grabs John. We are both safe now.

John explains what had made him freeze: a trauma memory of being suspended over a cliff during infancy was triggered by his near fall. This kind of triggering is highly unusual because of how carefully cult children are programmed to compartmentalize their traumas to specific internal locations. I make a note to let his trainers know, since they will need to deal with this and prevent further occurrences of such bleedthrough memories emerging at the wrong time. I am shaking a bit, since what I had done was extremely dangerous. I know that my military trainers will not be happy with me when they hear about it, since we are not to risk our lives needlessly, but I don't care. I know I have done the right thing and will deal with the trainers' griping later. What is important is that John, a member of my team and my class brother, is okay. We finish hiking to the base, and I go to the company commander to debrief and tell him about John.

I am eight years old. "There will be times when during a military maneuver, in order to save the others in your unit, you will have to leave the wounded behind," bellows a military trainer. I hate hearing this, but know it is true. It isn't right to risk the others for someone who cannot keep going, when there is life-threatening danger.

A few months later, my class and I are doing another training exercise. It is in the mountains, and as we go down a steep, rocky hill, one of my classmates, Paul, slips and badly sprains his ankle. Instantly, the rules of this exercise flash through my mind: "You are all to return to base at the same time. Anyone who does not return within the time limit given will be shot." I quickly assess the sprain; Paul's ankle is badly sprained, possibly broken, on the rocks he had fallen on. "You guys keep going," Paul tells us. "Don't make yourselves late." With a heavy heart, as team leader, I make the decision. "Keep going," I tell the others, and we do.

I never see Paul again. I have to assume that as we were told, he was shot. Another boy from the second class, Mark, moves up to take Paul's place, and I grieve silently, quietly inside for a brother who I had loved. Mark is a great kid, but he is not Paul; but I cover my feelings and embrace Mark as part of our company the next day.

I am eleven years old, and my class is climbing a large mountain. We are competing with two other teams our age; the first class to climb to the top and plant their flag wins the competition and will be given two days of R&R off as a reward. My team and I badly want this R&R, and we are giving this climb all we've got. But this climb is hard! The thin mountain air makes it hard to breathe as we ascend more and more slowly towards the top. I can see the top; it is only a hundred feet away. But my team and I are so exhausted, on shaky legs, that we get onto our hands and knees, and start crawling the last part of the trip up.

I look back, and to my dismay, one of my brothers has collapsed; he is unable to even crawl any further. I go back to him, along with Conner and Mary Margaret. "What's going on?" I ask Jonah, the brother who has collapsed.

"I can't go any further," he gasps. "I can't. I'm sorry, I wanted to win." The rules of this "game" are that all members of the class must reach the top, or they will not win.

I talk softly to Mary Margaret and Conner, and together, we get on our hands and knees, and put Jonah on our backs. "We are going to win," I say, and the other two nod. "We're going to carry you up with us." Jonah tries to make us stop, but we are stubborn, and tell him to shut up and we continue towards the top together.

We three crawl with Jonah on our backs the last 100 feet up the mountain. Each foot feels like a mile, but shaky, we make it, then collapse at the top and plant the flag. Our team lets up a shout, we have won!

Later, when I debrief, the trainers in command of the exercise are not happy. "You aren't supposed to carry teammates up the way you did, that's cheating," they tell me.

"I wasn't told there was a rule against doing so," I argue back. There was indeed no rule against carrying teammates up the mountain, simply because in the past, no team has ever done this before. "I think we showed creativity and teamwork, and isn't that what you want?" I ask. "To teach us to work together to meet a goal? Well, we did; we worked together and all made the top of the mountain."

The trainers tell me to leave and confer together. Later, I am told that my team will be awarded the coveted days off, and I tell them to much rejoicing. We have a wonderful time together in a local Swiss town, sailing on the crystal clear waters of the lake and enjoying lots of good chocolate and baked goods. We congratulate each other on our achievement, then go on to our normal teasing of each other. In many ways, we do act like brothers and sisters, and enjoy this special time to just be children. It is all too easy to forget that we are still children, with the increasingly heavy demands placed on us at this time in our lives. We know that in just over a year, we will be considered adults in the Order, and soon after turning 13, we will go through a special ceremony at the end of which we will be fathers.

The fathers, while strict, also welcomed argument if it was logical and reasonable. When I and other children argued with good reasoning why a position was right, they often agreed. They were usually quite fair when a situation allowed it, and in fact, encouraged budding young leaders in their organization to think strategically and to find unusual solutions for complex or difficult problems. This, too, was part of leadership training in the Order.

Break Time and Pranks

The schooling we went through was very intense. By age 12, in addition to our extensive military training, we had the equivalent of a medical school degree, were able to perform surgery, speak numerous languages, had an encyclopedic knowledge of world history and current events, had the ability to strategize solutions for complex and politically delicate situations, and other skills. But we always looked forward to our daily break after lunch, when we were allowed to play and simply be children. We needed those breaks, and the fathers provided them as an essential way to let off steam and let go of the stress for a time.

During these breaks, soccer, Jai Alai, and other team games were very popular. If I or my classmates had a (rare) full day break, such as after a difficult mission or military exercise, we often went sailing or swimming with close classmates, or had lunch out at a local trattoria, dressed in civilian clothes instead of our usual robes or military camouflage. By age twelve, we were considered adults in the order (more on that later) and began to enjoy more adult privileges.

But we were also children; brilliant, creative children with the ability to strategize and plan, so my classmates and I enjoyed coming up with pranks. For instance, each day in the dining room, a large well-lit computerized board displayed the rank of each class, and of the members of each class, with their skills listed and ranked as well. This was motivational, since everyone wanted to have a high rank, and to help their class hold a high rank.

But on this day, my class had hacked into the computers, and laughter was heard around the room, as the board displayed the names of the fathers (trainers), with their ranking listed, and specific abilities scored, such as charisma, intelligence, and sexual performance. Everyone had fun when this happened, including the fathers who had a sense of humor and an appreciation for the skill it took to hack into the school computer systems to accomplish this.

But my class was still called in, and I was singled out, along with Conner and Mary Margaret, as probable instigators.

"You all seem to have too much free time," Mattheo tells us, hiding his smile. But I see a twinkle in his blue eyes anyway. While he has to discipline us, he has a sense of humor, and will not be too harsh. "Since you seem to be bored, I think your class should stay inside during free time for the next two weeks, and research the use of ancient Sanskrit in poetic form and what it means to you when you read the verses. I want you to also describe how they relate to today's society."

We complete this boring task as requested. But to our great amusement, we also hear the trainers laughing among themselves for weeks about the various rankings, with plenty of teasing for those ranked low in sexual performance, or sense of humor. What they don't know is that our class has previously installed a listening device in Father Carlotti's office, and we have been listening to the other fathers' conversations with this father.

In another school prank, my classmates and I went and switched out the espresso coffee grounds in the labs and school rooms with decaffeinated coffee. Most fathers drank espresso like water to keep them going during the incredibly busy days and large workloads they carried, and we noticed a distinct lag in many of them by the end of the day. Of course, they figured out what was going on, and once again, my class was put on extra work detail for a few weeks.

But even worse, they also cut my class off from all coffee for a week! This was hard on us, since the children are permitted weak coffee starting from the time we enter the school at six years old, and most of us drank quite a bit. We had major caffeine withdrawal headaches for a few days, but after a week, we were allowed our coffee again.

In yet another prank, two classmates and I hacked into the scheduling computer, and gave our class two weeks off in the schedule. Again, this was disciplined, but it was worth it since we loved outsmarting our trainers. The trainers understood the need to “let off steam” and allowed a certain amount of this, as long as we didn’t cross the line into outright disrespect or causing harm to another, which was never tolerated.

Chapter 7: Learning to Become a Mage

Jesuit children are taught to become mages and ascended masters, with their training beginning at a very early age.

I am six years old. I am entering a chamber made of stone, and lit by candles made of human fat. This is where we are taught how to be mages by Kalyx, one of our mage trainers. His white hair and piercing gray eyes were formidable, and he spoke to us in gentle tones that differed greatly from the words he was telling us.

"You must always, always recite any incantation that you do in this room with exact correctness, and with the correct enunciation, or something unfortunate will occur." His fierce eyes hold sadness for a moment.

I raise my hand, with a question. We are always encouraged to ask our trainers questions when it seems appropriate, and there is something I want to know. "What do you mean by unfortunate?" I ask, wanting to understand the consequences of an ill-said spell.

Kalyx strokes his long beard which he is allowed to grow since he is older and no longer doing physically active missions where his beard could get entangled and endanger him. All of the younger fathers are clean shaven, but secretly, I think Kalyx enjoys the wizardly image that silver white hair and beard portray to us children.

"I once mentored a child," he says softly, "who was learning a spell to become invisible. He had done the proper sacrifices, and he said the correct words, but he failed to enunciate them correctly. At the end of the spell, he put the accent on the wrong syllable!" He pauses, with a look of horror on his face.

These mages are great storytellers, and the whole class is listening, spellbound, to find out what happened to this child who made a simple, tiny error.

Kalyx continued, "Suddenly, the demon he had been summoning raised up, turned on the child, and ...ate him!" Kalyx gave a shudder of horror at the remembrance of this terrible event.

The jaws of every child in the room fall open in surprise and fear. We are all thinking in unison that we will memorize the correct enunciation of every spell that we will be expected to learn. None of us want to be eaten, and we are primed to study and memorize very well, indeed.

But children can be a bit suspicious of stories like this, without even consciously realizing it. So a few weeks later, when we are in this stone chamber with Kalyx, he tells us, "I have something to show you." His face is white and solemn.

He turns on a screen in the back of the room. "This film was shot in our facility in Poland," he tells us, and the video begins playing. It shows a young child, not much older than we are, who is doing an incantation. In the middle of the film, the child stumbles on a word. With horror, we watch as a large, dark column of smoke comes up from the ground, and strips the flesh off the bones of the child with a loud ripping sound.

We all instantly decide to memorize the spells and incantations we are given with even greater care.

It was not until I was healing as an adult, that I realized that this video could have easily been created using virtual reality or graphics. But at the time, as a child, I fully believed what it portrayed.

At first, the incantations my class was given to learn were quite simple, for things such as creating a small fire that came from our fingertips, or a bubble of blue light, that would follow us around the room, to see with. As I got older, the incantations were more complex, for things such as seeing into the past or the future; or to create invisibility. Many of the incantations involved special sacrifices, and part of the training, which included learning to read the spells in ancient languages, was to correctly identify which beings were to be called on for each spell, and their particular characteristics. It was essential to know what "gift" – the proper sacrifice – was need to invoke them, and the correct thanks to give after receiving answers to a spell. Early on, we learned to draw special circles to protect us from the being we were invoking, and staying within a special circle drawn with precision on the ground for personal safety during some incantations became second nature. We learned to use special drawing tools to draw these circles, and also learned to draw more complicated diagrams as our classes continued over the years.

There was a huge library which the mages and students (only with permission from the mage tutor) could use. When I was younger, I never went there without an adult, since there was hideous looking demons sitting at the end of various bookshelves, guarding it from unauthorized "intruders". There were many of these guardians all around the library, so there was certainly no fear that an outsider would ever get in and use these books.

As I got a bit older, a father who was mentoring me would at times ask me to go into the library and get a book for them from these specially guarded areas. The father would tell me the password to prevent being torn apart by the guardian over that part of the library, but still I trembled and hurried through the task of retrieving the book.

Some parts of the mage library were lighter, with fewer guardians, and contained literature from around the world. We were encouraged to read fairy tales, both ancient and newer, and to read them in the original languages. There were books about ancient civilizations such as Atlantis and others that had been lost years ago, with diaries of those who lived before their destruction. I loved reading these books.

Some books were very special. They were filled with beautiful pictures, and with the right incantation, the pictures would start moving and become extremely realistic-looking, just like a small movie. Other books with gilt letters would begin reading themselves out loud. The mage library was a strange and wonderful place, but one that I always entered with caution.

All children and adults within the facility attended twice daily "chapel". This started during infancy when we were carried in sitting in our little infant seats. But it was not like chapel at most schools. We had an outstanding children's and adult choir that sang praises and worship with beautiful melodies, but these praises were to Satan, not the Christian God. During chapel, we would watch or often help in the daily sacrifice on a small altar in the front.

There was also a daily sacrifice done at the beginning of the day on an altar in front of the programming labs.

During special times of the year, on the highest holy days (Yom Kippur and Passover; the Jesuits follow the Jewish calendar for their highest festivals), the rituals seemed to go on for hours and hours. When I was young, at times, it was hard to stay awake through the whole ceremony, especially after a long day of hard work at school. The voices would drone on and on during the lengthier rituals, and the words seemed to blur together. But I was warned to never, ever fall asleep, since not only discipline would occur, but I was told a demon might eat me. My classmates and I would surreptitiously poke one another to stay awake. We made it through the ceremonies, even as young children, even late at night. But some nights, it took a lot of pokes. Afterwards, we would all stumble and fall into our beds with relief, to fall deeply asleep.

The Elements

The elements (earth, air, water and fire) were involved in numerous rituals and incantations. As part of learning to control them, I had to learn various rituals and spells. For instance, earth was often represented by soil, but also by rocks. When I was eight years old, one part of my training was to be placed under a wide board the length of my body, while rocks were placed one by one on top of me. I felt as though I was being crushed and suffocated; I could barely breathe. At this point, I called out to the spirit over the element earth to rescue me, and then concentrated my mind as well. Suddenly, the rocks flew off of me, and I was able to move, push the board off and sit. Because I lived through this test, I was able to graduate to the next level in my mage training. While I never saw this myself, I had heard that some children did not pass this test and were crushed. These children were considered sacrifices to the element.

I am 11 years old. I am floating on a raft in the ocean. I can feel the hot sun beating down on me, with rays that feel hot and dry. In a cage is the live sacrifice, a baby, I have been given in order to survive this ordeal. I am thirsty, my tongue feels like sandpaper in my mouth, and I am thirsty, as I speak the incantation to draw Kraken, the keeper of the sea and one of the water element guardians, to the surface.

After what seems like hours, there is a boiling of bubbles in the water near my raft. I feel excited, but also afraid. I am not sure what will happen since elemental guardians can be a bit unpredictable. Hoping that Kraken will be in a good mood, I wait. Finally, a huge monstrous creature that looks like a giant squid, with flashing red eyes and long fangs, rises out of the water, accompanied by a whirlwind of water. It towers over me. I smell rotting flesh and seaweed in a sickening mixture.

Terrified, I scream. Then, as the monster comes closer to me, I remember the words of the ritual, and incant "Please take this sacrifice I offer as a symbol of my deep desire to serve you" in an ancient language, while I quickly open the cage. The monster pauses and opens its large mouth. Quickly, I throw the baby into its yawning black orifice. The monster sucks and drools and chews, then it deposits what looks like a large pearl on my raft. It then turns and slowly, slowly it descends into the deep water.

In spite of shaking hands, I have never paddled a raft as fast as I did now, going back towards a waiting boat that is nearby but not too near, since the others waiting are aware of how malicious and unpredictable the Kraken can be. Once I am hauled on board, I continue to shake for an hour from adrenaline and shock, glad to be alive and hoping that I will never have to meet this creature again.

Later, I take the pearl to Mattheo and Jerome.

"Hold it in your hand and ask it a question you want the answer to," Mattheo tells me.

I do so. I ask it who my worst enemy will be when I become a father. To my surprise, the pearl glows, then gives an answer. Then, the pearl slowly fades away. This answer was Kraken's return "gift" for the sacrifice I had brought it.

For fire, at the age of nine I was taken to an ancient volcano site where molten lava poured into deep crevices; after summoning a fire creature out of the lava, I gave a sacrifice. I was then able to walk over nearly molten stones. At the age of seven, I had already gone through a ceremony where I had done numerous sacrifices before being placed in a golden chair. I was then carried and placed into the midst of a fire for several minutes, then carried out. This was a "passage by fire" ritual that each of us children had to undergo and survive, as part of our training.

When learning to control air, I was taken into a desert and was taught to do rituals and sacrifices to summon up winds and then sandstorms, taking shelter in nearby caves until the storm passed. I also learned to create a thunderstorm with lightening as a young teen, as part of my mage training.

Traveling Dimensions

One part of mage and ascended master training involved learning to travel the dimensions. This began at a very early age, with the youngest children learning to travel accompanied by a father they loved to the first dimension at around age two and a half or three years The age at which a child begins travelling depends on the assessment of their readiness. This dimension looked a bit like a fantasy world, with bright-colored flowers that talked, animals that talked, and unicorns and other mythical creatures that the child could ride while exploring the dimension. But these fantastical flowers and animals had a malevolent side, as well.

I am two and a half years old. This is my second journey to the first dimension. I was able to travel there with Father Mattheo who held my hand while we traveled. He had cautioned me to always hold his hand during the journey there and back to ensure that I could find the way back to my body which was lying on a small bed in the facility.

I think this place is beautiful. I feel fascinated by its wonders. The flowers are singing, and I walk away from Mattheo in order to smell one and talk to it. I am quite a distance from him, looking at, listening to this wonderful scene.

Suddenly, the flowers are all yelling at me. They begin stabbing me with sharp, hard petals that hurt. "Bees, bees, come here!" one blue flower with big eyes cries out. I see and hear a swarm of bees start to come towards me, with a loud buzzing noise.

Terrified, I cried out "Mattheo, Mattheo, help me!"

Suddenly, Mattheo is at my side. He grabs my hand and escorts me back to the portal that we came through to enter this dimension.

"Never, ever wander off alone," he warns me. "You aren't old enough or strong enough, you don't have enough training to understand the dangers of these places" he says sternly.

He takes my hand, and we leave. I never again wander off alone, since I have experienced the unpleasant side of this dimension myself.

Later, when I am much older, I realized that Mattheo had allowed me to wander off, in order to teach me this important lesson while he was still close enough to protect me. I wandered through the first dimension during visits that occurred over the space of a year, riding on a beautiful silver pony with white ethereal wings and a long blue mane and tail, that would do my bidding if I fed it a bit of blood from a sacrifice I had done during the day.

I learned that the rulers on each dimension required a sacrifice in order to enter and leave safely. I was taught to always bring a "gift" (part of a sacrifice) when traveling. The first few visits, Mattheo had prepared my gift for me, but he expected me to bring my own "entrance and exit fees" by the fifth visit. At the young age of three, the gifts required of me, such as blood from a self-flagellation performed prior to travel, or bringing bits of a heart from an animal sacrifice, were lighter than those that would be required as I got older. I was not fully aware at this age just how dangerous travel, especially to be more advanced dimensions, would be.

When traveling, my spirit would leave my physical body, which appeared pale, cold and almost waxy, or even near death, in the room in the facility where it remained while I traveled. When I was a few years older, I would learn to monitor the bodies of those who were traveling, and to provide physical or emotional support if the traveler seemed in trouble. When I was older, I could only travel to a higher dimension, such as the 12th or 13th dimensions, by allowing my body to be subjected to extreme torture that would bring me to a near-death state. But this would be in the future. Now, I was still young, and unaware that this would be required one day.

In the fourth dimension, there were structures that looked like large ziggurats. To go up the steps, a sacrifice had to be left on each step, or the way up would be blocked. I first went to this dimension at age seven with Mattheo.

I am seven years old. Mattheo is standing next to me on top of one of the ziggurats. As I look around in wonder, I see that there are ascended masters or their students in training, who are each standing on the top of a ziggurat. Suddenly, a bright blue light flashes out from the hands of one of the men who is in a dark blue robe. He is facing another man dressed in a dark robe with stars on it. The man he is facing also emanates a bright blue light, and the two battle for a time, until the one with stars on his robe finally concedes to the first man.

I am seeing my first power battle, one method of training that the ascended masters use to strengthen their power and to learn to withstand the pain of gaining power. It is a contest of spiritual strength and will between various masters, and also between their mentees, who also practice against one another.

“You will learn to do this soon,” Mattheo tells me. “But remember to only battle those at your level; if you should irritate a higher master, they could kill you.”

Mattheo lets me practice sending light out. My light is red (the lowest, weakest color). What surprises me is how much this hurts: it is incredibly, agonizingly painful to create this light.

I see another young apprentice who looks older than me, but his light is also red. I turn my light towards him, and he battles me, with an arrogant sneer on his face. But the expression on his face soon changes. I have a very strong theta ability for someone my age and am able to overcome the pain and wear him down, and win the battle. I send a “thanks” to the young mentee who let me practice, but he turns away.

Elated, I return from the dimension, back to the room in the facility, with Mattheo. After we rest a bit, and have something to eat and drink, he talks to me with a serious look on his face.

“Do not let this victory make you arrogant,” he cautions me. “There are many who are stronger than you. It is best to watch and learn at first, and to appear much weaker than you actually are. Try not to show your full strength, or you will attract the attention of those much older and more dangerous than the young apprentice you sparred with today.”

Through much practice over many years, at first with supervision, and eventually alone, I became able to emanate white-blue light from my hands. I became one of the stronger masters on this dimension, where I also took my own mentees. But I never battled the weak, or took advantage of those just learning, as some did. I never laughed at the wounds that some suffered while learning, because I knew how difficult – and dangerous – this all was.

Shape Shifting

I am nearly six years old and am in a stone cottage in the midst of woods with one of my spiritual mentors, Joan, another Jesuit father whose job is to teach me certain branches of mage craft.

For instance, when I was three years old, Joan gave me a white rabbit to take care of. Each day for two weeks, I brought it fresh greens and carrots, changed its water, and was allowed to play with the rabbit during free time.

At the end of two weeks, Joan came to me and said, “I want you to kill the rabbit.” I was horrified. I had bonded to this little animal friend during the time I was there. I had talked to it, held it, and felt comforted by its soft fur and wiggling nose, a kind contrast to the strict, rigid requirements of learning spells correctly. I began sobbing and clutched the rabbit to my chest.

“No, no, no!” I screamed.

Joan took up a knife, took the rabbit and me over to a table. She put the knife in my hand and guided my hands as we killed it together. I was crying the whole time.

“You have to learn to give up the things you love; this is the greatest sacrifice for the most important spells,” she told me.

I bit her; I was furious at what she had made me do.

Joan then took me over to a corner of the cottage where there was a dark, small area, possibly from an old oven. She put me in there and closed the door of bricks over it. She left me in the dark hole for 12 hours. I was shaken since I had thought she was going to leave me there forever, to die. The light in the room, even though it was evening, seemed too bright after being in the dark for so long.

While I blinked painfully, she told me, “You must never disobey me again like that, or I won’t take you out.” I never disobeyed her again.

I am six and a half years old. Joan and I have completed numerous incantations. I have gone into the woods and gathered herbs needed for various recipes, including for potent poisons as well as those used in some ancient rituals. By now, I know the herbs and roots by sight, and can gather them fairly quickly. I enjoy spending time in the woods, where the sunlight filters down, and the fresh smell of cedar and other trees is carried on the breeze.

Upon my return, Joan (who I think of privately as the “old crone” even though she is a top mage in the Order) tells me, “Today you will learn something that is more difficult than anything else you have done yet.”

Then, as I watch, she turns into a bird – a large raven – in front of me, and flies into a nearby tree. She then flies back and turns back into her human shape. I have seen things like this before, but I am still surprised and a little afraid when she tells me, “Today, you will learn to change shape.” I feel a bit wary.

Joan continues, “Changing shape is very, very painful, and I will only ask you to do so for a very short time at first. Part of your training to endure pain has been to help prepare you for doing this.” She, and all of the fathers, always try to explain what will happen before teaching us to do new things. Even so, I feel afraid. I don’t like pain, and I realize that yet another painful lesson is coming.

Together, we gather the sacrifices needed for this incantation to work. In addition to catching numerous live ravens over the past two weeks, which Joan has kept in cages outside the cottage, we also have live humans of various ages in cages. Shape shifting requires strong mage craft, and together we do the numerous sacrifices. We kill ravens, then position the humans to be sacrificed on a diagram of a raven, spreading their arms out like wings and arranging feathers from the ravens we killed on their arms and bodies. Then, on her command, I kill the humans.

Once the correct number of sacrifices are done, Joan then places feathers and blood on me, and has me recite the words of the ancient ritual, in the ancient original language of Babylon. I do so, and then feel excruciating, almost unbearable pain. I cry out from the pain, but my cry sounds like a loud "caw!" even though I still look human.

But then, slowly, feathers begin appearing, I grow smaller, and eventually I look like a small raven. My transformation has taken much longer than Joan's, but she says, "It is normal for the change to be slow at first. It will get faster and easier in the future".

The blinding pain distracts me, but Joan speaks again with a commanding voice. "Fly to the roof of the house behind us, sit there for 30 seconds, then fly back to me."

I do so, in sheer wonderment at what it feels like to fly upwards, perch on a roof, and then fly quickly down to the ground. I return, panting and almost passing out from pain at this point. Joan tells me, "Think the words of the incantation to return to human shape, while also trying to speak them. Don't worry if you sound like a raven at first, that will change."

I think and try to speak the ritual, terrified that I will be remain trapped in the painful shape forever, pain that feels as if it is killing me. My first words are weak "caws". But as I continue, gradually the feathers disappear, skin appears, and I can finish the ritual with words. I am fully human again, much to my relief, and the pain is nearly gone. Joan then has me make a sacrifice of thanks for the gift of the change and the return.

Afterwards she praises me. "It is very difficult and painful to change like this," she says. "It is a sign of your ability and discipline in learning mage craft that you can do this at your age. You are doing well, indeed."

I am glad that she is pleased but I also feel exhausted. I feel completely drained, as if I have climbed a high mountain. We go inside the cottage then, eat a light meal, and she lets me go to sleep early. The next morning, I return to the facility with Joan. "You will practice changing shape every five days, for increasing lengths of time," she says. "I will be with you while you learn."

Joan is true to her word. Once or twice each week, she takes me into the woods outside the facility, where I do the sacrifices and practice with her until I can change more quickly and keep a raven shape for a half hour at a time. This ability takes over a year to achieve.

As I grow older, Joan and other mage mentors teach me how to change into other animals: a wolf (the symbol of the Order – I change into a tawny and silver-haired wolf); and eventually, a dragon. These changes are always extremely painful, which limits how long I, or any of the other fathers, can maintain them.

I learn about tribes of people with a generational history of changing into wolves. They begin their own training extremely young and by the time they are adults, these wolf-people can maintain their shape for a full day. Nonetheless, it is painful for them, and if they try to maintain the change too long, they can become ill or even die. These tribes teach their members how to tell when they must turn back into human form.

As part of my mage training, when I am a teenager, I have to visit one of these tribes in a part of eastern Europe, live with them a week, and run in a wolf shape with them on several hunts. However, I can only maintain the wolf shape for a few hours, unlike them. I feel wary and cautious with these people. I never really trust them, but also understand that there is an ongoing relationship between our Order and theirs. This group was the one who originally taught the fathers the rituals needed to change into a wolf shape. I was taught that this was because at one time, several hundred years ago, one of the Jesuit fathers saved the life of one of their leaders, and in gratitude, he taught this skill to the father who saved him in return for the father sharing one of our secrets with him. Whether this is true, or legend, I don't know. But I did experience learning to change shape while training to become an ascended master.

When I was older, as a teen, I even enjoyed going out in a "pack" with other fathers, young and old, in wolf form. Mattheo was a beautiful silver and white wolf, while other fathers were wolves of varying size, colors and shape. The wolf was a favored shape because the wolf was considered the symbol of the Order, since we were taught that Romulus and Remus were the true founders of Rome and of the pagan rituals that the Order grew from.

Chapter 8: Learning to Become an Agent

Children in the Order are required become accomplished assassins and well-rounded agents. Our training to use every type of weapon skillfully, to kill others secretly and quietly, or even openly and violently, including in pogrom style as I grew older, was practiced frequently.

First Mission

I am three and a half years old and am an adorable waif with curly brown hair and huge, somewhat sad and wistful brown eyes. I am simply dressed in a white cotton dress with a red sash belt. My cheeks and lips have been lightly and expertly rouged by a father. I enter a lounge where soft piano music is playing and wait on a chair nearby.

After a time, the professional piano player takes a break. Another man sitting nearby goes to the piano and begins playing. He has brown hair and has been drinking a bit; he looks middle aged. As he plays, I go towards the piano, acting fascinated by the music and the man playing, as I have been taught to do. He looks up, sees me and smiles. I bat my eyes at him and listen for a time. Finally, I lisp, "I don't have a daddy. Will you be my daddy tonight?" This is a well-known code phrase used by children who are being trafficked in this wealthy part of Germany when they offer their services.

The man keeps playing but nods his head, so I know to wait. After a while, the regular piano player returns to the lounge. The man walks towards me, takes my hand, and we go to his room together. While he is undressing, I quickly put some powder from a packet into his drink while his back is turned. This powder has no taste but is a strong sedative. The man is keeping up a conversation with me in German and I give him short, childish responses. I have been carefully prepped for weeks regarding exactly what to say and not say to this man, and have practiced over and over before coming here.

As he sips his drink, he becomes sleepier. Finally, he draws me onto the bed with him and he attempts anal sex. But the sedative has taken effect, and he quickly falls asleep into a deep sleep. I then take a small white pin out of the pocket of my dress and carefully stab him in the heart with a potent, undetectable poison, as I have been taught. I wait and the man stops breathing. His body turns cold and pale.

I put my dress and other items into a small bag and retrieve a small outfit from the balcony that was placed there previously by an adult. I change into this outfit. I then walk down the hall and knock on the door of one of the rooms. A man I call "Uncle Lou" sees me, lets me in the room, and then goes into the room I was in previously to ensure that the man is dead.

"Aunt Sarah" then puts a blond wig on my head and wipes all the makeup off my face. She colors my eyebrows a lighter color and puts a prosthesis into my teeth to change the shape of my face slightly. I have already practiced all of these things over and over. "Aunt Sarah" then takes my hand. "Uncle Lou" meets us in the hall, and we all go together, a French family on vacation returning home by train. We go to the train station, the adults chatting and laughing in French, and I am a well-behaved little French girl.

Once in France, I am taken to a safe house, where Father Mattheo debriefs me on what has been my first mission. He holds me, tells me what a good girl I am, and says how proud he is of me. I feel conflicting feelings: glad that he is glad, but also, deep inside, sad and ashamed of what I have done. These feelings are buried deep inside though, and when he asks, “Are you okay?” I respond “Yes, I’m fine.”

And I am. After all, the event I want to forget, as is now easy to do, is over; the event I want to remember, being held and loved and praised, is now happening, so things do seem fine. I have learned to completely separate my feelings about doing things that I really did not want to do from the things that I did like, and will continue to do so for many, many years.

The next day, as a special treat, I am given the day off from regular training. Father Mattheo takes me out for ice cream and then we go to the beach, where I feed the gulls and enjoy the sunshine. These are the moments that I live for, and I try to forget the cost that they come at. The events of the day before are already locked away deep in a special part of my mind and cannot cloud the events of this sun-filled, joyful time with the father I love most.

When this memory first came, I wept for the little girl that I was: a child used by the adults around her to accomplish their goals. I have no idea of why this man was killed. I only did what the people who raised me, people I loved, told me I had to do. But it is terrible to think that by this age, the fathers and Mengele had already overcome the innate reluctance to kill another human being to the point that I could follow out their orders so obediently. I also had to struggle with guilt and shame. Was I just a little baby who killed, a “little killer” as Mengele so often called me? Was this what I truly was? How could I have done this so young, unless the things that the adults around me told me were true, as much as I hated what they said about me?

But then, as time went on and I processed these and other feelings, I realized that I was a little girl who was very, very controlled and abused by the adults around her. A little girl desperate for love, affection and approval, one who knew that the only way to win this love, and escape terrible punishment, was to obey the orders I was given. It makes me sad to realize that the adults around me, people who should have been loving me, playing normal games with me, reading me children’s stories and not torturing me, were unable to do so.

I had no access to normal love and affection, and instead, had learned to seek the only thing that was offered: a conditional love, the only kind of love the adults around me could offer. They could only offer me conditional love because they themselves were terrified of breaking the rules. They also had undergone their own childhood programming that made them slaves to fear, and they had passed this fear down to me through their modeling complete obedience to the demonic, their own self-punishments if they ever failed to perform, and their inability to freely love even those closest to them.

MI6

There is a house in the UK known as “Colonel Green’s House” that is run by part of MI6. While there is no official record of this house existing, and most employees of MI6 have no idea of its existence, I was told that it was founded to train children in the arts of spy craft and assassination. According to my memories, the Jesuit Order and several others groups utilize this training facility run by ‘six’ (what we call MI6) and several of their trainers. My classes and other classes from the Order, several times over our childhood, attended training at this house.

I am three years old and am standing against a wall with the other children my age. A trainer I do not know is talking. “Here, you do not have names; you are numbers. I expect you to respond immediately when I call your number.” She pins numbers on each of us. I am "38", and for the rest of my time there and subsequent times, I will no longer be "Lucia" but simply "38". The boy next to me is "39". I wonder why we can't use our names but know that I will be scolded if I ask, since this trainer doesn't seem to like questions, only unthinking obedience. I contrast this with the fathers who welcome questions as long as they are intelligent ones, and who invite debate as part of learning. This trainer at six reminds me more of Mengele whose rule at times was "obey, don't talk".

I am outside, dressed in trousers and a sweater. There are woods nearby, and my job is to track the adult who has gone into the woods and find him, as quickly as possible. I run – I am fast for my age – and follow the trail of bent grasses into the woods. I have figured out where the adult went in, but now what? As I have been taught, I look at the ground for broken twigs, for disturbed leaves, at branches for any bent or moving twigs. I think I know which way the "hare" has gone, and as a "hound" I move through the woods.

Suddenly, I come to a stream and am unsure. I look on both sides of the stream. At that moment, a bird flies out of a tree. I look up, and there in the branches is the adult. When I see him, he smiles and says, "Very good!" He holds my hand and gives me a treat, as we go back to the training center.

When I am a bit older, I learn to trail others without being seen myself, or noticed, and how to blend into any scene in a way that I become almost invisible. I learn that this is called "tailing" someone, that I am "following a tag". When I am older still, I find it a challenge, but also fun, to learn to "drop a tail" and escape from the person pursuing me. This is like playing tag, but is much, much more serious. If I fail to find someone within an allotted time, I could be severely punished or reprimanded; I have seen this happen to other children. So far, I have always found the person in the time given.

I am at a rifle range. I am four years old, back for two weeks of training at six. Like the other children around me who are also practicing with guns, I can almost always hit the bull's-eye, and the trainer praises me as she walks by. I like shooting; it's fun and I am good at it. I like the challenge of trying to hit a target that is further and further away. I aim at the cutout figures of people and can almost always hit the head or heart dead on center. Dead, indeed; this is the whole goal of my training although I often do not think of this as I practice marksmanship with guns and rifles of varying types. I know that when I am six years old, I will be given my own permanent rifle and be allowed to name it. As an older child, I called my favorite rifle "Betsy", and she never let me down. She seemed to become a part of me at times as I went on various missions.

As a teen, "Becca", a longer, newer sniper rifle became my constant companion on missions where I needed to be able to make the long shot. I would pat her and say "Good girl" when a shot was successful at a long distance.

At six, my delta programming (a complex computer system for memory storage and retrieval) was also installed into my internal landscape over several years of intermittent visits there. They had a room with moving walls (that would threaten to crush any internal parts that remembered), and another room with a crystal ball that rotated, and flashing lights, that would punish and fracture parts (that had been given a psychedelic drug) for disobedience.

When these memories first came to me, I wondered why on earth the Jesuit fathers, who are accomplished in all of these skills themselves, bothered to take us to Green House for training. But later I remembered that for certain assignments, the people paying require that the agent be a certified six graduate and they wanted to see the documentation. So, the children are taught over several years, and gain their documentation that will allow them to take on these types of missions – and earn money for the Order.

Learning to Take on a Pack of Dogs

Part of my training was dealing with aggressive security dogs.

I am four years old. I am standing in an enclosed yard. It is a sunny, warm day, but I am anxious because of what is about to happen.

Suddenly, at the other side of the enclosed yard, a metal gate rises. An attack-trained dog comes snarling at me through the gate, running at full speed. When the dog gets to me, it lunges for my throat. I anticipate this, since I have learned how dogs attack, so I am ready in a crouch. I grab the dog by the neck with both hands, flip it on to the ground, place one foot on its right back leg to pin it to the ground, and twist its neck to break it. I get bitten as I twist, but that doesn't bother me; a bite is better than being killed.

I am shaking due to adrenaline. I know that if I had hesitated or made a mistake, I could have been badly hurt.

Father Mattheo and Father Carlotti both come over to me; they have been carefully watching this exercise to see how I do, and also to intervene if a mishap occurs.

"You did very well," Mattheo tells me.

"You were quick and sure," Carlotti enthuses, beaming proudly.

"Let me look at your bite," Mattheo says. The bite is not deep, and both fathers walk me to the medical treatment room. There, the wound is quickly healed with state-of-the art technology. The wound closes, with no scarring in the layers of the muscle or skin.

Afterwards, I go with the fathers to have a cup of coffee with lots of cream and a bit of sugar added.

"I liked how quick your reaction time was when you flipped the dog," Mattheo tells me. "I am very happy with how you did. But you grabbed the dog a little too low – that's why you got bitten. Next time, grab it higher up; it will be less likely to get a bite in if you do that."

"I agree," Carlotti says. "You did very well overall, but you just grabbed the dog a little too low and exposed your arm. Think about keeping your arm out of the way next time."

The fathers always combine praise with suggestions for improvement. Also, when a new skill is executed sufficiently well, there is always a reward, such as coffee. The greatest reward is not the coffee, though. It is the extra time I get to spend with two of the fathers I love most. I get to talk with them not just about the training exercise, but after reviewing the exercise, about other topics, for a full extra half hour that day.

As I get older, this exercise becomes much harder.

I am nine years old. The fathers have released a pack of four dogs at one time into the enclosure. These are full-grown Rottweilers, and much larger than those I had to kill when I was younger. I immediately take down the leader of the pack, as I have been taught. As I am now larger and stronger, I no longer need to try to pin the dog on the ground to be able to break its neck; I twist its neck while it is still in the air, and throw its body at the second dog (the dog next in the pack hierarchy to the alpha) which I had identified as soon as they had come through the gate. This makes the dogs pause for a moment. I grab and flip the second dog, breaking its neck at the same time, then again, I throw its body at the third dog. At this point, the third and fourth dogs look wary. I approach the third dog which is growling with its hackles up. Unhesitant and expertly, I grab it behind the ears, then twist its neck and throw the body at the remaining dog, which backs away from me and growls. Finally, I kill the last dog.

Afterwards, Father Carlotti and Father Timothy enter the enclosure and walk towards me.

"Very good, very good indeed," says Carlotti.

"You have learned very well," Timothy says. "I think you have earned a nice lunch."

The fathers help me lift the bodies of the dead dogs and place them in a special container for disposal. We walk into the facility, change into civilian clothes, and meet at a tunnel beneath the facility where a dark blue car is parked. Soon, we are all seated at a patio table outside a trattoria nearby to have a nice lunch. This is how they show their pleasure in me; they are beginning to treat me more as a peer and less like a small child in these small ways. To an outsider, of course, and I look like a young child going out for a meal with a parent and relative. As always, I treasure this special time given to me as a reward for doing well during an exercise.

Learning to kill dogs trained for military or security use is commonly a basic part of training for children in many occult societies and government agencies, including the Jesuit Order. I describe the training here in barehanded methods, but I was also taught to use many other methods, such as knives and poisoned bait. In the Order, when the children first start practicing barehanded kills of real dogs, to keep things within the child's physical capacity, small but aggressive dogs are used. These are typically puppies around 10 months old from breeds known for aggression and strong bites, such as German Shepherds, Dobermans and so on, who have been trained to lunge at and attack any child in that enclosure. While these dogs are small, to the four-year-old who believes that the dog will tear her apart if she makes a mistake, the dog does indeed seem the size of a massively huge dog.

The Fathers always pair achievements with reward. For the rest of my life, I will associate sitting and having a cup of coffee, and simply chatting, with love and reward, a sense of being valued and of a job well done. When I am much, much older, after a busy day in the programming labs, I will look forward to having a quick cup of coffee with my twin sister or brother, or with an older, beloved student that I am mentoring.

Sex Parties

I am four years old. My twin sister, Elizabeth, and I are naked, covered only with dark blue velvet cloaks. Around our necks are jeweled collars, and we are being led in on a lease as if we are a pair of dogs by one of the fathers. Once inside the huge room which is filled with adults in various states of dress and undress, many with wine or cocktail glasses in the hand, we wait.

There is a large raised pedestal in the middle of the room. It is about four feet by four feet, made of granite, with small steps in the back. Liz and I watch as one by one, young children are led up to the pedestal. They must stand, naked, while adults in the room "bid" for the chance to have sexual activities with each child for the night. The trainers discuss the sexual training that each child has, and bids are made with small, hand-held fans encrusted with jewels, scarlet and blue patterns, and gold leaf. Winners of each bid come up to the platform to collect their prize for the night.

Liz and I are two of the lucky ones. We each have a special temporary tattoo that lets those bidding know that we cannot be killed, although we can be used for anything else. This tattoo is a reminder that if we are killed, the person who killed us will suffer severe consequences, due to our "belonging" to an extremely influential person who wants us kept alive. We are on "loan" for the night, supposedly by the German father over the Illuminati, and we are supposedly his bastard children who have other skills that make him want us alive.

At some point, Liz and I are taken and led by our leashes onto the pedestal. I feel ashamed and embarrassed to be on display, naked, before a roomful of people, but have learned to hide this. I smile and look excited and coquettish at this “privilege”. An individual can bid for one, or both of us. This night, two separate people bid for us. The one who bids and wins me is an older woman who is dressed only in a necklace, bracelets and earrings made of diamonds. The diamonds sparkle in the dim lights as I go to her. She does not tell me her name, but it is obvious that she is wealthy and powerful, not only from her jewels, but her body language and speech.

“What can you do, little girl?” she asks. While the trainer has already discussed my skills, she wants to hear it from me; maybe this is some type of test, or maybe she wants to humiliate me further.

She smiles and describes her favorite extremely sadistic activities. Her teeth are white and gleaming as she smiles. With dismay, I realize that those same teeth will be used soon to bite me in extremely sensitive, private areas. I tremble slightly, knowing that this is what she wants to see, but my reaction is not completely acting. I am sorry a woman bid because they can be some of the cruelest, most sadistic abusers. It is almost as if they have spent years devising ways to give “payback” for their own early sexual abuse but with interest. I have always wondered why they seem to be most vicious to little girls, wondered whether this is working out their own childhood abuse on a child that reminds them of themselves, but I never voice this out loud to a client. I do voice these thoughts with the fathers during debriefing afterwards.

I perform well. I let the sadistic woman have her way with me for hours. She seems very inventive, and I feel worn out emotionally and physically by the early morning. I am also sore everywhere. I have screamed appropriately, sensing that this is what this woman wants to hear as she abuses me. Finally, finally she herself is tired and falls asleep. Quietly, I get up and look for my twin. I worry about her in situations like this, as I know she worries about me. Tattoo or no tattoo, there is always the concern that a client might get carried away and go too far; many enjoy abusing children to death. But to my great relief, I see her sitting in a corner of the room, half asleep.

The father who brought us in, who is thought of in the German Illuminati as one of their trainers, but is actually a Jesuit father, sees that we are done with our clients. He brings my sister and me our cloaks. We are grateful to be covered, that the night is almost over, and leave with him. Outside, he takes us into a waiting van, unsnaps our leashes, and talks to my sister and me.

I then realize that like me, he also had concerns, and was monitoring both of us and our clients closely during the night in hopes to intervene in time if something life-threatening seemed to be imminent.

Carlotti asks, “What did you learn while you were there?” He is asking us for intel, prompting us to report the conversations among adults in the room that we were listening to throughout the night, adults who did not suspect that four-year-old children were capable of being agents with photographic memories who would report any information discussed by them while in a drunken state. We give him the information he requests.

Once we are in a safe house not too far away, one owned by the Order, Lizzie and I are given baths, and wash off the body fluids that our clients left with us. We are also given medications to help prevent disease. Father Carlotti inspects us carefully to ensure that there is no significant harm. He provides healing technology for a rectal laceration that I have, and a gash in my twin's arm inflicted by her client, a male, biting her.

"Human bites are the worst," he mutters, as he cleans out the bite with a special formula, applying healing so that no scar is left. He then says to both of us, "I am so proud of you. I love you so much."

Lizzie and I then go to sleep in soft, warm beds that are side-by-side. I go to sleep holding my sister's hand.

"I love you, Lizzie" I tell her.

Of course, Lizzie and I told ourselves that we were two of the "lucky ones" with the special tattoo. We had seen and heard far too many children who were called expendable by the adults around us die slow, terrible deaths at these parties. Secretly, deep inside, however, I wonder if the children who died, who no longer have to experience any more pain, were the lucky ones. I can't say this to Lizzie, or she will be forced to let the fathers know, and this will be emotionally painful for her. So I keep silent.

All children in the Jesuit Order are trafficked,, but we did not define it that way. Attending and being abused at these types of parties held by the extremely wealthy in Europe and other countries was framed as doing a "mission", one that involved a specific set of skills, skills that could "help the Order." What we did was not defined as being abused, but as participating in a potentially dangerous activity. But all missions were dangerous to some extent. We were allowed to be "real agents" according to the fathers, and they were using our deep desire to do great things for the Order, when we were put in these situations.

But the reality is that my twin sister and I, and all of the other children I grew up with, were being terribly sexually abused and trafficked. The fathers who forced us to do this had been subjected to non-stop sexual abuse as children themselves. They did not realize how monstrous what they were asking us to do was; after all, they had to do it when they were young as well.

But the terror, anguish, sadness, grief and sense of betrayal, along with deep rage at the father who led my sister and me into this potentially life-threatening situation, risking our lives for the sake of gaining useful information, came forward as I processed this memory.

Early Testing

Starting at a very young age, I learned how to do various missions, practicing extensively within first the facility, and later on the streets of Rome. Even as a toddler, I would be taken into a room where there were various adults talking. Later, I would be asked by a father questions such as "How many people were in the room?" "How were they dressed?" "Who had the nicest clothes?" "Who spoke the most?" This was very early training for debriefing after a mission, when I would be required to remember even the most minute details and share them concisely and clearly with the person I was to report to after a mission.

I also had to practice completely forgetting a mission after it was over, in order to maintain a high level of security around these missions, as needed. Parts who had memories of the mission had to give their memories to our security storage system within delta system which enabled them to completely forget that an event had occurred. We were not required to forget all missions, but had to be able to do so for particular missions when ordered to.

I am three years old. I have just seen an adult stabbed in front of me by Father Mattheo. Afterwards, I help him put the body into a bag and clean up the room, wiping it down quickly and carefully with a special solution that destroys blood cells or body fluids. We are dressed in special gear, with nets over our hair, gloves, disposable booties and aprons. Looking like fugitives from an operating room in our gear, we completely clean the room, put the body on a trolley and wheel it into a cold room for later dissection by one of the classes.

We then take our protective clothing off, dispose of it in a trash bag, and place the bag into a chute that goes to an incinerator. Mattheo takes me into a white room next door. He gives an amnesia code, awaits, then asks, "Do you remember what happened in the other room?"

He looks intently at me, and I tremble. I remember seeing Mattheo kill the man, and our cleaning. The memory is fuzzy, but still there.

"I...I...I don't know," I say, hesitating to answer because I don't want to anger Mattheo.

"What don't you know?" he asks in a stern but quiet tone. I realize he is angry. Mattheo does not put up with equivocating, and I realize to my dismay that I must tell the truth.

"I remember some," I say.

"Tell me exactly what you remember," he responds. This is an order, and I must obey.

So, I tell him about seeing him stab the man, and our cleaning up afterwards.

"Don't you know that you MUST forget?" Mattheo says. His tone is urgent. He then takes a gun out and points it at my temple. "If you don't learn to forget, I will have to shoot you. I can't let you be a security risk, no matter how much I love you. Now, forget!"

He gives the command. I sweat and try my best to give the memory away to Secundus, one of my main delta controllers, for memory storage. If I don't succeed, I will die, I know it. I have heard that Mattheo shot another child in a previous class who could not learn to forget on command by a certain age – that child was never seen again - and I am at that age.

"Do you remember what happened in the other room a few minutes ago?" Mattheo asks me. I blink and look at him, bewildered. What other room? What is he talking about?

I am wearing special equipment to monitor my physical responses and brain activity. "What room?" I ask. Mattheo looks at the monitors and smiles, looking relieved.

"What is the last thing you remember?" he asks me.

"I remember going for ice cream with you last weekend," I tell him. He smiles again, and says, "Today, I will take you out for ice cream again." He takes the equipment off, and as he promised, I get to enjoy some delicious gelato, one of my favorite treats, with him, the father I love most. I have no idea that he has just threatened my life an hour before and I enjoy the warm sunshine and the soft breeze as we walk down the street during a beautiful Rome spring day.

I am four years old. I have been told to go into a room to stab an adult who is sitting tied to a chair (a homeless man who was used for this training) in the heart, and then to go to a sink, wash the knife off, change my clothes, and go into another room and sit down.

I obey my instructions perfectly. I stab the adult, who screams in terror when seeing a knife-wielding child come near him and also during the stabbing. Blood trickles from the knife wound. Carefully, I carry the knife to a sink in the corner of the room, wash it with antiseptic soap, and then place the knife into a small carrier. I pick the carrier up, walk out of the room, and enter another room through a door. I place the carrier on a white table in the center of the room, then sit in a white chair. The room is completely white: white walls, white floors, white windows; all is white here, the color of amnesia, forgetfulness and comfort. I hear a command given to forget what has just occurred on a large monitor screen inside the room, along with several visual codes that reinforce this command. The codes to bring out Lucia, my cult host, are then given in the same way.

Father Carlotti, one of the fathers I love, comes into the room. “Lucia, how are you?” he asks.

“Fine,” I answer. I am fine, since as Lucia, my cult host, I have already forgotten what has just happened. I was not “out” for the actual stabbing, and so have no memory of what had just occurred. Looking intently at my face and eyes, Carlotti nods. He can tell by my body language, posture, speech, pupils and breathing that yes, I truly don’t remember.

“Can I speak with Axle?” he asks. Axle, the part in me that did the stabbing, comes out. Axle likes to stab with knives and axes and has learned the art of killing using many different weapons. Carlotti places special monitoring equipment on my chest and head.

“Axle, what just happened in the other room?” Carlotti asks.

“What other room?” Axle asks. Like Lucia, he has no memory of the previous event; his memory has already been sent to delta system. Carlotti checks the monitoring equipment and nods. The brainwave activity indicates no response to the question other than would be normal; if the trauma was remembered, there would be a sharp spike in several physical and other parameters, including increased brainwave activity in certain areas of the brain.

“Do you remember anything happening today?” Carlotti continues assessing for amnesia, or its lack.

“I went to lunch, but that was a week ago,” Axle responds, referring to a reward lunch of his favorite foods at a local trattoria with Father Jerome. “Why are you asking?” Axle looks slightly bewildered and suspicious but has no idea of why he is being interrogated. He has passed the test. Carlotti takes the equipment off, and takes Axle out for lunch again, since he has performed well and forgotten the things he is supposed to.

Axle and other parts have learned by age four to completely forget. Numerous scenarios, carefully designed by the fathers, have taught them how important amnesia is not just to security and protecting the fathers who they loved, but for survival itself.

Maintaining complete amnesia for missions is critical for maintaining security and secrecy for this occultic organization involved in criminal activities. The fathers bond closely to the children they love, but they cannot allow any child that cannot forget when told to, to live. I felt heartbroken when the memory of Mattheo threatening my life came, because I felt my own terror as a child that I would die and also heartbreak that this father I loved so much was capable of killing me if I could not perform this task. I loved HIM, why couldn't he love me the same way? This is how I felt, thinking I would never threaten Mattheo's life, no matter what. The heartbreak came from realizing that while the love seemed real, it was limited by the demands of keeping the security of the organization, and of keeping the demonic beings that the fathers worshipped happy. To my great and growing grief, I realized that what I had labeled "love" as a child was indeed love, but only to a limited extent, held within certain parameters. And that my own ability to love would be used against me, without hesitation.

Chapter 9: A Walk in the Garden

I loved the times alone that I could spend with the fathers I loved, especially Mattheo. During these times, I could ask him the questions that I had and he always gave me wise counsel, or at least understanding. This was a critical part of my training to become a father and mentor myself one day.

It is a beautiful sunny day. I am sitting on a stone bench near the wall that surrounds the monastery where I go to school. Climbing roses go up a trellis behind us, their perfume filling the air. It is springtime in Italy, and I am sitting on the bench next to Mattheo. He is in his black robe, and I am in my little brown acolyte robe. I am eight years old, and our conversation is intense.

"If we love each other, why did I have to hurt my (twin) sister Lizzie last night?" I ask. I am heart-broken. The night before, I went into Satan's room at the Vatican, a dark room that the fathers would lead me into on certain nights, then leave me alone in it until morning.

Satan had appeared in his hideous, ugly form in front of me. "Do you love me?" he asks.

I hate that question, but I respond, "Of course I do."

"Then show me," he says. I shudder internally, but completely hide my reaction. I know that "showing love" will require doing something that I especially hate.

"Go and get Elizabeth, your sister, and bring her into this room," he says. The words echo in the room. I feel cold chills of terror, afraid that one of us will die this night.

I leave the room and see Mattheo. He looks surprised that I have left the room so quickly, but then he sees my pale face and the expression in my eyes. "What happened?" he asks.

"I have to bring Lizzie here and go into the room with her," I whisper.

Mattheo turns pale, probably wondering the same thing. "I will get her, wait here," he says. In a few minutes, he returns with a frightened Lizzie.

Shaking, I take her hand and we enter the room together, hand in hand.

"Who do you love more, me or her?" Satan demands of me, pointing at my twin.

I don't know how to respond. I have been taught all my life to love and obey Satan, but...I love Lizzie deeply. She and Dannie, my other twin, are the two human beings that I trust with some of my inmost thoughts. We play together, tease each other, and I can bounce ideas with Lizzie. She is bright and intelligent, and loves sciences like I do. She, too is showing special aptitude as a trainer. She and I compare notes and try to solve problems together when we are alone together. We sometimes cuddle up together at night, even though each of us has a narrow bed in our class dormitory. Lizzie is in another class, the second class, which sleeps in the next dorm room over, but she and Dannie sometimes sneak into my bed at night, or vice versa, for a cuddle and whispered conversation before we fall asleep. While this is technically breaking the rules, it is allowed at times, since the fathers realize the need for comfort especially after particularly demanding or stressful days.

"Stressed" does not begin to describe my feelings as Satan waits for my answer. If I lie, I completely believe that he will know.

"I love you both deeply" I reply, knowing that I have to give the honest answer. "I love you even more for allowing me to have a sister like Lizzie."

Lizzie and I tremble slightly and wait for what seems a long, long, time, both of us wondering if I will have to kill her tonight. It is not unusual for Satan to demand terrible sacrifices in these late-night meetings in this awful room which I have come to dread. I have been visiting Satan in this room since I was a very young child and know from the upset expression on Mattheo's face when he brings me here that he also does not like this room no matter how much he verbalizes the "honor" to me of being chosen to visit at such a young age.

Lizzie and I wait and wait. We have to look lovingly at Satan and no longer hold hands. Showing too much affection now would be disastrous with this jealous creature. Finally, Satan speaks. "I want you to peel the skin off of your sister's upper arms and legs and offer her screams to me as a sign of your affection. This will be a sacrifice from both of you," he says. I understand that I will be allowed to apply artificial skin to keep her alive as I do this. He is not asking for her death – at least not tonight.

Lizzie and I are both relieved; she can be healed from peeling if I use the artificial skin and take her into the healing room right afterwards. I take out small golden instruments from a dark blue velvet bag, a bag containing the instruments that the Torturer's Guild has been teaching me to use correctly the past few years. I know how to peel skin off without killing the victim and am careful to go slowly and carefully with my sister. She screams because she has been told to. She does not send the pain down to her pain holders, but instead, endures the pain herself in her cult host and other presenting parts. The sound is terrible and my hands shake a little as I perform this task, but I do my best to still them. I do not want to hurt her more than I have to. With each section, I cover her with artificial skin, one of the life-saving technologies that we have developed.

After several hours, I am done. Satan smiles. I take the skin and put it on a special altar in the room and move back. He then consumes the skin, smacking his lips grotesquely.

He turns to my almost unconscious sister. "Your sister's act of love has been most delicious to me," he tells her.

I am trying not to faint, as I know what he now requires. "Thank you for your gratitude, gracious lord," I say. "I enjoy giving you these services and feel honored to be your servant this night."

Finally, finally he leaves the room, disappearing in a flash. In spite of the artificial skin, Lizzie is shivering. I run and get Mattheo, and he gently carries Lizzie into the healing technology room, where her skin is regrown. There will be no physical scars, but the emotional scars and pain of this night will last a lifetime for both my sister and me.

The next day, while walking with Mattheo in the garden, I share with him my questions about the previous night.

"Why does Satan demand such terrible things?" I ask him. Because the night before was so difficult, I have been given a half day off from school, and Mattheo is spending extra time with me. Father Carlotti is spending extra time with Lizzie, who has also been given a half day off from school. I am crying as I ask this question, because with Mattheo, I can show how I truly feel about things like this. There are some things that even he does not allow me to question or show feelings about, but asking this type of question is part of my own training, and he is my primary mentor.

Mattheo pauses and looks sad. "Sometimes, there are things that are difficult to understand," he says. I wonder if he is remembering similar things required of him when he was younger. "The more promise a person shows, the more difficult the things that are asked of him or her," he says. I realize that this man, who is a top general in the Jesuit army, has had to face this kind of trauma in his own life. "As mortals, we cannot understand everything we are asked to do," he says.

"But it's cruel! It's wrong!" I cry out. "How can this be good, or part of immortality?!?"

I am deeply questioning my training, and am on the edge of going too far, but I can't help it. I feel guilty, ashamed, and heartbroken over what I was forced to do the night before. I know without being told that had I not given the sacrifice of pain demanded the night before that my sister would have been killed to punish me. But even knowing this, my mind, spirit and emotions are rebelling against the cruelty which I cannot reconcile with obedience to the beautiful beings and the belief in ascension towards immortality that I have been indoctrinated with.

Because Mattheo is wise, he listens to my pain and waits as I pour out to him how unfair it all is. He holds me in his arms as I cry and wail. Finally, when I am quiet, he continues. "I understand how painful this is," he says. There is something in his voice and his eyes that lets me realize that he has undergone similar traumas. "Those who show the most promise, are at times asked to give the most in return." He looks sad and holds me for a while. "We as mortals cannot always understand the ways of the immortals," he continues. "There are things that I still don't understand. But I have to believe – and you also need to believe – that the sacrifice last night was for your and Liz's good; to help you both give up a bit of your mortal, fleshly desires to help you ascend."

It is not his words, but his understanding and comfort that help me the most.

I watch the bees buzzing and pollinating the flowers behind our bench. Mattheo then rises, and picks a pink rosebud, and brings it to me. He takes a pin out of a pocket in his robe and pins it to my robe above my heart. "This is what you are to me, a beautiful flower, with sweet perfume for those who love you," he says tenderly.

We go to his private office, and have a cup of tea together and talk some more about everyday things. I then go to lunch, proudly wearing the rose. I will wear it until it begins to dry out, then carefully press it between the leaves of a book.

One day, when I am a father, my symbol will be a pink rose as a reminder that I am loved. Mattheo's symbol is a red rose; Jerome's is an off-white rose, and Carlotti's is a pale, creamy yellow rose. On certain special occasions, the fathers wear their special rose pinned to their robes, and I will do the same when I am older.

As this memory illustrates, the Jesuit fathers are completely deceived. They have developed a twisted logic that justifies the cruelty and abuse that the demonic demands. They actually believe that terrible things such as this are for a "greater good." When I first had this memory, I went through horror, shame, and guilt that I actually did this to my sister, and deep rage at the fathers and at Satan for perpetuating this type of horrific abuse on small children. Lizzie and I had no one to rescue us at this age. I tried to be my sister's rescuer by saving her life, as I had been taught to do for those I love. But I was a child, and I could not rescue her, or myself, or anyone else, from the terrible acts and the destructive, false beliefs that we were indoctrinated with through scenarios like this.

I also met parts inside who completely believed what the fathers had taught them: that pain is for a "greater good"; that all of this spiritual activity that caused such emotional, spiritual and physical wounding was worth it, and was helping us to overcome our mortality. They had completely accepted the beliefs modeled to them by their caregivers, the Jesuit fathers. It took a long time, and my overcoming my own horror at realizing that they believed in abuse that would bring ascension as much, or even more strongly than I believed in Christianity. On my healing journey, this brought on many quite heated discussions inside me.

Finally, an internal helper told me, "Shut up, stop preaching, and just listen to them. Otherwise, they will hate you, because you are proving to them that all Christians are self-righteous little prigs." This was the best advice anyone has ever given me. While uncomfortable at first, I started to shut up, stop preaching, and listen. I held hands inside, without judging, and memories began pouring out as I started to realize that their beliefs were my own beliefs; that deep down inside, without knowing it, I also had believed this same thing. It took time, questioning a lot, and learning to love these parts and forgiving myself, for the healing to proceed and for this and similar scenes to become a memory, and not an ongoing internal trauma.

Remember the Flowers

Not all walks in the gardens with the father brought comfort. It was an essential part of my early training for parts to "remember to forget" the memories that they have been ordered to forget. This section describes another one of the many memories I have about being trained to forget.

I am about five years old. It is a slightly cloudy day, but the sun through the clouds is still bright. I love the outdoors, and always check the weather each day in hopes that my classmates and the other classes can all play outside after lunch during our free time. I love running, playing tag, soccer, and other games.

However, today, I do not get to play as I usually do. Instead, Father Mattheo comes over to me after lunch, and takes me by the hand. "We are going on a special walk today," he says. I am eager because I love having special time alone with this father outside of our 15-minute daily talks at the end of the day. Since it is late spring, there will be green grass and lots of beautiful flowers to see and smell, and birds to watch, as we walk.

We walk together down a stone-paved pathway to one of the deep fountains that pours water from its center up to the sky. I have often enjoyed sitting on the brown stone wall with flat pavements on top that surrounds the fountain in a circle, watching the water splash up and then back into the small moat of water surrounding the fountain. Mattheo and I are talking about our days. I have no idea of what is about to happen. We come to the fountain, and I look into the water. To my horror, I see the fountain moat filled with bodies – dead bodies – and each has a flower in its mouth. The bodies look like people I know, but cold, waxy, slightly blue and lifeless, staring with sightless eyes towards the sky. They bob almost silently in the water. I start to shrink away, unable to bear the sight.

"Look!" Mattheo says sharply. "I want you to see this." I look. Some of the arms on the bodies bob slowly in the soft current created by the splashing water. It is creepy beyond belief. I desperately, desperately want to look away. One of the bodies, that of a man, has a slightly open mouth and terrified eyes, as though he died screaming from terror. I see blood oozing from his mouth, slowly staining the water near his mouth red-pink.

"These are people who remembered things that they shouldn't," Mattheo tells me. "This is their judgement for their sins, to die this way. Let them be a reminder to you to never remember things that you have been told to forget."

He takes me around the water, and on the other side, I see children, including a young girl my age who looks so much like me. Like the man, her dead eyes are wide open in terror. She evidently died in great terror. Due to her likeness to me, I feel a sense of dread and horror like a chill creep up my spine. In the middle of her screaming mouth is a peony blossom, its white creamy color and beauty incongruent with the horrifying scenario I am seeing.

"Even children are punished if they remember too much," Mattheo says. "Everyone is expendable, if they remember too much, or without authorization."

iors, allowing even tiny children to watch, then do assessments and simple infant programming. As the child becomes older, they are allowed to ask questions, and then when they are yet older, they are asked questions designed to stimulate strategic thinking and planning.

By the age of eight, most children in the training facility in Rome have basic programming skills. By this age, children are allowed to begin helping to train and plan the training for an infant, carefully supervised by an adult trainer. They have already had several years of being allowed to observe, and then practice the skills and thought processes needed. Not all children will show great aptitude, though. Those who do are marked as having the potential to be head trainers one day. These children are given special intense mentoring by the facility top trainers.

By the time they are age twelve, the children with the most aptitude are highly skilled trainers. Considered an adult in the Order, they are allowed to develop training plans for the infants. When they become a father in a year and a half after coming of age, they will be assigned an infant to be bonded to them, and then each year will begin training other infants. Thus, the cycle of abuse continues with each generation, in a world where this is the "norm" for the children born and raised in the facility.

In the Order, no one has a concept of a life in which abuse and programming are not "normal". It took me many years after leaving the cult (trying several times until finally leaving permanently) to adjust to the "outside" world. I had to learn a whole new worldview, one that many parts distrusted and disbelieved deeply in at first: the possibility that life could be lived without the constant expectation of high performance, or without the shadow of constant, terrible abuse.

This adjustment was made more difficult by a world outside the facility where the majority of people I encountered did not understand – or seem to even want to understand - what I had been through. I shared just small parts of my story at churches I attended, and people acted frightened of me and avoided me. I shared small parts of my story with counselors, and they stopped answering calls to schedule an appointment; another told me that abuse like this is normal, and that it was normal to lose time (have memory gaps). I had to look for another counselor who would not try to normalize torture and amnesia, who I assumed was probably part of a cult herself.

The individuals who could listen to my story and not run were very few and far between, and often charged high fees for this listening. These were fees that were difficult to afford.

I learned to stop sharing my story at the new church I started attending, and people were not afraid of me. I learned to stop telling friends about my past, and the new friends I made did not avoid me. The outside world, the world outside the facility, by its own modeling and behavior, taught me to be silent if I wanted acceptance and to not be feared.

This rejection by those without a cult background is the reality that many survivors face. I did not have survivor friends by choice – all of the survivor friends that I made early in my healing had a mission of drawing me back to my handlers, just as I (unknowingly, but destructively all the same) had the same mission towards them. We understood and did not fear, and accepted each other, all too well, because the kind presenters in the front did not realize that we were all still cult active.

So as healing and awareness increased over time, without survivor friends, I had extremely few options for friendships outside of the facility, a facility filled with the people I loved dearly, people I had grown up with and bonded to for years. People that the cult was threatening to torture to death if I did not return to Rome.

I am grateful for the three friends that I was able to make over a period of thirty years, who were not cult members, who were not dissociative, and who helped me immensely during my own healing journey. They learned my story gradually, and I was friends with

I understand authorization: I am only allowed to remember, even in my cult host, the things I have been authorized to remember by the fathers. I am now seeing the terrible end result of going outside of authorized memories. Mattheo stoops down and looks at me at eye level. “Remember the flowers,” he tells me softly but with great authority. “Remember the flowers: what you have seen today, and never forget the flowers.” He then hands me a creamy peony, just like the one in the little girl’s mouth.

As he does so, the realization dawns that by flowers, he means the dead bodies floating in the water. Some look like fathers I love. This causes me to panic, wondering if they, too, have remembered too much on this terrible day. I return to the dining room, shaking. To my great relief, an hour later I see two of the fathers I love, fathers who resemble the dead bodies I saw in the water. They are alive.

I am shaken deeply by this experience. That night, I have screaming nightmares of dead bodies floating underwater, opening their mouths in silent screams. I wake up, sweating and shaking. Mary Beth, my third (I am first, or group leader; Conner is my second, and Mary Beth is third in rank in my class and along with Conner, is one of the children in my class I am closest to) hears my cries and climbs into bed with me. She holds me until I calm down then we both go back to sleep. She does not ask what I dreamed. I do not tell her, since we both know that our dreams are often based on traumatic experiences, of which there are all too many. I am grateful for my classmate who is closer than any sister. For the rest of my life, when I hear the phrase “remember the flowers” I will become completely amnesic to whatever I am asked to forget.

It is not until I am older, and a father myself, that I learn that the bodies in the water are actually realistic manikins, that can be used over and over again in various scenarios. Neither do I know that during this week, one by one children at a certain age go for “special walks” with the fathers they love to encounter this gruesome scene and to learn to “remember the flowers”.

This and other kinds of amnesia training are done because once the children in the Order get older, they are often sent on high-security missions that could create a security risk for the Jesuits if the parts that did the mission remember what was done, or if they disclose during interrogation by enemies. The Jesuits often used our attachment to loved ones, such as in the memory above, in order to gain the amnesia – and resulting silence – that they wanted. Even the cult host, who generally remembers most of life, will be ordered at times to completely forget an event. This is one of many methods used to ensure amnesia, and thus maintaining secrecy.

Chapter 10: Learning to Become a Trainer

I am three years old. I am proudly walking behind the fathers as they begin doing their rounds in their white lab coats, where they will do the first of their twice-daily assessments on the infants. I am being allowed to watch and learn. Mattie, one of the female trainers who at the age of 15 is extremely skilled and already considered a top trainer, places me on a high stool that enables me to look into the crib where she is doing her assessment.

"You must be very quiet and not talk while I am doing the assessment, otherwise you might distract the baby and mess up the results," she cautions me.

I silently nod my little head. Mattie approaches the infant, named Barnabas, who is four months old. The infant smiles and holds up his arms to be held. "Good, good," Mattie murmurs. This child is socializing well, and just as importantly, has learned to dissociate his fear of the trainers who bring pain, from his joy at receiving positive attention from the same trainers. A part who only views Mattie as a loving caretaker is out and greets her eagerly.

Mattie does a quick but careful head to toe assessment of his physical condition, including neurological reflexes. She checks for any signs of stress, looking at his weight, which is automatically charted by computer daily on the electronic display at the end of Barnabas's crib. "You've been eating well," she coos at the baby. It is obvious watching Mattie that she really loves this baby, and is attached to him, just as she is to the other infants in the nursery. This is a crucial aspect of a good trainer that I am absorbing by watching her interact with Barnabas; Mattie really likes this baby, and the baby knows it.

After some play time, Mattie calls out other parts in Barnabas. Today, she will be checking if the programming is intact in several systems, including the newly created internal hell system, where internal controllers with names like "Abbadon" and "Shiva" have been created through extreme trauma. "Abbadon, code 3351, come out," Mattie says, while simultaneously pushing a button that displays a unique black and white pattern of black and white squares, diamonds and half diamonds above his crib. These patterns and others are unique to the Jesuit order. I have already learned that they are never to be shared with outsiders or strangers; people who are not part of our Order.

Abbadon comes forward. Immediately, smiling Barnabas turns into an angry, hissing baby. Abbadon must guard the gates to the internal hell and has been carefully trained come out only at the appropriate codes, and face and voice recognition of a primary trainer. Mattie places a small helmet-shaped device over Abbadon's head, which will run specially designed videos of hell that shows him the importance of guarding hell to prevent chaos in the universe. Afterwards, Mattie takes the helmet off. "What do you do if a stranger tries to enter hell?" Mattie asks. Abbadon kicks his little fists and feet in an intensely violent, angry reaction, showing his intent to destroy anyone who tries to do so. "Good Abbadon, good, you want to protect your people," Mattie says. She picks him up and cuddles him, telling him he is doing good.

She conducts similar assessments of other system controllers. I watch as she gently and carefully checks that the programming is intact. If it is intact, she plays a sequence of colored lights and tones, which indicate programming integrity for that system; the tones and lights will vary for each system controller. She then gives each controller, including Abbadon, a drop of sweet water on their tongues to reward them for doing well, telling each how 'good' they are.

Later, Mattie takes me to the staff room that the trainers use to take breaks in. She gets herself a large mug of black coffee from coffee machine. “What did you learn, Luce?” she asks me. “What surprised you the most, and what did not?” Mattie is a good trainer. She has worked with me for the past few years, and I love her.

“I was surprised to see how different Barnabas looked when you called Abbadon and some of the other immortals out,” I say. “It was a little bit scary.” I have been programmed myself but have not been present before to watch another child being programmed.

“You're right, it is a real change,” she affirms. “But these changes are important; Barnabas by himself could not guard his system from outsiders,” she says. “He needs help from beings like Abbadon to have the strength to do so.” I have learned to fear and hate the evil outsiders and strangers, people whose greatest desire in life seems to be to destroy the beloved Order and those within it. I have met these strangers and outsiders in carefully planned setups and know that they like to rape and hurt little children and laugh when the children are terrified or cry out in pain. I know how important it is to protect systems from outsiders and see the logic of her argument based on these experiences. But my stomach still felt funny seeing a tiny face turn so quickly from smiles to rage and violence, and I hope that when I am working with someone who has this part programmed into them, that he would not turn on me.

“Could he hurt you when he gets bigger?” I ask. Mattie smiles because the trainers encourage questions from their young protégées and she is glad that I am verbalizing this fear to her. This is why I am with her today: to watch, learn and have my questions answered.

“It would be possible, except he knows that I love him, and want to help him protect his systems, too,” Mattie explains. She explains how important having a loving bond is when working with babies and children who have powerful internal protectors. “Unless he feels threatened by me or thinks I will hurt him or his parts unreasonably, he won't try to hurt me,” she says. She then explains that he will be given appropriate targets for his rage as he gets older. I assume that she means strangers, not understanding at this young age that she actually means sending his rage into internal self-punishment and internal programming systems which torture internal parts for any independent thought or disobedience to the Order. I am still too young to be initiated into the “divide and conquer” mentality, in which trainers teach systems to turn on one another, and direct their rage to objects than those who are actually abusing them. Today, we are sticking to the basics, and it will be several years before I learn these other things.

I cannot wait to be a trainer like Mattie and the other fathers. I look up to them so much, these people who hold me, feed me, love me, play with me, and now who are starting to teach me. I know that some of the things that they do hurt, but I have also internalized the belief that this pain is for my own good, to make me stronger and to help me ascend. The regular visits from the immortals, who let me visit the celestial realms, reinforce these beliefs. I am completely unaware that the immortals are people dressed in costume, and that the celestial realms are part of a programming studio in the labs. I am still too young to learn these secrets, but one day I will, when I am so indoctrinated that learning the truth will no longer matter, other than a vague discontent inside.

I am eight years old. I have been following Mattie, Mattheo, Jerome, Carlotti and others in the labs for years. For the first year, I mainly observed, and was allowed to help change the babies and to weigh them. These are tasks I love since I love being with the babies. I enjoy smiling at them and seeing them smile back, and having them raise their little arms up to me in a gesture begging to be held. I love holding them.

As I got older, I was allowed to do more and more. After all, the expectation is that by the time I am an adult (age 12 in the Order), I will be able to fulfill the role of a trainer. While I will continue learning for the rest of my life, I will have all of the essential skills in place within a few more years.

In order to become a trainer, I have had to study physics, physiology, biochemistry, and human psychology and behavior in my classes in the school.

I go to the labs, dressed in the typical loose scrubs that everyone working in the labs wears, including the children in training. I place my hand and eyes on the biometric security scan, and give the code verbally, which is changed daily. In the morning, Mattie told me today's code, and I know that she and other fathers have told the other children who help in the labs the code as well. I pause at the small altar at the entrance to the lab where daily sacrifices are done, and prick my finger and place a small drop of blood on it. This, or some type of sacrifice, is required when entering these labs that have a figurine of the goddess Shiva to whom the labs are dedicated, over the entrance.

As I walk into the lab, I see that a 12-year-old child is going to be assessed in what we call "tune ups": instead of new programming, this child will have his programming checked for any degradation or fading. If any is detected, he will have to have those areas reprogrammed.

I am to help with the assessment today. I place the preteen in a special chair and tighten the straps on hands, feet and body. I also lower what looks like a small helmet shaped hood over his head. Mattie is there and we start.

She turns on the equipment and a readout of his brain activity shows up on a screen above him. This readout shows how much activity is occurring in various brain areas and is much more complex and thorough than an EEG; it is more like an extremely sophisticated functional MRI, with 3D readouts in various colors of various parameters of brain activity.

As Mattie watches, I ask the child simple assessment questions to start with, such as "Are you having any nightmares?" "Are you eating well?" As questions start to go a bit deeper, she takes over. "Are you happy with your schedule right now?" she asks in a gentle voice. He responds "Yes".

She then turns to me, and says, "What do you see on the brain scans?" I have been taught to read them, and I see that there is no activity that would show unhappiness and tell her this.

She then asks the child, "Is there a father you are unhappy with?"

Suddenly, on the scan, a red area lights up in the limbic area and other brain areas associated with anger and other intense emotions. I read the scans for a while, and Mattie asks, "What do you see on the scans?"

"This question elicited increased brain activity in the emotional centers, indicating that he is probably angry with someone," I say.

Mattie calls out a part named "Mind" who is able to communicate for many parts inside and asks, "Mind, who is Daniel angry with? Can you let us know what happened?"

Mind then factually narrates the events that occurred a few days ago that had caused Daniel to become angry with one of the fathers. He felt that the father was unfair in his discipline for a small prank that Daniel had done. Mind talks about Daniel in the third person, saying "He" when referring to Daniel who is the cult host; Mind sees himself as separate from the other parts that make up Daniel.

"Thank you, Mind, for sharing this information. I will try to help Daniel, and so will Lucia," Mattie says. "You are helping us to help him, and I appreciate it." Mind is then asked to go back inside, and Mattie talks to the cult host.

"I know that you feel that Father Peter is unfair at times," she says. Daniel flushes a bit but does not disagree. She continues, "I want to help you address this by learning to communicate better with him. I think we should go together to see him and find out why he was so strict with you. If he was being unfair, I will stand up for you."

Daniel looks relieved. He knows that Mattie, and in fact, all of the trainers, never make empty promises. One of the rules of the lab is that we must try to always be honest with the people we work with. Otherwise, we cannot ask them to trust us, and an individual that does not trust will be less programmable.

Mattie then turns to me and asks another question, treating me like an adult. This is part of my learning. "How do you think we should approach Father Peter?"

"I think we should first see if there are any videos of the event, including the prank and the discipline, and review them first, to see what happened, before meeting with him," I say. "He will have his opinion of the event; Daniel has his, but the videos can provide important information."

"Good," Mattie says. "Always have as much information at hand as possible. Then what?"

"Then, I would try to find a time when Father Peter is free, and schedule time to meet with him first to discuss the incident. Then, possibly the next day, bring Daniel in, letting him know that if he feels a father is unfair, it is okay to discuss this and to try to resolve the issue."

"Good," Mattie says. "Let's go look at the videos."

We unstrap Daniel, and let him go to lunch, realizing that until we have dealt with his anger and sense of having been unfairly treated, it will be difficult to do further work with him. Part of our assessment has been of his communication skills, and ability to deal with conflict. At the age of 12, while Daniel has adult responsibilities, he may still hesitate to discuss his conflicts with an adult. Our goal is to help him navigate this and learn to do so well.

After reviewing the videos, Mattie and I both agree that Father Peter was a bit harsh the other day; perhaps he was tired, or having a bad day, but we will meet with him later in the day and discuss the incident. Fathers cannot be unfair, even when they are having bad days, or they will not gain the trust and respect of those they mentor and work with. His treatment of Daniel must be addressed and Daniel must have the support needed to share how he feels, and to resolve his feelings of anger. While the technical aspects of the equipment used in the labs are interesting, I am most interested in trying to strategize and solve the complex problems that can arise when human beings interact with each other.

I am ten years old, and Mattie comes over to me at the lab. She and I look at the computerized, real-time graphs on a monitor of one of the six-month old infants, baby Maria.

"She seems to be failing," I say with some dismay. I hate it when an infant fails to thrive which is often due to the extreme stress they are placed under with the intense programming they undergo during their first year of life. It is obvious that Maria is starting to fail. She has lost weight the past few days, is not eating normally, and in the video display I pull up, she has a sad, listless look in her eyes. She is not interacting or playing with the other babies and is slow to respond even to her trainers.

"What should we do?" Mattie asks. She wants me to share what I have learned, and to implement the plan of care that I will outline if it is correct; she will correct me if I am wrong, but this is rare by now. We almost always agree in our assessments and strategies at this point, and she is giving me more and more responsibility.

"She needs time off to rest and interaction with those she is most closely bonded to; she needs to interact with her twins, and have special nurturing by the fathers she loves most."

Mattie nods. "I agree. What else?"

"We need to monitor her very carefully these next few days. She is in a dangerous time, and we can't assume that the interventions will cause her to thrive. But our assessments need to be done carefully and surreptitiously; we can weigh her in her bed and do remote brain scans to see how she is responding. I would also give her extra time in the chairs, being held and rocked, and nursed, by her birth mother (the woman who has the role of being Maria's birthmother, since the original one died at her birth)," I say.

"I agree," Mattie says. "Note the interventions in her schedule and let's start."

I call up by voice the chart and schedule for Maria and tell the computer to cancel all training and to put in the bonding and nurturing interventions, as well as extra weighing and brain scanning for the next two days. Everything in the labs is computerized, and as I watch, Maria's schedule changes, including swapping the trainers who were working with her this week with the two fathers she is most bonded to, as well as special sessions with her birth mother. The fathers and birth mother will have their own schedules updated as well to reflect the changes and will not need to be told why. They can review Maria's chart on their mini tablets and will see that she is starting to fail, and will understand. This is considered a priority because we do not want to lose any babies, so the changes are started immediately.

I go and get Maria's twin sister and twin brother and place them in the crib with Maria. The two of them are overjoyed to be together with her, and they sit and smile at her. Maria looks at them, and her expression is a little less listless. I hope that they and the others who nurture her will bring her back to feeling better.

Later that day, Mattie sees me checking Maria's video display for the umpteenth time.

"Don't worry, she will probably be fine," she says. She sits down next to me, looks me in the eyes, and says, "I know how hard this is. I care, too. I love Maria. But we can only do our best and hope she responds. You can't will her to be better; she has to want to live."

I wonder how Mattie knows that I have been trying to theta Maria with "live!" entreaties. But this is Mattie, one of the people I am closest to on earth, i.e., one of my primary trainers. Of course, she knows what I am doing.

"You are forbidden to look at her videos or charts for the next ten hours," Mattie tells me. "Go and do something else for a while." Easier said than done, but she is trying to teach me to distance myself a bit and to not get overinvolved which is difficult.

The next morning, I see that the birthmother has put Maria in a baby sling, much as she did when Maria was younger. Maria looks happier and is even nursing a bit. I think she will get over her failure to thrive and I am glad. I know I am a bit too attached, I care too much, but I love each of the babies, and want them to do well, and to live.

It never occurs to me that years ago, a team of trainers looked at my own failure to thrive and treated me the same way. That is a distant memory buried in a tunnel deep in my own system.

These memories describe the multifaceted process of a young child being trained to be a programmer while growing up in a training facility. First, the adults model the behav-

two for years before they heard my story. Each offered me accountability and safety for a time, a gift without measure in a world that all too often seems to treat the survivor trying to break free as an adult as if their pain, grief and trauma are their fault, unbelievable, or something to be avoided knowing about. I am also grateful for the counselors (whose high fees were more than worth it), and prayer ministers who have also helped me during my healing journey. I will always be grateful for the gift that each has given me, simply by not abandoning me when I shared my pain with them.

But even then, I had to deal with the expectations of the kind helpers from a world that cannot understand what it is like to grow up in a facility. The expectation was that I would feel, "Oh, my gosh, thank you for helping me to be free," (I am grateful, but that took time) and that I would hate the evil cult. This "evil" was my brother who saved my life when we were hanging from a rope off of a mountainside when I was twelve years old, because of an equipment failure, and later shared a hot meal and conversation filled with laughter. This "evil" was my twin sister, the one I had sat with and whispered secrets to late at night, the sister who attended my wedding in France, the sister who played with me, wept with me, and comforted me growing up. This "evil" I was expected to reject so utterly was the fathers who held me, gave me a bottle as a baby, who comforted me when I cried, and who desperately tried to keep me alive in an extremely dangerous environment. This "evil" was my children, who I had nursed and loved for years. The face of this "evil" was the people I loved most on earth, and I could not agree that leaving the cult meant that I had to hate them.

They did not understand. And this made the healing journey so much, much harder. This is one reason I am sharing my story. For those that can hear it, perhaps it will help them understand better, even if a little, a world that seems to defy comprehension for those not born into it.

Chapter 11: Christmas in the Vatican

I am ten years old, and like all of the children, I have been looking forward to Christmas for weeks. Although we are undergoing occultic training and mind control, the Order still celebrates Christmas with extra time off, special treats (is there anything so wonderful as the flavor of marzipan, or of a rich fruitcake?), and best of all, we are allowed to make special presents and give them to those we love.

Of course, Christmas does not have the Christian trappings or connotations seen in most places that celebrate it. No crèches or nativity scenes here, and the carols and songs this time of year have instead have been adapted to carry occult meanings. “O come, O come, Emmanuel” our choirs sing poignantly, all the while being taught that we are waiting for our own messiah, “He Who Is To Come” who will bring peace and joy to the world. We are waiting for our world leader, and this song expresses our longing for his advent. “Joy to the World” is sung joyfully in anticipation of his birth.

I recall the first time I saw the painting, “The Light of the World”, that hangs in the Black Pope’s secret office. Painted in the mid-1800s, this enormous painting (it covers half of a wall that is fifteen feet long) shows people representing the various nations of the world, dressed surprisingly in modern dress, with hands upraised towards a blond, blue-eyed man with a charismatic gaze. This man stands at the top of the painting and receives their adoration. I have been told that this man will be born in my lifetime, and that even I could be part of bringing him into the world. All that I know is that like the other members of the Order, I look forward to his coming. When he comes, we will no longer have to be hidden behind closed doors; we and the other 12 great societies (the international occultic groups) and the Asian occultic societies, will be able to come out openly, and will be favored by him.

But that is the future, and Christmas is almost here. For months, I have been making presents for my classmates and the three fathers I love most. I have painted a picture for Danny, my brother, who loves art. I have made Lizzie a small sculpture of a house in the hills of Tuscany that she especially admired when we visited there after a training exercise. All of us children have been taught various arts and crafts as part of our development and to encourage creativity, and these gifts represent giving up precious free time to create them.

I have knit scarves for many of my classmates in their favorite colors to wear when we next have a cold weather training exercise. I have sculpted a beautiful rose for Father Jerome and tinted it with soft creams that are the colors of his rose. I have created a belt that has been tooled with engravings for Father Carlotti who I know especially likes leather. I want what I create for Mattheo to be held next to his body, so I sew a special vest in soft linen and embroider it to wear under his robe on cooler days. The embroidery is of his favorite flowers, including roses and lilies. It is so much fun to create these presents, wrap them, and then wait until Christmas day when we can give them to one another.

On Christmas day, we are all up bright and early. All the children have small boxes at the ends of their beds, and we all give cries of delight as we look in them, and take out oranges, pomegranates, dried fruit as well as nuts. We will share them with each other, because in the Order, we are taught to share with each other very young, and enjoy doing so. This is half the fun, the sharing.

I take my presents to Lizzie and Danny in their rooms. They are in a different class than mine so they sleep in their own class’ dormitory. They love their presents, and then they give me mine. Danny has sculpted a small bird out of clay that he fired, and I love it. Danny especially loves birds and spends part of his free time watching them flying. Sometimes I wonder if they represent a deep, inner desire to be free from the demands and rules of the Order, but I never ask him. Some things are better left unasked. I love the bird and give him a big hug, saying "Thank you!"

Lizzie gives me her gift. She is very good at crocheting, and has crocheted me a beautiful, jaunty little cap in my favorite colors. I give her a big hug, and then I go and get my class, and we go for a special treat in the communal dining room of hot cocoa with whipped cream and waffles with berries. I have my other presents to give the fathers in a small bag with me, but I want to give them to each when we can be alone. I want this gift-giving to be a private event, even though I share most other things with others.

Later in the afternoon, I see Mattheo and run to him. "I have something for you," I tell this father I love so much.

"Let's go to my office," he says, understanding that I want to give my gift privately. We go in, and he closes the doors so that visitors will knock before entering.

I hand him my present, and his eyes tear up. He knows the time and effort it took to design this vest, and then to embroider it. I have been working on it during part of my free time, and before falling asleep at night, for the past seven months.

"I will cherish this always," he says, and puts it on and buttons the silk buttons. I am pleased, more than I can express, as I see his pleasure in this gift.

"I have something for you," he says.

I am surprised and pleased because the fathers usually never give gifts to the children. While I am his top pupil, and he has been mentoring me for years, I am still touched that he took time from his busy schedule to find me a Christmas present. I open it: it is a beautiful painting of a spot near the mountains in northern Italy that I especially love. We conducted some of our military training there this past year, and afterwards, I spent my R&R hiking the mountains and sailing the lakes surrounded by tree-covered mountains. This painting shows Danny, Lizzie and me sailing on the lake, laughing together. I realize that he has painted this for me to remind me of this happy time.

"Thank you," I say, with tears in my eyes. "I will treasure this, too."

While I am not allowed to keep personal items in my dormitory room, other than a candle and medals won for high achievement, I will store this gift from the father I love in a special storage locker I have, with items that I will one day decorate my room with when I am a father. For once I become a father myself, I will move out of the dormitory and have a room of my own, which I can decorate with personal items. This will occur in two years, and already Mattheo is trying to provide things that will help me with the transition from communal living to privacy.

I go back to the communal dining room, where at one end stands a huge Christmas tree, decorated with garlands of popcorn, fruit, candies and candles. During the day, all of us children are allowed to pick treats off of this tree, and within 24 hours it is picked nearly clean of everything except its candles. At night, we enter in and sing together, as the lit tree glows in the darkened room. It all feels holy and reverent, and I love the smell of the pine tree which has been brought in from the mountains to the north the previous day. It reminds me of hiking in the mountains that I love so much.

After singing, we have a small service. Of course, there is the evening sacrifice, and then we return to bed, to laugh and chat and remember the fun of this day.

Over the next few days, we all have a lighter-than-normal schedule, since it is the end of the year and we are preparing for a great event that will happen soon: Epiphany.

Chapter 12: The Gift of the Magi

Epiphany, or the twelfth day of Christmas, is the day that tradition says the magi brought their gifts to the Christ child. But at the Vatican training facility, the gift that is coming has nothing to do with Christianity, and everything to do with something the fathers love most: our new batch of babies.

Over the week of January 6th, the new batch of babies is born. The fertilization and implantation of the eggs are carefully timed so that the births occur during this week. While the babies are born over the week, the evening before Epiphany, the gift of the magi, is counted as the birthday of the babies born into the group. All the fathers are involved in the births and rituals following birth. The logistics and manpower required for the births and rituals is why the births are spread out over the week, rather than all occurring on January 5th.

The fathers believe that each generation of babies are the hope of the Order, and they look forward expectantly to meeting them. For months, they have been talking to the fetuses in the womb, since the birth mothers have been brought to our facility for this purpose. The fetuses have already bonded to the fathers' voices, and they are looking forward to meeting them in person.

There is an air of rushed, yet professional, expectancy as the birth mothers are prepped for the birth, and labor is started. One by one, the babies are born in careful timing, and the three fathers that the newborn will bond to first, the fathers they will love most, are present at each infant's birth. As soon as the infant is born, the birth mother is torn in two and killed, and the terrible words "You are so evil, you killed her," are spoken to the newborn. I am allowed to watch two births, and I feel funny in my stomach when I watch the birth mothers pulled apart with a special tool. The crying, wailing infant is picked up, and the father starts to suffocate it. "Only Satan can give you life. Do you wish to live?" the father says, asking the infant psychically to give permission for a demon to enter it. Most babies fight against demons entering them, but they also want to live. Most give permission, and then the father breathes into their mouth and nostrils, and the baby continues crying. I have heard (but not personally seen yet) that occasionally an infant refuses, and it ends up dying before it has taken its first breath, suffocated because of its refusal to agree to what the father asks.

I wonder why some babies agree, and some refuse, and later, I ask this question to Mattheo. "Why do some babies refuse to take the life that Satan offers them?" I ask. "Why are they so different?"

"Because some are still clinging too much to their mortality, and would rather die than become immortal," he says. "Becoming an immortal is a gift, but not all want to receive it."

"But couldn't the baby be allowed to live, anyway?" I ask. Something about this process bothers me, and my ten-year old mind is trying to understand our ways.

"No, Luce, a baby that refuses the life that Satan offers would refuse everything it was offered later on. It would be in constant pain, and would end up dying soon anyway," Mattheo says. I wonder how he knows, and wonder if in the past, they let some of the refusing babies live.

I am bothered by the birthing ceremonies, and the terrible death of the birthmothers. It stirs up something vague and uneasy deep inside, but I have already forgotten my own similar birth. I have also had years of the fathers explaining to me why it is necessary that the birthmother dies. In spite of their explanations couched in occultic theology, it still feels wrong, deep inside.

But the next morning, the fun begins. Mattheo has assigned me to be a helper with two of the babies that he will be a primary trainer to. While I cannot be a primary trainer until I am a full father, right now I can be a helper, and I love attending these helpless, soft, red and wrinkled little babies. They spend a lot of time sleeping, but I help change them, take them to the female fathers who nurse them, and help make baby slings so that the fathers can carry the babies around as they work. These babies have had a traumatic time in the womb, and during birth, and the fathers are careful to nurture these babies and provide lots of love during the first few weeks of life. There will be training sessions started, of course; but I love simply gazing at the babies, watching them blink, squint and yawn, and place a finger inside their tiny hands. I am always surprised at how strong their grasp is, for such a tiny little being.

I help to weigh the babies and assess them; I have learned these and many other skills in the past ten years of training and can do lots of tasks and help identify any problems or unusual events that occur. These babies, born on Epiphany, really do feel like a gift, even though no magi have brought them to the labs. Instead, they have been brought in on schedule within the wombs of their unfortunate birthmothers, who will never hold or be able to speak to these precious little babies.

Because the children in the order are conceived in a laboratory, the timing of birth can be timed quite precisely, especially with drugs that can induce labor. These births are anticipated with great excitement each year, and the entire schedule for that week will be designed to assign fathers and babies to one another for the process of bonding and attachment outside the womb, to augment that which was already done while the baby was inside the birthmother. The children who are 13 and have completed the coming of age ceremony (see next chapter) are especially excited, because now they will be allowed to mentor a baby of their own and train it.

Chapter 13: Coming of Age

I am twelve years old, and I have just finished my schooling at the end of my twelfth year. I am no longer in school and am spending my days working in the programming labs, helping teach some of the younger children, and doing other tasks, while also living for several weeks in each of my hosting presentations around the world. Months pass as I work in my role as a young trainer and help to teach the younger children in their classes. I also help with planning military training exercises for the younger children, along with my classmates. We are all busy, and several months pass by quickly.

Finally, early summer comes, when I am thirteen years and a half years old. Today is a day that I have looked forward to for years: the day that I become a father in the Jesuit Order. After today, I will have traded my brown acolyte robes and rope belt for the black robes of a father. Instead of being addressed as "Luce", I will be addressed as "Father Luke", for all fathers in the order have male names, even though their birth names reflect their real gender.

The rest of my class is as excited and nervous as I am. I know that the other classes feel the same way. We wander and talk aimlessly, but mostly are quiet, waiting to go to the place where our lives will change forever.

Soon, Mattheo and the other fathers come, and signal to us that it is time to go. We get into a van and drive to the shore. We then are taken by boat to an island off the coast of Italy. This island is owned by the Order and is never visited by those outside of the Order. There is excellent security by air, land and water so intruders cannot land there; they will be stopped long before they reach its shores.

The other three classes are there, along with mine. Each class will go to a different part of the island. Our class lines up in an area that is filled with golden painted poles. On each pole is tied a human being, of varying ages, between newborn and octogenarian elderly, pregnant mothers, and whole families. There are cries and moans on the wind from the individuals who are tied up, waiting, for what, they do not know.

But I know. This is a special ceremony, a very special ritual, which each father must undergo before joining the order. At the edge of the field, I am given a golden knife, and each of my classmates is also given one. There are one thousand people tied to poles, and the field looks like a harvest crop of human beings, humans whose hair blows softly in the breeze, humans whose soft cries of bewilderment and fear are carried towards me. I hear the cries of the babies and toddlers, who dislike being tied in place. They sound fretful now, but I know that their cries will change soon. I have watched this ceremony before as a spectator sitting in a curved raised area that surrounds part of this enormous field.

There are tables with golden chalices, and as instructed, my classmates and I each pick one up. We wait. An opening chant of praise to Satan and other deities is done. This day and each of us are dedicated to them; the chant asks these beings to give us the strength to do what we must today.

Then, a golden tone sounds, and as instructed, we begin. I begin killing people, slashing their throats, trying to be quick so that their screams and hoarse cries are cut off quickly. One by one, I go down a row, killing, slashing, and collecting some of the blood in my chalice. When it is full, I go to a huge bronze bowl, and pour the blood in, where it mixes with an anti-clotting powder that is stirred by helpers who stand nearby.

I continue killing, because this sacrifice is the gift that I must give to the immortals to prove that I am ready to become a father. It is a warm day, and soon I am sweating, but I continue; a baby is quickly killed, the blood gathered; then a child, then an elderly lady. With each death, I am feeling more and more tired; I feel an exhaustion that cannot be explained by the physical act. I am feeling inside of me the weight of these deaths. I feel depressed and saddened, but I must continue.

I go down another line, and kill and collect blood from 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 people of all ages. By now, the adults are screaming as they realize what is happening, and the infants are wailing at the top of their lungs. The toddlers are screaming as well. I am so tired. I go to a table, where I am given watered wine by one of the helpers, as I am hot, thirsty, and want my senses dulled; doing this killing is starting to feel unbearable, but I know that I must continue if I want to become a father.

Mechanically, I continue, going down another line of people: 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, collecting the blood from each. I am feeling heavy and as if a great weight is pressing me down: death has a weight, and I am feeling it. I look around, and see my classmates looking tired and haggard, just as I do. I wonder if we will all make it through.

I take another drink of the watered wine. One of the helpers, an older father, whispers encouragement to me. "You are doing well, you can do this," he says.

I go back and continue killing another line of people. This time, I kill the babies first; I can't stand to hear their screaming wails. After that, I kill the toddlers, and then the adults. 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, collecting the blood from each and pouring it into the large basin. I am starting to feel numb; it feels as if my arms, legs and heart are turning into stone. I have killed before, but never so many at one time, and my limbs feel heavier and heavier. I go back and get more watered wine; I wipe my face, neck and hands with a watered towel, wondering if I will ever feel clean again; this goes deeper than the skin.

I continue, working my way down the lines: 36, 37, 38, 39...59, collecting and pouring blood, taking rests. I am aware that the helpers there who help me wipe my face and hands, who provide me with drinks when I am thirsty, are also helping keep careful count of how many people we have each killed. I know that I must kill 84 people today; others in my class will kill either 83 or 84, but we must together kill all of the people on this field. But I am tired, so tired. I am sad, so sad. I don't want to keep going.

"Keep going," the helper whispers to me. "You don't have that many more." I look at him and wonder how he made it through his own coming of age ceremony. But this feels less like a ceremony, and more like...a killing field...this is how I think of this, secretly, inside. I am at a killing field, and I feel like a killing machine instead of a human being.

I keep going. 60, 61, 62, 63...I am now up to 80, I have slashed, stabbed and gathered blood from so many. I am splattered with blood myself. I have trouble lifting the knife, I am so weary. All I want is to lay down, and never get up again. I wonder if anyone has died from the crushing weight of so many deaths, from this act of merciless slaying of others who cannot fight back. I hate myself, utterly, and think about turning the knife on myself. I know that the helpers are there, watching carefully, monitoring us to prevent such acts. I see my "helper" coming closer to me, as if he can discern my thoughts. Sighing, I go over and take another drink of watered wine. I am a little drunk by now, but not incapacitated. I need this numbing, and once again, I take up my knife and continue. 81, collect the blood in my chalice; 82, collect the blood; 83, collect the blood, 84, collect the blood. I am done. I have finished. I have killed 84 people today, and I take my chalice and for the final time, I pour the blood into the container.

"Good, good, congratulations, Father Luke!" the helper says. I see Mattheo, Jerome, and Carlotti coming over as well to congratulate me.

But I don't care. I am filled with an utter, utter self-hatred of myself for being capable of this act. I am filled with a deep despair, and I fall down, completely spent. I can no longer stand and give in to the deep weariness and crushing sense of weight that I feel: the blood guilt of so many people killed for no reason other than this sacrifice was "demanded" by beings that I increasingly hate for these, and other demands.

But I cannot say this out loud. It would break the hearts of the fathers I love, who come over to me. "Congratulations, Father Luke!" they each say in turn. For months, I have longed to hear myself called this name; it is the culmination of 13 years of intense training and effort. But I no longer care what I am called. I just want to lay down and die.

The fathers gather around me and help me to a bench where I lay down. They seem to understand how difficult this is for me. Through half-closed eyes, I watch as my other classmates are continuing. I am the first to finish, but Conner finishes soon after, then Mary Margaret, then Timothy, and soon the others are done. Our class has completed the killings, but like me, they are all exhausted and depleted, and are laying down as well.

I know that there will be a special banquet tonight in our honor. We will be given our black robes, and for the first time each of us will wear a rose pinned to our black robes, and will be called by our father names. But I do not really care anymore. I wonder if it is worth it and decide that it is not.

I hate the name "Father Luke" deep inside beneath conscious thought, because I realize that the cost has been too high. Today, I lost an important part of myself, and the senseless killing has made me realize that I have done what I hate and abhor, but I was too frightened to say "no". I was too conditioned from a lifetime of training in obedience to say, "This is insane!", too loyal to those I love to break their hearts. But today, at the killing field, my heart has been broken, and something very important – the humanity inside – has been irrevocably broken as well. I will never forgive the people I have loved for bringing me to this point, and placing me in this unbearable situation to carry out this intolerable act.

I am thirteen years old – still a child – but I feel very old, very weary, as if the weight of the world and my own sin, is on my shoulders. Oh, I will pretend tonight that I am happy - I will smile and act accordingly. I will continue to show how proud I am of my black robes and of being a father in the Order.

But I also realize that I deeply, deeply want to become free of this. I have just become a father, and I realize that I want to leave.

I understand that a coming of age ritual described as above may seem unbelievable to some. When this memory returned, I reeled for weeks from it. The sheer amount of death, the lack of value for human life, staggered me as the feelings, the taste of watered wine in my mouth, the heat and exhaustion of that day, feeling the stickiness of blood and its itch, returned. How I wish that this was fiction, and not a memory!

However, this is indeed how the Jesuits turn a young teen into a full father: by destroying part of the child's humanity. By having them participate in something so grievous, so terrible, that creates such guilt, that the mind cannot endure it, which ensures ongoing secrecy and that the vows of silence and loyalty will never be broken.

"We know what you are, and only we can love you," as the fathers tell the child frequently when growing up, and during reprogramming as they become adults, seems all too believable after going through this terrible ceremony. It feels very, very true that no one who has not been part of this evil could ever truly accept the child who has participated in this. It took me a very long time to realize that the God of the Bible could forgive this – even this. That I was not destined for hell because I had done this when I was still a child. But He does forgive even this, and more, because of the gift of His Son, Jesus, who bore all of this guilt on Himself when He died on the cross.

That is great love. That is great mercy, mercy beyond understanding. But it is real.

Chapter 14: Wedded to Satan

I am thirteen years old, just three months after becoming a full father. I am now called “Father Luke” by others (although in private, those closest to me still call me Luce). In public, I call Danny, Lizzie, Conner, Mary Margaret, Timothy, Andrew and others by their father names. There is another ceremony to go through today, a ceremony that I have been carefully prepared for years, by the fathers. A ceremony that I have carefully fasted and purified myself for. Today is my wedding day.

It is evening on a day when the air is warm but a soft breeze carries the smell of flowers on it. I am standing at one end of a wooded grove that has a long pathway down the middle, a pathway that is covered by a red silken carpet. On each side of the path stand men and women in their best dress. The women are dressed in top designer gowns with full skirts. Each person is carrying a lit candle in their hands. The multitude of jewels covering the women’s dresses twinkle in the candlelight.

The men are in full evening dress, including vests, top hats, bow ties and long tailed jackets. Their lit candles are reflected in the shine of their suits. These men and women are leaders of the twelve occultic societies, as well as carefully selected world leaders who have been initiated generationally into the secrets of the occult world, and they are here as honored guests at my wedding.

Today, I will marry Satan.

I am dressed in a beautiful wedding dress of purest white, and a golden circlet that rests on my head. I am wearing diamonds everywhere. They are scattered in my hair, and I wear diamond bracelets on my wrists, diamond anklets, and diamond necklaces that sparkles in the candlelight. My curly hair is gathered up, with loose tendrils falling along the sides of my face.

I am excited and nervous. I am holding a beautiful bouquet of white roses in my hands, which are tightly clenched. Up on a raised dais, I see Theo, the beautiful form of Satan, who is awaiting me. His black hair and eyes shine in the candlelight, and he is dressed in a formal black tuxedo. He glances at me, and I tremble with adoration. Maria, the part who is in love with Theo, is out. She has been prepared since earliest childhood for this ceremony and anticipates becoming his bride.

Her name, Maria, signifies her role as a spiritual being in my system. This part is a celestial mother figure whom the Order hopes will be able to achieve the highest honor a female mortal can: bearing Satan’s child. In the Order’s theology, this child will be the much longed for and hoped for “light of the world”, a world leader over the coming New World Order. Christians have dubbed him “antichrist” but this is not what the Order calls him. They call him “anointed one”.

An organ sitting on a stone platform behind me begins softly playing the strains of “Ave Maria”. This is my wedding song, and for the rest of my life, will be one of my system’s biggest triggers, a reminder of the day I became Satan’s wife.

Of course, I understand that Satan has several wives; he is a polygamist. Mary Margaret will also be wed to him, and Lizzie, and other female fathers, fathers deemed worthy of this high honor because of their participation in the coming of age ceremony, which is in essence a huge sacrifice to Satan. I also know that he weds women from various occultic groups around the world. But today, it is my day.

There have been sacrifices all day long, starting at dawn. And now I, a mere mortal, will be in a sense another sacrifice. I will join my mortal body with this being. For the oracles have foretold that the light of the world’s entrance to the mortal realms would be linked to me. How, we are not sure, but this wedding is part of the hope.

The soft strains of the organ swell, and at a measured pace, Mattheo, the father I love most, holds my arm gently and walks me down the aisle. As we pass by, the guests lining the sides of the pathway bow in honor to me. Then, we approach the dais, and Mattheo turns and stands close to it below the steps, while I slowly walk up the steps to the platform above to meet Theo.

His smile is beautiful and charming, and his eyes look like two polished onyx stones, deep and black.

He takes my hand, and I say my wedding vows to him, promising to love and serve him forever, to never forsake my love for him. I bow before him, kiss his feet, and then I turn and do a sacrifice on an altar that is near us both.

Then, Theo takes me in his arms and carries me to a large white bed that is located on the dais. It is in full view of all of the guests, and in this public place, under the watchful eyes of all, Theo rapes me, slowly and painfully, over and over again.

After a while, I pass out from the emotional, physical and spiritual pain. I go unconscious, but this is not uncommon. Human beings do not like being physically and spiritually assaulted by the demonic, and this is an extreme assault.

It is the next morning, and Mattheo gently wakes me. I have been unconscious all night. Jerome, Carlotti, Lizzie and Dannie are there with me.

“You did well,” Mattheo says. I realize that this means he is glad that I survived a ceremony that has killed others.

“I love you,” Lizzie says. I embrace her. I feel exhausted and can barely raise my head off of the bed.

“You were beautiful last night,” says Jerome.

Today, I am dressed in a silk nightgown, so someone undressed me and washed the blood off. I lost a lot of blood the night before; I can feel the special weakness that means that I am drained and anemic.

Dannie, ever thoughtful Dannie, hands me a cup of broth filled with nutrients. He smiles quietly at me, but I see the sadness that flashes for just a moment in my brother’s eyes. He knows, and I know, that I will never be quite the same again. I love him for understanding how sad this makes me, too. I smile quietly back and sip the broth. But inside, I am planning my escape, an escape that I now realize that I must make. Because last night made me realize that if I do not, the sheer evil that I have encountered could kill me – even me – strong as I am.

Ten months later, I try to escape the Order for the first time.

Afterword

This book has been about my memories from the first 13 ½ years of growing up in the Jesuit Order. It is not all my memories, but only the ones that I felt would best illustrate what it was like. The most important thing that my memories illustrate is the intentional use of attachment and bonding by the Jesuit fathers who raised me, and its impact on me over a lifetime. It is terrible, indeed, when a young child who has no other alternative for escape is forced to bond to abusers who themselves were raised in an evil environment. For the child will bond in order to survive. My hope is that this book will show the necessity for those who support survivors to provide safe, healthy relationships, and to help the survivor to grow in the skills needed to develop such relationships with many others. By relationships, I do not mean "re-parenting", because that is not possible; I only mean 'relationships' – friendships with healthy, non-dissociative people who accept the survivor regardless of their past.

I believe that the lifetime of bonding and attachment between cult members from the earliest childhood, as I describe in my book, is one of the main issues that makes it very difficult for people to leave highly organized cults. If an individual attempts to leave the cult, which means in groups such as the Order, leaving father, mother, sister, brother, children and closest friends, the question is then legitimately raised: Leave for what? Who will love the survivor who is getting free, a freedom that involves breaking off with those the survivor has loved for a lifetime? Understanding and answering these questions in a safe, healthy way is one thing that I believe could promote more individuals leaving the many organized cult groups that manipulate attachment needs.

About the Author

Since 1999, svali has written articles and led online groups to help educate survivors and the public regarding dissociation, ritual abuse, mind control and the work of organized occult groups internationally. Her articles and free book (Breaking the Chain) have been translated into five languages and read by both survivors and therapists around the world. Her book about how programming is done and suggestions on how to heal, It's Not Impossible, has been used by survivors, therapists, prayer ministers and those who support survivors from around the world to gain a greater understanding of these topics.

A former trainer for an international occultic group, she left the group sixteen years ago, and currently helps to educates others about topics related to ritual abuse and mind control through articles and podcast interviews.

Never Give Up -Chapter 3 Excerpt

I am sharing here some excerpts from my book, Never Give Up. This is the first portion of chapter 3 in the book.

Chapter 3: Toddlerhood

My birth name is Lucient, but my daily name is Lucia. I am usually called Luce. This is the name of my ‘cult host’, or the part that presents during my cult life in the facility. As my cult life was the majority of my life until my escape in 2007, with only limited time in the presentations in different countries, Luce is the part of me who feels most like the ‘real me’.

Mengele and Hilde work with me still, although my main influence are the fathers I love. Mengele and Hilde praise me for doing well and acting “intelligently” in different situations, but as Luce, I looked forward each day to the time I get to spend with the fathers I love.

For the first three years of life, life was regimented according to a strict routine. Early morning assessments are done quickly, with the fathers checking at regular intervals if prior programs installed are still intact. In between, there is holding and cuddling; these times too is scheduled. Later in the day, I learn the new day’s task(s). There is always, always something new to be learned or practice designed to build further on old skills previously learned.

I felt like a miniature performer as the tasks continued day after day: learn to swim (and see how long I could endure in the water in one early test); learn to crawl across a narrow bridge with water on both sides, and see if I could push another baby crawling across the same bridge into the water; learn to open my little legs on cue from a trainer (for sexual training); learn to switch out parts on cue with colored five years old, the children wear brown tunics and leggings, then graduate to an acolyte’s hooded brown robes at six years old. The older children find us younger children adorable. They enjoy interacting with me and the other infants, and will often come by and stroke our little cheeks and hands, or tell us that one day we will be big and have fun like they do. I love this attention and want to grow up to wear an acolyte's brown robe one day, and eventually at 13 years old, complete the coming of age ceremony and earn my adult name. I know that this will require learning many, many new skills and knowledge, and at this age, as the cult host, I am eager to learn.

Years later, when I was healing, I had trouble with the term "host", and especially its definition: an amnesic part that lives a life without abuse, or any knowledge of abuse. My host knew well that she was being raised within an occultic society. This was the only world she knew both as a child and as an adult. She knew about much of the abuse, and about the parts. She was allowed to watch and help monitor the different parts that presented when living in various countries. She was also one of my most deeply cult-loyal parts, because with all of her heart, she loved the fathers she had attached to. This feeling was true even during adulthood, which made leaving the order later in life very, very difficult. I missed the fathers when I didn't see or hear from them regularly, and not talking to them would trigger intense grief.

I am 12 months old. Father Jerome has tied me to his waist with a thick rope. He is playing the role of a system controller. My role is to obey everything he tells me, quickly and without error.

"Pick up those blocks," he says, "and stack the red ones together and the blue ones together." I quickly kneel by the blocks and do this task. When I am done, he says, "Good, good." In my role as a system part, I am learning how important instant obedience to my controllers is. The rope represents authority. The controller, being played today by Father Jerome, is always wearing the rope, and the system parts are tied to the controller by ropes.

It is a few days later. We are walking quickly and go to a field with lots of rocks. "Pick up the rocks, and put them in this corner of the field," he orders, pointing near the intersection of two stone walls. I begin picking up rocks while he oversees what I do. I am little and tire quickly, and his job is to encourage me to complete the task. Finally, we rest.

"You are listening well, and I am proud of you, Delta 34" he says. Jerome is dressed as Orgus, one of my delta controllers, and even in this menial task, I must obey him. The rocks represent memories, and he is teaching me to take them and put them in the correct area of the field. The field is divided up into squares labeled with various names and runes. I must match the rock and its rune with the storage rune.

After a period of rest, we eat some bread and drink some water then go back to our task. "Delta 34, put these memories into this storage file," Orgus commands, pointing to an area of the field marked with a rune that means "Low security". Quickly, obediently, I do so. "Delta 34, pass this memory into this file," he commands again, and I take the rock into a storage file marked "Medium security." I already know that rocks that are "high security" must be passed back to Orgus, to put into a special high security vault deep beneath us.

I am 18 months old. I have a rope tied around my waist. I am a gamma system controller, and tied to me by thick ropes are small children of my own age. There are six children. I have been told that my job is to ensure that they are completely obedient to me. These children represent my system parts. My job is to protect them by ensuring obedience to all commands from the programmers.

The children and I walk together into different rooms in the house. I have to tug on the ropes of a few to get them to follow. One room is painted with bright yellow walls, and this color, and the huge table in the middle of the room, attract us all. The children and I eagerly walk towards the table, where there are piles of candies in glass bowls.

The children are hungry, since they have not eaten yet, and it is midday. They begin pulling me towards the table. “No, no, children!” I say desperately. “We were told not to touch the candy.”

I try to pull them away, but I am not strong enough to stop all of them pulling at me at once. One little girl, who looks so much like me, grabs a piece of soft divinity off the table and starts eating it. I try to pull her away, but it is too late; she has disobeyed the order.

Suddenly, she jerks in a violent seizure, turning blue. The other children stop their own rush towards the table. With frightened eyes we watch as this child continues seizing, and then dies. The candy must have poison in it, and she has disobeyed and died as a result. But I am responsible for her obedience, and with guilt and shame, realize that it is my fault that she died.

Pleiades (Father Carlotti) comes into the room and looks with anger and disgust at what has happened. “You killed her!” he tells me. “You didn’t make sure she obeyed you! A controller always makes sure that their system obeys them. You failed her!”

I feel terrible, but worse is to come. Now, as I move with the children around the house, I must drag this dead child around with me.

“You are feeling the weight of your failure,” Pleiades (Father Carlotti) says. I feel terrible, and start crying. A child, one put into my care, has died, because I failed to ensure her obedience to a command from the master controller for my system. I crumple to the floor, heartbroken, as I weep.

He then gives another command. “Do not let any of the children touch the toys in the blue room.” The blue room is one we saw when walking through, but on this round of the house, I see toys on the floor: blocks of various colors, puzzles, picture books, and sparkly, beautiful dolls and balls. The children, who seem intent on disobeying me in spite of what happened in the yellow room, try to pull me over with them to the toys on the floor.

“No, no, children, no!” I scream. I pull with all of my strength, trying to pull them away. But the children wear me down, and one of them picks up a shiny red ball. Suddenly, there is a scream, and the child falls down dead. With a feeling of despair, I realize that this toy, too, contains poison. I am now dragging two dead children around from the ropes tied to my waist, and I am very tired. But the other children are now very quiet and seem willing to listen to me when I tell them not to touch anything at all in the house unless I give them permission. We sit in the middle of a red room, and Pleiades (Father Carlotti) enters. “You may all have a drink of juice,” he says, and he pours out a cup for each of us. The juice tastes good, and I am relieved that no death results.

The children and I stay in this terrible house for two days. I am dragging the two dead children, reminders of what happens when system controller allows parts to disobey their master controller. During the day, Pleiades (Father Carlotti) comes at intervals, and lets us eat, or allows us to play with only certain toys, or rest. The children, who are still alive, and I sleep together, utterly exhausted by the end of the day, tied together, on a mat on the floor.

By the second day, the bodies of the two children who died begin to smell. The other children and I feel ill from the smell, and Pleiades (Father Carlotti) returns. “You are smelling the stench of disobedience,” he tells us. I wonder how long I must drag these bodies around. I am feeling tired, ill, and sick of it all.

Finally, Pleiades returns again, gives a code, and I go inside. He then unties me from the children, and Lucia, my cult host, is sent out to take a shower and then rest in my dorm room. I am tired indeed and realize that being a controller is a great responsibility. The lives of those under me depend upon my ensuring complete obedience. I go to sleep, dreaming of saving children, while I am yelling orders at them, frantic to save their lives.

This memory caused me to cry for days when I first had it. I felt overwhelmed by guilt, sadness, grief, and then, finally, anger at Carlotti and the other fathers for putting me through such a terrible setup at such a young age. This is how the Jesuits train the internal controllers and master controllers to do their jobs: it is at the threat of loss of life if they should fail, not just for them, but for those they are supposed to protect.

I now realized why for years, my system controllers had been fighting me so hard, when I asked them to stop doing their cult jobs. They were desperately, desperately, trying to save the lives of children that they loved. They were terrified to disobey the master controllers over them inside, who I had yet to meet at that point in my healing. The lessons of absolute obedience, of never failing, and of controlling inside parts, had been instilled through this and numerous similar setups.

I read this whole book. It's very encouraging how God showed up in the dark places you were in! I'm also horrified by how at least some of pop culture has shown up in your books as being actual, real things and not just fantasy. Thank you for being who God made you to be – a truth teller, and so much more.

REVELATUM

Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall, 1818

Preface

In this year of 1818, no more than seven centuries have passed in which the foundations were laid for the Brotherhood of Knights Templar in the year 1120. From that time they increased in such a size that they could boast in their many thousands of horses while continually growing strong by their very costly possessions in Europe and Asia. They were to be feared for their might, spiritual and temporal, yet within less than two centuries they became extinct due to a most grievous disaster. During this same time wars were undertaken to take back Christ's sepulcher from the hands of unbelievers. Also the infamous order of murderers best known as Assassins emerged (as if from the turbulent sea of Islamic heresy) in the Orient, similarly proceeding about two centuries before being uprooted shortly before the abolition of the Knights Templar by the combined ecclesiastical and secular authority, for they were offensive to both Caliphs and Sultans.

In the history of this most shameful covenant, (which simultaneously appears with this dissertation in the German language from the press of Cotta [i]) we have already taken note regarding the civil connection between the Assassins and Templars, all of which sheds new light on this subject when considering the secret doctrine of the temple. Each of these orders covered up their choice of ambition with a cloak of piety, while proving their piety worthless by submitting to earthly lust. They continually practiced these wicked disciplines in secret, increasingly storing up this mystery of evil till nothing could hold it back from bursting forth to so great an extent it became common knowledge. They were thus pursued by Pontiff and King with anathema and sword atoning those occult dogmas with their blood, extinguishing this conflagration with their own ruin.

The history of the Brotherhood of the Knights Templar and its secret institutes pertain to the Orient, since from there this order got its start, that is, from Syria, the seedbed of the dominant religions, and at the same time the bosom of the most impious sects. It brought forth the most ancient Oriental philosophy from the inner reaches of the Jerusalem temple beliefs so that after seven centuries from the finding of the cross by Helena and the raising of the Roman standards by Constantine, they attributed to the cross a more ancient and secret meaning out of the beliefs of the religions of Phoenicia and Egypt, mixing things most profane with things most sacred and adulterating the most recent Christian doctrine with the most ancient symbols of oriental philosophy.

Many heresies of the same age, all of which sprung from the gnosis tree, have encountered a true and full explication out of oriental sources due to the labors of orientalist philologists. Thus we read of the ideas of the Farsis brought to light by Anquetilus and illustrated by Kleukerus most recently explained by Norberg. [ii] The beliefs of the Druses and Mutavelii sketched out by Adler[iii], await fuller illustration by the celebrated Sylvester de Sacy [iv]. The heresies of the Manicheans and the Ophites treated by the celebrated heresy historiographers Beausobre [v] and Mosheim [vi] certainly would have become more apparent by now if writers had devoted greater effort to Oriental philology. Finally, the ambiguities of Gnosis from the Cabala were entirely resolved by Horn. [vii] Treading in these footsteps, we have made a matter of public knowledge both the history of the Assassins and the απόρρητα (hidden) dogmas of the Templars, and how (at least as far as the symbols are concerned) like a Phoenix rising from the flames they most certainly were resurrected in the Order of Freemasons. Plainly we know how to move forward through fires set beneath deceitful ashes, and we perceive how to take a chance on something replete with danger, so that what lay concealed for seven centuries we might undertake to reveal to our readers, that is, the origin of Baphomet.

NOTES PREFACE

[i] This is the name of a German publishing house founded by Johann Georg Cotta in the seventeenth century.

[ii] Abraham Hyacinthe Anquetil-Dupperon, J.F. Kleuker, and Matthias Norberg were all Orientalists working in the eighteenth to nineteenth centuries, and they each wrote about the Persian (Farsi) religion of Zoroastrianism.

[iii] This refers to Jacob Georg Christian Adler, an expert on Syriac languages and author of Monumentum Cuficum Drusorum, about the Druze people of the Levant. I could not determine the meaning of the word "Mutavelii."

[iv] Antoine Isaac, Baron Silvestre de Sacy was a contemporary French orientalist whose last, unfinished work was the 1838 two-volume Exposé de la religion des Druze, apparently in the works at the time of Hammer-Purgstall's writing in 1818.

[v] Isaac de Beausobr was the author of Histoire Critique de Manichée et du Manichéisme, about the Persian cult of Manichaeism, which came out in two volumes between the years 1734 and 1739.

[vi] Johann Lorenz von Mosheim was a historian of the Lutheran church who wrote about heresies, including the Ophite and Manichean cults.

THE MYSTERY OF BAPHOMET REVEALED

The Brotherhood of Knights Templar convicted of apostasy, idol worship and impurity as Gnostics, indeed Ophites, from their own monuments

What hatred and danger does the title of our accusation bring with it, when the most learned and eloquent men (especially in our time) have undertaken the defense of this order? Sadly, we have a prospect, and therefore we do not intentionally pull back our hand so as not to reveal the entire wicked mystery of the arcane doctrine of the Brotherhood of Knights Templar, and when individual points of the accusation have been approved, we will demonstrate that they, being joined together in a wicked and vile society, were condemned in a judgment by no means unjust. We do not deny that many of them were simple folk unskilled in evil and ignorant of the mysteries of impiety, who lived and died as faithful observers of public statutes and strenuous, sincere defenders of Christianity, since in all societies of that sort history teaches that things existed that were hostile to republic and religion, and it is clear that many were not deceivers but deceived; not perpetrators but victims of crimes; not conscious but unknowing. But if the secret discipline of a particular society is in direct contrast to that which it professes publicly, it will overthrow the foundations of morals and religion, profane the most holy things, befoul the purest things, and is it not to be established that the order was inimical both to the republic and to the human race, and condemnation, if not of individuals at least abolition of the order as a whole should be viewed as just and right? That such was the teaching of the Templars, from their monuments surviving up to now, but held until recent times to be of no authority, from the idols, sculptures and coins, from all of the signs on stones or bronze, will be very persuasive, not to followers of parties, but only to those who care for truth.

Since the hodge-podge of legal documents both of accusation and defense had been thoroughly read, which first became public in our time, and since the furniture of historical erudition was sought out, I would touch upon nothing about the course of these writers except perhaps incidentally, and all of the things brought forth from either side of this celebrated cause, in hatred or favor, I consider as well known to the reader. I will not discourse with words where stones make confession, and it will not help to arouse writers of history where monuments are present as witnesses. Unless these new monuments, never previously known, became known to us, if it was necessary to argue from those documents which up to now have been subjected to the public eye concerning the fault or innocence of the Templars, from all writers about this matter, in the end we would strongly agree with the last of them (Grouvellius) [i], who, making nothing of the props upon which accusations against them are based, argues simply from the nature of human affairs and the times, and discourses skeptikos [Greek, skeptically] about the fault and innocence of the Templars: one he destroys, the other he approves. And indeed if there is no weight to the accumulated accusations by writers of history against the Templars, if out of the treachery against St. Louis [ii] and the king of Jerusalem, from the tradition of the camp of Karak and Acconis [iii], from the covenant struck with the Assassins [iv], from the connivances with the Sultan of Egypt, we wish to argue nothing against them, if we do not care to put faith in their very frequent confessions concerning the cult of the idol, concerning the cross spat upon and trampled, what will prevent us from holding all these things to be not only reasonable, but also true while we consider the nature of men and of those times, and we discern similar doctrine and similar morals in so many other sects of the Middle Ages? What wonder if we discover the same dogmas of impiety and the same crimes of unrestrained malice in the time of wars waged for the recovery of the Lord's sepulcher, in diverse sects of the Orient, namely, in the famous [sects] of the Manicheans, the Albigenses, Mazdekites [v] and Assassins? What wonder if the plague of this doctrine and crime had crept also into the society of Christian soldiers, whose founders, during a period of ten years were unable to recruit for themselves even one candidate, until those fleeing into the lap of the church hid the secret doctrine (according to all probability already existing) in the Institute of St. Bernard? What wonder that those knights confederated with the Assassins and imbued with their nefarious doctrine and, passing time in Syria, affected by the error of the Syrian sects, waging war in the Orient, indulged the same defect conjointly for themselves in all the Oriental camps? Finally, what wonder that this order coveted serving as an example to all other famous societies under the guise of imperial religion, and in its secret teachings, devoted only to natural religion, held all others that did not serve domination and lust as trifles and opinions to be ridiculed. Since Grouvellius has shown from the nature both of things and of men that all these things could happen and he approved a priori, as I might say, by philosophical reasoning, the sin of the Templars, we will demonstrate the same things a posteriori, through irrefutable arguments made and subjected to the faithful scrutiny of readers – the monuments.

First, we will discuss idols called in the common idiom Baphomet, next concerning mystical cups, or chalices, concerning sculptures and coins of the Templars. Out of these it will appear that their secret doctrine is identical with that of the Gnostics, indeed, of the Ophites. Next, in order to avoid the vice of obscurity, by making further inquiry, we will spread out the doctrine of the Ophites and its connection with the most ancient beliefs of Greek, Syrian and Egyptian philosophy, and we will permit ourselves to make an excursion into deep inner reaches of the Masons, when the symbols of the Templars have been illustrated, we will explain the amazing concordance and identity of them with the masonic symbols [vi]. Finally, when the entire system of this most ancient doctrine has been clarified, having been prompted by the forward movement of articles of accusation of the Templars, we will vindicate from any suspicion their absolute truthfulness and the justness of the condemnation. But if the Pontifex Maximus, in a bull of abolition, condemned them not as convicts, but, out of the plenitude of ecclesiastical power, suppressed the order, this to us seems to militate, not in favor but against them, since it is allowable to think the Supreme Pontiff wished more to cover up than to reveal the shameful and reprobate things of this order exalted by the church for so many years with so many honors and privileges. For this reason, the forward process of the fascicle of acts and the original records up to present times lie under seal at Rome. When these documents were made public (just as in the end all of them are being brought to light), we hardly can hesitate to show a surprising agreement between them and the monuments discovered and revealed by us. Meanwhile, these monuments of stone or bronze are sufficient for overcoming [vii] the secret discipline and doctrine of the Brotherhood of Knights Templar among all who, imbued with no prejudice, scrutinize the simple faith of history. We revere the ingenuous candor of other defenders, who, as the celebrated Raynouardus [viii] and the most learned Münter [ix] (the glory of the Danish church and a great pillar of the literary community), being themselves pure and upright, spurn suspecting others of depravity and wickedness, but, nonetheless, their apologetic arguments are knocked down by the number and authority of our monuments.

No less than twenty-four of these idols have become known to us, which up to now [are] partly published but not understood. Others that have not yet been published remain in treasure [containers]. The first of these was delineated in [an issue of] Gentleman’s Magazine of 1755, incised in bronze. Three others have been delineated in the distribution of curiosities. (Curiositaten, Volume Two, Section One). [x] Two exist in the Schoenfeld Collection here at Vienna. The twenty-two remaining are preserved in the treasuries of antiquities at Caesareo-Regius. All these idols, from their delineations, here subjected to the eyes, and from a comparison with four others in another place, inscribed in bronze, can be examined, even if not of one shape and size and [not] marked by inscriptions in various languages (Arabic, Greek and Latin). However, all bear the same character, and are to be referred to one and the same cult.

These stones, even though only copies, as will become evident from things to be said below, exhibit a pointer to the profane cult to which they belong. However, since the inscriptions afford the greatest light, these first of all we will subject to examination, and when they, eventually, have been made plain, we will progress to the point of ultimate explanation of the signs, and from there will be forthcoming a series of proofs. The inscriptions produced in three languages (Arabic, Greek and Latin) define a triplex genre as to the meaning. Many of the Greek ones, inscribed on little idols, indicate nothing other than the names of their possessors, who would preserve them in their small boxes (coffers). Two others—one Greek, the other Latin—contain certain comments devised by their possessors, in an interior note. Then Arabic ones everywhere the same (though with transposed words and letters) reveal a particular secret sense of doctrine of the total mystery of this arcane discipline. The Arabic letters, not accurately formed, betray the unskilled hand of the sculptor, but also were purposely truncated and transposed so that even for persons who read Arabic the secret sense of the inscription would be obscured through ambiguity of writing. It thus turned out that Sickler, in the preface to Promptuary of Curiosities, at first wrongly took Persian writing for Arabic. This error I indeed correct in the following ternion, but I fell into other hermeneutical sphalma [Greek, slip-ups] since I took these signs to be symbols of an alchemist, and the main word, Mete, since it offers no genuine Arabic meaning, I thought was placed there for ماء تيه; that is, desert water.

NOTES

[ii] In 1250 the Templars had refused to help pay the ransom of King Louis IX, Philip the Fair’s grandfather, when he was captured by the Egyptian army of the Mamluks, and the funds had to be seized by the French government, a cause of much resentment.

[iii] Al-Karak in Jordan was the location of one of the greatest Crusader castles in the Middle East. Acconis is a Latin way of writing Acre, the last major Crusader fortress in the Holy Land to fall to the enemy in 1291, signaling the end of the Crusades. There were rumors of treacherous involvement between the Templars and the enemy that allegedly led to the disastrous defeat.

[iv] The Assassins were a secret Islamic fighting order that operated contemporary to the Templars and fought against them on the battlefield. The two orders are often compared because of their rigorous training, their suicidal approach to battle, and the accusations both orders faced of having a secret inner doctrine of blasphemy. The Templars have been accused by some historians of having a friendly relationship with the Assassins behind the scenes.

[vi] The editor has chosen to render the words “Architectonics” and “architechtonic” in this sentence as “Masons” and “masonic,” as the context of this sentence implies a reference to the symbolism of the Masonic brotherhood and not just operative stonemason symbols.

[vii] From the context it seems something like the word "understanding" was meant.

I. Greek Inscriptions

Small idols found among the treasure trove of antiquities in the Imperial-Royal are so inscribed: 1) K. ΣΛΚΟΠΤΕ 2) ΓΛΟΠΕΟ 3) ΓΛΥΘΥ 4) ΓΛΥΧΟΥΡΟΣ 5) ΛΥΔΟ 6) ΛΕΥΝΟΓΠΟΛΟ (Table I figure 14). The names of these idols' owners found here (whether they used their true name or not) follows after the same words in the Greek and Latin tongues: born witness by such names as those of Petrus, Toletino and Ludovicus. 7) ΤΟΥΛΕΙΤΙΝΟΥ ΠΑΣ ΠΕΤΡνΣ that is, Peter (πας for παις) the son of Toletinus (Table I figure 2). 8) των υδατων χρυσος, that is, golden waters (Table II figure 13). What is to be understood by this golden water, or by this golden liquid, is reserved for discussion further on.

There are also two idols found in the Schoenfeld collection that are inscribed 9) ΣΑΔΥΡΥΝ and 10) ΙΗΕΤΗΜ which when read from right to left, is ΜΗΤΕΗΙ, which sounds like, Meti. There are many more idols to be found in this collection of already shown Curiosities (which, although of this same type, are not incised in bronze) that we have omitted, lest the hodge-podge of images grows too big.

II. Latin Inscriptions

Certain idols found in the Imperial-Royal treasury are inscribed with the following 11) LODIVVKOS ΠΙΜΟ - ΟΥΣ that is, Ludovicus (Louis) (Table II Figure 10). It is uncertain what sort of meaning this surname has, for many of the letters have been erased. In this inscription, Latin letters are mixed with Greek, either due to inexperience or by design of the sculptor, using the reader's lack of experience to confuse him and to deaden any way for his mind to perceive any meaning. This is especially evident in the next inscription, which not only uses the confused forms of Greek and Latin letters, but also only indicates, by the initial letters, two of their most secret words. The first of these (which only has its first two letters present followed by two asterisks) is Mete. The other word (as noted by the letters GNO and followed by the most noted symbol of gnosis, the serpent) is Gnostic. 12) TRLOMNINIE TU HOMO ES REMENIESCEQE (Reminiscere) DIEM ME (Mete) MONET PRO TORO OMNEN (omnem) GNO (Gnostiocum). (Trlomninie is a man who remembers the day of Mete, which is incidental to all Gnostics.) Found in an idol of the Imperial-Royal Treasury, (see Table I figure 11).

III. Arabic inscriptions

Having completed what was to be said regarding Western (that is, the Greek and Latin) inscriptions, we can transfer to the Oriental (that is, Arabic) ones, of which it turns out that we can gather an equal number from 12 monuments of the same type (that is, idols and bowls). The Arabic language in the time of the cross-bearing militia was by no means unknown to the Europeans attacking Syria, but its use was not common. Also, the knights of that period were rude and scarcely able to read and write the vernacular tongue. Persons reading and writing Arabic were considered learned. Therefore, the secret meaning of these inscriptions, all of which we will see were described according to one and the same paradigm, surely did not escape many owners of idols, but that there were many altogether illiterate and unskilled at reading Arabic, in no way deviates from the evidence. This knowledge of Oriental languages at that time flourished only among clergymen (and especially those attached to the sanctuary at Jerusalem). From these, or from the nine founders of the Brotherhood of the Knights Templar, one of them, pursuing what was written by the Ophites of the secret doctrine, was obtained by request, the other decreed that Mete be inscribed on all idols. If these things seem to be spoken rashly, it will later be demonstrated by irrefutable arguments that they do not veer away from the truth, and it was necessary here to say a few things by way of preface so that a reader not undeveloped in the Arabic language, yet up to now unknowing of the sequential arguments, will not wonder at the graphic errors, repetition and frequent transpositions of these inscriptions. Rather, the reader might know that these errors proceeded from either the cleverness of the owners who, by transpositions of words and letters, hoped better to conceal from profane readers the secret sense, or might understand that they came from lack of skill on the part of the sculptors. By the same reckoning, in the past the Ancients, when writing letters, would use secret notations, and all things aforementioned are to be observed on the letters of Caesar to Oppius and Balbus too: Individual letters without any connection of syllables, which you may think crudely placed; for out of these letters can be assembled no words. However, there was a secret agreement of correspondence among them with respect to changing the place of letters so that a character can correspond to another place and name. But when reading, each character's own place and value would be restored. (Ex. Agell. 1. 17.c.9)[i] Certainly we shed much sweat while unraveling the knots of these inscriptions, since besides the deformity and transposition of the words, the Oriental philologist is very much deterred by the aspect of the name Mete ماته, which is not Arabic but borrowed from another language. Therefore, I myself, since I thought at first that these inscriptions were alchemical, came to the conclusion that this Mete, which makes no sense in Arabic, should be read ماي تيه Mai-tih, that is, desert water. But then with the recurrence of this تعلي ماته formula, Omnipotent Mete! in all of the inscriptions, it became beyond a shadow of doubt that this word is not Arabic, but is borrowed from the Greek language, and signifies nothing other than ماته, or Mens.[ii] Once the significance of this special word was discovered, it became necessary, out of our twelve inscriptions, to find one or two in which the right order of words is exhibited, without transposition of letters, and this, very fortunately, happened for us through a very well-preserved sculptured inscription in a marble bowl of the Imperial-Royal treasury. Before I address this, found among those inscriptions which were published in the little book of curiosities (II B. 6 St.) [iii], I have already considered one, on an idol with beard and breasts, which consists of merely two words, to offer the best foundation and springboard for explaining the others.

Inscription No. 15 (in the little book of curiosities)

In the front it says ما ماته منكر تنا ا ك ن ع تعلي فسبع تسانا نفع تيز, and on the back, ع كان تنا نفع تيز تسر. Note that here are many errors and transportations of words already made plain in the previous inscription, and that it includes the single letter ع, ayin, which occurs in none of the others.

It begins with the word Mete but with repetition of the first syllable, Me ة ما. Next follows the word Mankur, but shaped in such a way that if it did not occur so many times in other places more clearly written, certainly here it would not be recognized. Then comes the word اتنا pro انت, but with a transposed Elif. Ka-na follows, and finally another single ع.

The word ta-le, which in other places precedes Mete, but here is made subscript to it, and the following فسبع نسلنا نفع تيز are read distinctly. The inscription فسبع نسلنا نفع تيز تعلي ماته منكر انت كان ع is found, meaning “Exalted (or ‘Omnipotent’) Mete. You are denying. They were even seven, our race. Usefulness (or, ‘It is useful’) in prokto (Greek, ‘anus’) p.” In the material that follows we will indicate this more briefly through “p. p.”

On the back, the inscription begins with the word ta-na which (see Golius) means “become prominent,” so that it can be interpreted, “Utility becomes prominent.” But more probably this ta-na is nothing other than an-ta with the first letter transposed, or omitted. What the اتنا again repeated here means is more difficult to assert since it occurs nowhere else, yet if we make our judgment from the known quick method of writing Arabic, this single letter, being either the initial or final letter, is placed for the whole word. Thus, the letter Kaf signifies the beginning of the word kei-mei (“chemist”), and the letter Mem signifies the beginning of the word metalab (talismanic art). The letter ayn , occurring so frequently in all of these manuscript codices, is there in place of مصرع, that is, “hemistich.” Here, though, since it immediately precedes the word ka -na, it appears to be put to stand for Se-ba-ah [the final letter of which is سبع (that is, “seven”), so as to repeat this principal formula: “and they were seven,” which is exhibited by itself and distinctly inscribed only on the idol with beard and breasts.

On the front, it says تعلي ماته ناش ن انا كا نسلنا فسبع ي منكر فا. On the back, it says تيز تسير يا ناش تنغع فتّ.

“Omnipotent Mete sprouting” is written correctly up to this point. Now the single letter ن is to be put at the end of the ka- so that, together with the letters falling in sequence, the formula already recognized, “I and seven were, our race,” might be brought out. Following seven seems to be the letter Ya, which is to be transferred to the end of the expression na فاي منكر, meaning “You are among those who deny!” From the back, in continuation of the inscription on the front, we read: ثير تسير بها ناش ذفع فن i. e. πρωκτος, that is, “Proktos” (Greek, “rectums”), and “It is through sprouting water, utility of knowledge.” It is clear from the context that “sprouting water” is none else than sperma genethliakon (Greek, “reproductive seed”). Also, “knowledge,” which is expressed here not by one word but two, ma-la-ma and fi, (which means “art” or “cunning”). (See Meninski [i]). It will become more evident further down that it is nothing other than Ophitic Gnosis.

Inscription No. 17. (borrowed from Gentleman Magazine).

Even if it was wrongly incised on bronze, in the part having the masculine likeness are the words ذفع ماته اذا انسلنا منكر انتان ذفع ثيز, meaning, “Usefulness, Mete, I, our race, you denying, usefulness.” In the part having the feminine likeness, it says ثير تسير فن من كان ته ماب فسبع تعلي بها. “And seven, Omnipotent, knowledge is, return proktos” can easily be read. When rightly composed and integrated, this offers the same meaning as the inscriptions above.

Inscription No. 18. (Tab I. fig. 13)

On the back of the idol, holding an infant

نسلنا اناخ تسير نقع فسبع كان انت منكري فان تعلي ماته ناش in letters written most distinctly but a little transposed, it says "And there were seven, you, if you are denying, one, Omnipotent Mete sprouting, a debauched woman, it springs up for our race through prokton."

There are two principle transpositions, to فان and to نت, so that "you one denying it" is read in place of "if you one denying are." Then نسلنا, that is, "our race," which ought to follow after "and were seven," gets pushed back behind the epithet Metis. Among them we find something new here, that is, "making to lie down," from the root اناخ, that is, "on its knees to lie down he ordered the camel," [to do] "the most disgusting things." This will appear more fully from the fact that in the inscriptions to follow this is substituted for this word. There one reads "fully inclined toward Venus," from the root اناک. A derivative of this, very frequently used, is نيكنيك, nudnik (from which perhaps came the German nickel), denoting to all a return from Egypt where traveling female dancers (Aalimae عالمه, perhaps borrowed from the Greek allomai), by repeating ma fisch fuluss ma fisch niknik, ما فيش فلوس ما فش نيكنيك were wont boldly to affect people deeply.

Inscription No. 19 (Tab. I. fig. 7)

On the arms of a male/female arsenothelus-shaped idol, there are distinct yet transposed letters. On the right arm it says نسلنا ن فسبع كا, "Our race and seven were." Here the letter Nun of ka-na, which is lacking at the end (where it belongs) is placed before fa-sa-baa. On the left arm, we see كان تع ن substituted for فسبع, meaning "Omnipotent (Mete) sprouting or she who plants," indicating someone favorable to fertility and desire, or a debauched woman. Here two syllables of the word Mete are separated by the inserted ta-a-le, and the letters of na-sha are put in reverse order to make An-a-ka. The place occupied with an-a-gha is explained in the previous inscription. On the back of a genuflecting idol it says تعلي ماته ناش نسلنا فسبع كان انت منكري فان, meaning "She is exalted, Mete, Consivia ('she who plants'), I and our race were seven. If you are from those who deny."

Inscription No. 21. (Tab. II. Fig. 11)

On an idol bearded and with breasts, it says تعلي ناش منكر انت, meaning "Omnipotent Mete, Omnipotent planter, you are denying."

Inscription 22 (Tab. II. fig. 9)

On the base of a two-headed idol, we read نسلنا منكر فسبع, that is, "Our race, you are denying, and seven." On the opposite side of this base Latin and Arabic characters are mixed so as to designate "gnosis" thus: The Latin G (initial letter of "gnosis"), the Arabic Fa (in the same form as in the inscription published in the little book of curiosities), and the letter Nun. Thus it spells Fenn, (gnosis) when the letters are placed alternately. That Fenn in Arabic signifies "knowledge" is abundantly clear from the notable title in the encyclopedia Hadjii Calfae كشف الظنون عن سامي فنون. And this will come forth soon below. (The English word "Funn" is very close to the Arabic word Fenn).[ii]

Inscription 23

On an interior tile of a cover of a square bowl (tab. II. Fig. 5), and on the bowl itself, (ibidem, fig. 15), it says كا تنا ان منكر فاي ناش انا ته meaning "and you, if you are one denying, well done! The woman who plants, I, Mete." Fenn here means "and O," or "Well done! Overflows." The word Na-sha is written with transposed letters, and the word Mete is deficient in its middle part, lacking the first syllable.

Inscription No. 24

On the exterior periphery if an octagonal bowl is written نفع تعلي تم كا تيزن ته كا نيرن منكر نير ماز تعلي ن تيز ن خ تسيرش ان سلنا ن نفع تعلي ن تيز منكر تنا تسير ن فسبع لا الملسناي كا This inscription contains nothing less than all of the words noted from prior inscriptions, but divulged in such a way that, if they were not already known, they could not be assembled from these disjointed elements.

Moreover, character corruption renders the reading more difficult. Basically, it reads, "Mete c p. p, and seven. You are denying."

Here, when these inscriptions have been explained in detail, the sense of them, tending toward what is most disgusting and lustful, speaks for itself. Also, some more things about the doctrine of the Ophites, even more secret than this, will be more extensively clarified through its exposition further down. From time to time we will bring up descriptions given by the Templars of their idols called Baphomet, which are in complete agreement with ours.

In the 32nd of 120 articles of accusation published by Du Puy,[iii] we read "Also that they had idols in individual provinces, that is, heads, of which some had three faces and others one, and some had a human skull."

Some of our idols have two faces, others one, and in the bowl, on the cover of which such an idol was drawn, you see the skull placed at its feet. (Table II, fig. 5.)

In articles 52 and 53, it was said of Baphomet "that she makes the trees blossom" also.

Everywhere we see our Mete called Na-sha (that is, "the one sprouting"), or Consivia ("the woman planting"), or Ericapaiam.[iv]

In Du Puy, page 519, it is said [of Baphomet]: "the head is bronze, two-faced." Seven of these idols are two-faced (three, indeed, depicted in the little book of curiosities), and three of our idols are two-headed, placed on postaments. One idol (tab. I. fig. 2.) has one head but two faces in front. Another, as stated above, has only one.

From the confession of Gaucerand de Montperats we read:

Their superior showed him an idol bearded and made in the likeness of Basomet.

Ibidem: It is a terrible figure, which resembles a Devil saying in French “Mause.”

Ibidem: [French writing] an idol that was in the form of a human head with a big beard.

These correspond very well with our idols. All are creased and have an ugly appearance, which, as Nicolai observed, seems to have been more from uncertainty of the sculptor than from custom. Made in the figure of a man, many are bearded and present the twinned attributes of both a man and a woman. Also, some appear mainly as a woman, and that testimony, preserved by Moldenhauer, [v] p. 397, very well agrees: “This idol was feminine and could have been viewed as one of 11,000 virgins.” [vi]

Testimony 72 to article 46: (From German): “In Paris I often saw a silver head, to which the assembled leaders rendered their worship.”

Testimony 200 (from German): “He showed me a head upon the altar with a long gray beard.” Page 590.

Testimony 201 (from German): “Then he took out of his bosom a figure of gold or bronze which had a female appearance.”

Testimony 209 (from German) . . . “a beautiful head of gilded silver and a female form.” Chapter 58.

At length, though there are many idols discovered by us and a few here are published, the majority were destroyed by the small chapters [of Templars] engaged in this secret form of worship). They are signed with the names of their possessors, and the evidence of this is confirmed by testimony in Du Puy, page 526, where it says that “some Templars carried such idols in their coffers.”

Concerning "adoration," "denial," and "the abominable form of worship," of this idol which the Templars were accused of, the epithets "Mete Omnipotent," "Subactrix" ("debauched woman") and words about "denial and return through prokton" clearly speak of it.

These things, having now been brought to light, and this Mete, both in figure and by name having become familiar to us, we wish, first of all, to inquire of what sort was this double-form monster, then into the reason for the vulgar name Bafomet. Mete, both in name and in fact, are not the same as Mete, Metis (Greek) of the Greeks even if there remains no doubt that our gnostic Mete was borrowed from the Homeric (or even better, the Ophitic Mete). Our Mete is none other than the Sophia of the Ophites, who is known otherwise as Acamoth, Prunicos, or Barbelo. Even if this name, though it occurs in all our inscriptions, is not designated in the writings of the Fathers, vestiges of this name carried over from Greek mythology into the beliefs of the Gnostics. Epiphanius for sure has the distorted sense of it when he affirms that the Ophites transferred the Greek fables, especially of Mete, into another meaning, as will be seen in the same Epiphanius where it is indicated why dogs are held in the greatest veneration among the Ophites. By attributing to Mete the same functions of divine wisdom and providence that the Gnostics attribute to Sophia, Eusebius also gives us the way in which Mete of the Greeks was transfigured into Mete of the Gnostics. Like the name, the figure exhibiting both sexes was borrowed from ancient fables, which we have verified from Macrobius, who tells us that Venus was represented as at the same time both masculine and feminine in appearance. Thus also in this idol we discern Mete and Aphrodite combined serving as a symbol of prudence and desire. Finally, the masculine-feminine Firstborn God of the Ophites, distinguished by various names, among which was Mete, seems to be akin to this Meti of ours. Out of this protogenei (Greek, firstborn), the God of the Ophites, and out of the Hierapolis Goddess, the Mete of the Ophites was concocted, it seems. The Hierapolis Goddess, as Plutarch testifies, was "Nature" and "she who offered to all seed out of vapor." This agrees very well with our Mete's epithet na-sha, or [Greek writing] ("germinating")' As Plutarch tells us (Crassus XVII), the Hierapolis Goddess was also called Hodegetes ("of generation" and "knowledge"), as our Mete was called Consivia ("the woman planting"), or Ericapaea.

It is agreed by all the Fathers who wrote about Gnostic doctrine that Sophia, daughter of the Eternal Father, was a feminine spirit of a double kind, masculine and feminine. This Sophia is at times confounded with her daughter Achamoth, and at times distinguished from her. But whether she is the same with her mother, or diverse, certainly all of what is said about Achamoth agrees very well with our Mete. so that one can assert that Mete was one of many names which this masculine-feminine aion was called among the diverse sects of the Gnostics.

The name Metis, if not found in books, nonetheless occurs everywhere in these idols of ours. Since all that which is said about Sophia (alias Achamoth, alias Helene, alias Photina, alias Joel alias Enthymesis) agrees very well with our idols, there is no room for doubt about the true meaning.

It remains for us to inquire into the composite name

Baphomet. The true sense of this Greek expression, Baphe meteos (that is, “Tincture of Mete” or “Baptism of Mete”), came forth clearly by Nicolai (from German, Versuche uber die Beschuldigungen des Tempelherrn Ordens, (Investigation regarding the Allegations against the Templars Order, Part I, Page 137.) This very wise man rightly perceived that the arcane doctrine of the Templars was Gnostic, and that the meaning of Basomete should be sought in the beliefs of the Gnostics. He hallucinated only in that he thought that Mete was a synonym for gnosis, and he felt that the Father, the creator of heaven and earth was represented by idols. But Mete signifies not the law of gnosis, but rather the feminine-masculine legislator otherwise called Achamoth, the daughter of Jaldabaoth, who also was called propater, but not pater.

Hence, in our judgment, Nicolai touched upon the truth: that the word Baphen, or Bapheion here signifies nothing but the mystical tincture, or the Gnostic baptism, the theory put forth below with proof from the writings of the Church Fathers and the mystical bowls. of which three are preserved in the treasury at Caesareo-Regius, which we used for this Ophite baptism.

Let us now take a look at the passage in Hermes Trismegistus [vii] cited by Nicolaus where God sends a messenger with a bowl full of Mens, which perfected souls tending towards gnosis are ordered to immerse themselves. [viii] Other patristic authorities support the connection with this passage, in which is treated the mystical baptism of the Gnostics, and various words distorted out of Hebrew and other languages are adduced, of which one is (Greek, basema). What wonder, therefore, if baptism was changed into Baphen, just as Metin was changed into Meten.

This Gnostic baptism was understood to be not a bath of redemption through water, but a spiritual purification through fire, which is clear from excerpts out of Theodotus and out of Justin, in just so many words.

In support of [the translations of the name Baphomet] as “spiritual baptism” and “tincture of fire” there are the sculptured bowls at the feet of our idols, full of fire so as to demonstrate how that mystic rite should be administered. For example, here are two representations of this concept. The first is of an infant (which means a neophyte Gnostic) being placed by Mete at the pedestal to one of these bowls (See tab. I. figure 14). The other is of a boy standing over a flaming bowl (see tab. II. Figure 3). All of this we will discuss more clearly in the next chapter, which treats of bowls.

About Bowls

Three most precious bowls are in the treasury of Caesareo-Regius, one of which is made of marble, the other two of steatite stone. [i] All three of these are inscribed with Arabic inscriptions (which already are explained above), wherefore, they pertain to the same form of worship and idols mentioned previously. But if one is able to harbor doubt by considering the inscriptions as insignificant, realistically all doubt is completely banished by the very form of these bowls (see tab. I fig. 9, and tab. II fig. 14, 15), repeated on the feet of our three. It is well known that bowls and cups were used in all of the mystery schools which antiquity cultivated. But here we will illustrate in greater detail the original meaning of these bowls.

There exists a big bowl (on the upper part of which Ophitic orgies are sculpted) with a duplex figure on the bowl. Decency prevents me from exhibiting here what is imprinted on the bronze, to the extent that we should acknowledge the need for this comment. What needs to be said is that two bowls bear the meaning of both of the sexes, one the masculine, meaning sexual relations[ii]; the other one, the feminine, meaning childbirth. Therefore, this bowl references nothing but the female sex as a symbol of generation, which also can be seen on the bases of the three idols, with this one difference: that in that place, instead of a phallus, there blazed a fire, which represents generative power. Thus, in the idol (see tab. I, fig. 9) obtained from the little book of curiosities, it, on the feminine side, is noted at its feet. However, on the other idol (see tab, I. fig. 15) such a duplex bowl is placed, bottoms-up, facing the other. One of these is filled with fire as a symbol of generative power; the other exhibits an infant coming out of the womb. The neck of the bowl is sometimes short, sometimes longer; shorter in the marble bowl and in its figure (tab, II. fig. 9,), longer in the vase having the form of what is commonly called a carafe, which occurs on the square base of the two-headed idol, and in the multitude of ceremonies of spiritual baptism, or that of fire, brought together by one of the ministers, on a bowl (see tab. II. fig. 2). Being closest to the fire, he holds in his hand a letter G, which was inscribed on the base of the two-headed idol. [It was inscribed too] on this vase together with the Arabic word Fenn, (that is, Gnosis). The best analysis is that this vase is the prime symbol of the birth of Ophitic Gnosis. From what is said above, it seems in no way absurd for us to affirm that there was the same meaning for all the bowls of ancient mythology.

We bring forth in testimony here no less than twelve of the bowls celebrated from antiquity. Of these, six are being held in the hands of the Greatest Gods; six were attributed to genies of an inferior order. Everywhere we will note the symbol of birth. The cups [potions] of the Gods are: Osiris, Liber, Heracles[iii], Mithra, to which we will throw in the cup [potion] of Dschemschidi and Jove. Other cups are six cups are: the double cup of souls, the double cup of the Demiurge (in Plato), the cup of Anubis and the cup of Mens (in Hermes Trismegistus).

Who does not know that Osiris and Liber were the same? Heracles and Mithra were none other than the Sun, who, according to Macrobius (Book I of Saturnalias), was called aeigennetos (Greek, "forever begotten"), because, always arising, she [continually] is being generated, and because she generates all things, by inseminating, nurturing, producing, maintaining, and increasing.

We also read the same thing from the same author (Somnium Scipione, Book I, Chapter 2). The mind of the world is also called temperatio ["regulative power"]. We will soon discover more below about the bowl of Mens which founded the world. Temperatio (Greek, krasis, "regulating power"] is none other than mixtio ("a mixture") on which everything depends, and out of which the very name "bowl" (Greek, krater) is derived. Therefore, in the writings of Plato (in Philebo), Hephaestos and Dionysos (fire and wine) are named "mixtures of God." It is clear to Oriental philologists that the cup of Dschemschidi[iv] was none other than that of the Sun, and from its division this will appear. Also, from the Apology of Justin Martyr for Christians we learn that a cup was used in the Mithraic mysteries to point to the mystery of the Eucharist. These cups symbolize the generative power of the Sun which inseminates and produces all. Six other symbols, of a higher birth (namely, of creation of the world and of the birth of souls) are also implied. The first cup was called "greater" (Greek, zoogonon), the other "less," but the idea of generating is expressed through mixing so that (Greek, kerastes) relates to keratera as a man to a woman (Proclus in Timaeus). A double bowl pertains to souls: the one part, oblivion, leading to generating (Greek, geneseos), the other part to Sophia (to wisdom). We see the bowl of Anubis depicted on coins. We discussed already above the bowl of Mens in Hermes Trismegistus. Finally, there is the cup of Jove Alcumenae, given as a gift for the price of pleasure, called as a proper name Carchesium.[v]

Hence, while thoroughly investigating the original significance of the bowl and chalice in the most ancient mythologies, since everywhere we discover the same thing, we will not wonder that the bowl and chalice occupied first place among the vessels of the ancient mysteries, and existed as a symbol of the mystic meal of the Gnostics and of the arcane doctrine of the Templars. Though the use to which they were employed is not clear from writings, from the appearance of the monuments where these bowls are seen flaming (See tab. I, fig. 9, 14, 15), and from the very structure of one of these three bowls, it is to be affirmed that incense was used inside the braziers, in order to nourish the fire with burning materials. Thus the Neophytes standing at this bowl, with the incense giving forth a smell, were being spiritually prepared for that marriage which among the Ophite Gnostics took the place of baptism, the Eucharist and of all the sacraments. The presence of fire, which we see everywhere glowing from these bowls placed at the feet of the idols (See table. I, fig. 9, 15), proves this hypothesis. Next [we see] a Neophyte with the appearance of an infant placed by a parent at such a bowl, surrounded by a whirling cloud of smoke from the incense (See tab. II, fig. 3). This representation, since it is fashioned on the bowl (tab. II. fig. 15), plainly demonstrates its use.

This sacrament of fire [is] better yet. As with all ceremonies pertaining to the same, this scene is sculpted onto the second bowl, where the fire glows not from a brazier but from a ritual fire source. The order of ministers and attendants makes it more clear what type of feast this is, or you may wish to call it a "baptism" or a "marriage." Behold! You have a ritual fire, which represents either the baptismal font or the marriage bed, with flute and lyre players making noise during the ceremonies. At length, we see ministers, each dressed in stola[vi] and maniple, of whom one bares that mystic vase made in the form of a vial (the carafe, which is shown on tab. II, fig. 9), another [bore] a securim[vii], which too is depicted on that base (see tab. II, fig. 9), Third and finally, there is an idol which had behind its back a ladle (see tab. I, fig. 16).

These are the ceremonies of that mystical sacrament and of the abominable orgies of which the Gnostics are accused by the Fathers, which with promiscuous ugliness they celebrated with the lights dimmed, sometimes under the name of a meal, other times under the name of marriage. These orgies are manifestly portrayed in all three of our bowls presented, so that it might be clear to the onlooker what these orgies are, and to what Gnostic sect these bowls, with the same inscriptions as the abovementioned idols, belonged. For the first bowl contained, in a double circle, a double representation of the orgies. The interior [circle] shows the baccanalium [viii], where [the Roman god] Liber is observed [ix], borne in triumph by satyrs and maenads (female votaries of Bacchus), who surrounded him closely. We will pass over this image of triumph, since it provides nothing in the way of testimony, in order to diminish the number of images [reproduced here]. The upper circle of the vase represents the Ophitic orgies, which here we exhibit to your eyes, only with the phalluses being omitted, as we mentioned above. Lest perhaps you might think that you can here discerned Israelites in the desert being attacked by serpents, note that the figure is holding serpents before the others, who are exultant and seem familiar enough with them to be kissing them. He also presents them with a double figure of a certain monster, masculo-feminine, who holds a double chain (bronze), in whom we recognize our mother Achamoth or Mete. [See tab. II fig. 1.] However, there is another monstrous figure, supplied with four wings, son of the same, inimical to mother, whom we have discovered to be the same as Jaldabaoth (concerning whom there will be more discussion below). Since the Ophites, followers of his mother Sophia or Mete, tried to extinguish the form of worship established by the son (Jaldabaoth or Sabaoth). This is symbolized by one of the depicted Ophites, here shown extinguishing a sevenfold candelabra (symbol of the Biblical form of worship). The duplex book [we see here] indicates a double law: one part that of the Old Testament, of Sabaoth, the other part that of Achamoth. We also found a reference to this book in an Arabic inscription that can be found on all of the bowls and idols. On the second bowl, beside the figure of Mete (See tab, II, fig. 5), we see the Sun and Moon (See tab, II, fig. 7, 8). A “baptism of fire” is shown there too (See tab, II, fig. 3), and on the other side is seen a dragon, from whose jaws the ministers have snatched the infant.

Finally, on the third bowl, besides ceremonies of the mystic sacrament, we see on the bottom Jaldabaoth sitting on an eagle (See tab, II, fig. 6), so that he may be recognized to be the same as the monster sculpted onto the first bowl.[x] Now we will, as it is necessary, explain all these things, so that if we discover the same symbols and the same figures in the sculptures of the churches of the Temple Militia, we might now be certain of their true Gnostic sense.

On the largest marble bowl (the height of which is six digits and the figure of which you see in tab. II, fig. 14, and the upper relief in the same place, fig. 1), we see first a double figure of Mete, both masculine and feminine, but wrapped in a different cloak. The first one on the left displays [its influence from] the prototype of the Ophitic faith through an Arabic inscription. On the right, however, we see a truncated cross which is inscribed on the front of the idols (tab. I, fig. 1, 2, and 15), and is carried in the hand of the last idol. Another spreads forth Mete, being borne about by hand, with two hands holding a bronze chain, which the idols have around the neck (tab. II, fig. 6). Such a thing was discerned even in the covering of the second square vase, which has a tower-shaped miter for the horns. Since this is the adornment of Cybele and Rhea, it sheds new light on the origin of Mother Achamoth.

Besides this double effigy of Mother Achamoth, these bowls also exhibit a double image of her son Jaldabaoth. One is placed in the series of Ophitic orgies among the two symbols mentioned above. The other is on the bottom of the third bowl, sitting on an eagle. One bears a lightning bolt as Lord of Heaven and Earth. The other has a headpiece provided with four wings, like the Supreme Eon and Archon, which seems to be sculpted in signs called

This is the son of Sophia, Barbelot or Achamoth, called Sabaoth or Jaldabaoth. Among the Gnostics he was seen as the father of the seven Archons, creator and governor of all things heavenly and earthly, who rebelled against his mother and, exulting in his glory, insanely boasted that "he was father and God, above whom is no one." However, the mother, hearing this, cried out, "Don't lie, Jaldabaoth, for there is above you a father, first of all things, Anthropus, and Anthropus, son of Anthropus." (Irenaeus, Against Heresies, Book I, chapter 30, on the Ophites.)

This is, according to the Ophites, the God of the Jews and Christians, whom they cursed, and whom they trampled underfoot. The Ophites thought that this one wages perpetual war against his mother Achamoth, and prohibits men from getting knowledge of his mother (that is, of divine wisdom). He produced, besides the seven Archons who govern the seven heavens (who rebelled against him as he did against this mother), yet another serpent-shaped son, that is (Greek, ton Noun, the mind) in the form of a contorted serpent. He first offered to his father Jaldabaoth a ministry so as to seduce mankind "to purge from him the seed of light." Next, though, abandoning the sly and crafty aspects of the father, and becoming a follower of Sophia, he proceeded to lead men to her true knowledge, or gnosis, and to the revelation of all the arcane things of nature. Finally, through the winding of intestines depicting contortion, he was held by the Ophites to be worthy to represent the "genital wisdom" (in Greek Zoogogon sophian, and in Arabic, ma-ta na-sha) of our inscriptions). For this reason, he was sometimes called by the Ophites Nous, and at other times by the name of the angels Michael and Samael. He was worshiped in the orgies as a symbol of the abominable wisdom and the true leader of Gnosis.

[i] Steatite is also known as “soapstone.”

[ii] Hammer-Purgstall tells us that he omitted several of the phalluses featured in the images he reproduced. However, with this particular image, the phallus (shown disembodied and descending into an open vase that sits to the left of a chimera creature, with a baby emerging from a vase on the right side) was reconstructed in the illustration found in the original, unabridged printing of Thomas Wright’s Worship of the Generative Powers, which refers heavily to Hammer-Purgstall’s work.

[iii] Heracles had a magic cup with a lodestone in it that he used for oceanic navigation.

[iv] This is more commonly spelled now the cup of “Jamshid,” this was a divination cup used by the Persian mythological figure of the same name. It was also filled with the “Elixir of Immortality.”

[v] This undoubtedly refers to the cup that Jupiter gave to his nephew and pedophilic homosexual sex slave, Ganymede, who then became the official cup-bearer for the god. Ganymede’s name means “gladdening genitals.” A carchesium is a goblet with handles.

[vi] A Roman matron’s outer garment.

[viii] This is the name for the drunken orgies celebrated in the mystery schools of Bacchus in Rome.

[x] It is unknown why Hammer-Purgstall failed to mention here that this is image corresponds to that of Ganymede, who was abducted by Jupiter for pederastic purposes when the latter took the form of an eagle and gave his boy-lover a ride up to his divine abode.

[xi] He is referring here to coins featuring the figure of Bes, a gnostic deity of Egyptian origin depicted identically on many Gnostic coins found elsewhere, with four wings. Such coins are often identified as images of "Abraxas," another gnostic entity who may indeed have been seen as the same figure by certain groups.

It is well known to everyone that in all the ancient mysteries of Ceres and Liber, both the Elysian as well as the Bacchic, the serpent played the main parts. Hence, through the same serpent the connection, discovered with great difficulty, between the Ophitic and Bacchic orgies will be illustrated by evidence. We learn, indeed, from Clement of Alexandria that a notable likeness of the Bacchic orgies was the serpent, consecrated by the arcane rite.

The serpent and phallus which are handed around in the Bacchic orgies we encounter also in those of the Ophites. The T which Achamoth holds in her hands, and is impressed on her forehead in tab. I, fig. 15, we discern on the bowl (tab. II, fig. 1). It is as if she is upholding the tree of life serpent to represent “genital wisdom.” [This] retained a double meaning (which it already had among the Egyptians): of a Phallus and a key, and these were called, among the Ophites, “tree of life” and “key of Gnosis.”

But it has yet a third significance in Gnostic doctrine, that is to say, it means the boundary of the Gnostic Pleroma, which is called "Horus," the significance of which, as we see from the invocation of the Archons in Origen, had been borrowed from the Egyptian Horus (who, according to Macrobius, is identical to Terminus).[i] This tree of life, which they declared was born from man and from Gnosis, and now they call Gnosis itself, is the key and terminus, the Alpha and Omega of all Gnosis. Therefore, we see it elevated in orgies in imitation of the elevation of the Phallus in Bacchic orgies. Also a similar figure is not only put into the hand of Mother Achamoth, or Mete (see tab. I, fig. 15), but also impressed on her forehead. This symbol thus indicates life, as does the character noted on the foreheads of the elect in Apocalypse 7, verse 3. This T is, therefore, the character of Baphomet and thus, a part for the whole, signified the instrument of life and life-begetting wisdom.

The two main infamous symbols of this most disgraceful form of worship, kteidos (key) and Phallos (Greek), symbolized by the bowl and truncated cross (or T), having been explained, let us continue on to two other symbols portrayed on these bowls. One of these, that is, the sun and moon, is very frequently discerned also in the symbols of Baphomet; the other, namely, the dragon, is encountered in bowls and in sculptures found in the churches of the Templars. The first of these was borrowed from the ancient mysteries; the second is properly Gnostic, and indeed Ophitic.

The sun and moon, as superintendents of generation, have first place in these mysteries, where nothing else was to be treated than the explanation of generation. First there is the sun, which, upon arising (according to Macrobius, Saturnalia Lib I, cap. 17), generates everything by inseminating, producing, nourishing, all in open light. Then there is the moon, which (according to the same Macrobius in Samnium Scipionis, Book I) was the boundary line of life and death, watched over the generation of the secret nature. Therefore, their figures are represented in the alabaster bowl in such a way that the Sun would preside over geniture, and the moon over birth.

Regarding the dragon, it will not be irrelevant for us to say a few words. That quadruped, scaly and rough, with tail twisted back, seems in actual fact to be a crocodile rather than a dragon, and soon you will see that it makes no difference if it is called a crocodile. Since in the sculpture of the bowl (tab. II, fig. 4) it threatens to devour the infant, and since, in the sculptures of the Templar churches the same dragon is represented as swallowing down the infant, we call it a dragon. For according to St. Epiphanius the Ophites taught that the one presiding over this world has the likeness of a dragon. By it souls not having Gnosis are absorbed, and through its tail poured back into this world. We will, however, find below in the explanation by Schoengrad regarding the sculptures of the churches of the Templars an image of such a dragon swallowing down and pouring back the infant. It is sufficient here to notice that that man who, in the relief of the second bowl, drags the infant out of the dragon’s jaw represents a true gnostic who, by pouring Gnosis into the infant, hinders him from being absorbed by the world.

Epiphanius, who teaches us that by the dragon the gnostics understood the one who presides over the world, support for this, too, is found in Origen's Ophitic diagram, in which Leviathan is explained as the dragon, but soon it was confused with Behemoth, or the crocodile. 29) The best witness to this confusion is the book by ibn Wahshiyya called De Alphabetis Incognitis [Concerning Unknown Alphabets],[ii] where he depicts the same figure as the diagram, [with] ten circles. Also depicted is a monster in the form of a scarab, holding these circles so that the anima mundi [soul of the world] may be explained by the name of [Arabic writing] Bafumed. Through the affinity of the word set aside, since we had translated into the English idiom the aforementioned book by ibn Wahshiyya, we thought that that was a corruption of the word Baphomet. But, even if the close correspondence between the word Bafomed and Baphomet is strongly supported, and even if this explanation is much more probable than that trite one considering Baphomet to be a corruption of Mahomet [Muhammad], it can still be supported by no valid argument, and thus we should yield to the explanation that all our inscriptions, Arabic and Latin, bear on themselves the name Mete. The inscriptions put this beyond any shadow of doubt.

Now that the explanation of all the figures and symbols on the bowls has made completely clear the true sense of "father" and "mother" (that is, Jaldabaoth and Achamoth), as well as of the chalice and truncated cross, the stars and the dragon, we will very briefly speak about the orgies themselves there mentioned. All three Ophite sacraments -- baptism, eucharist, and marriage, or rather, the most unspeakably evil profanation of those sacraments -- is exhibited in these three bowls. As to the fiery baptism in a burning bowl (tab. I, fig. 14 and tab. II, fig. 3) into which we see the infant placed, we have treated that above. Also the eucharist, where the Ophites engage in kissing serpents, we have explained out of passages from the [Church] Fathers. It remains for us to say a few words about spiritual marriage, which is represented in the third bowl. Irenaeus and Tertullian speak about this spiritual marriage of the Gnostics who thus point to the general conflagration of the Stoics,[iii] and we perceive (See tab. II, Fig. 2) that [very thing], along with all other nuptial ceremonies, in the third bowl, where a bed is formed by the flaming ritual fire.

Therefore, having explained the primitive sense of the bowl and the chalice in the mysteries, we think a few words should be said regarding its figurative significance, used as a symbol of society, or etairias (Greek). No one is ignorant of the fact that the bowl or chalice in the most ancient mysteries and religious institutions is also a symbol of a banquet of food and drink, and in the same sense accepted even today among all orders of Dervishes. This is confirmed by the most lucid testimony, through the naming of the bowl Osiris received into heaven, which today among the Orientals is called (Arabic writing) Kasei Dervischan, that is, the "cup of the Dervishes." It is well known that this argument is confirmed by sculptures of the Schoengraberian church, where six bowls placed next to each other seem reasonably to indicate six communities of Templars. Also the passage from Assemanus,[iv] communicated to us by the most reverend and most learned

Bishop Münter,[v] testifies that the chalice was a symbol of the Templars. also those sepulchers which were discovered, with cups, [perhaps goblets] in Sicily, were of the Templars (see tab. III, fig. 13).

After these things there remains no doubt that the most celebrated bowl of the Middle Ages, under the name of the Holy Grail, signifies nothing but a symbol of the Templar community and of Gnostic wisdom. The entire fable, known by the name Titurel, gives support to this assertion. You will see there the temple constructed by Titurel to the Holy Grail in Monsalvaz (Mount Salvation). Its safe-keeping was given to the Templar knights (die Tempeleise), who defended it with their own blood and, through fighting for it, they wandered throughout the whole world. Should you seek to discover the place where the most Holy Grail can be found, one always returns to the Orient, and the mystical exaltation which the poem of Titurel breathes as often as it celebrates this chalice in eulogia, proves that something abstruse and arcane is to be understood. The total temple built by Titurel boasts of such ornaments that greatly favor our supposition. Among these ornaments appear also tablets of Mete (Meteteaveln) and the mystical curtain brought down from heaven by an angel, which also is described in Titurel, and is observed today in sculptures of the church of the Templars at Altenburg and Berchtolsdorf (see on tab. III, fig, 5). The sense of this one may gather below, where we will treat these symbols one by one.

But if as the Holy Grail the mystic chalice be understood as a symbol of the gnostic Sophia, it is sufficiently clear what the round tablet signifies; for from the statues published by Münter we know that the number twelve is special in all regions of the Templars. Twelve were the electors who, with the one presiding, would elect a new chief; twelve were the dignitaries of the great order; twelve were the seniors of the order of which their first senate consists; twelve were the Balliae in the Orient; and the same number, as it seems, were the provinces in Europe. Therefore, it is reasonable to represent the Knights of the Round Table over whom Arthur presided to be none other than twelve seniors, or “Archons” of the Templars. And we believe it ought to be understood that, under the custody of the Holy Grail, those brothers of the militia, as custodians of the Gnostic chalice, were initiated into the gnostic mystery of iniquity.

NOTES

[i] Terminus was a Roman God of boundary markers, represented in statue as a boundary stone showing a man from the waist up. These were almost identical with the “herms” of antiquity, ithyphallic and goat-horned representations of Hermes/Pan/Priapus that also served as boundary markers.

On sculptures existing in churches of the Brotherhood of Temple Militia

There exist in numerous churches of the Brotherhood of Temple Militia sculptures and hieroglyphic figures which, since they agree in large measure with the symbols of idols and bowls, promote full faith in all that we have said regarding Baphomet and cups. Even if, in thoroughly scrutinizing such sculptures, even those found beyond the boundaries of the Austrian Empire, we engaged in sweaty labor, up to now no notices, even very obscure ones, have come through to us. It is altogether probable that up to now many monuments of the Templars exist in boxes, as is the case with idols, or on walls as bas-reliefs, which up to now have been hidden or ignored. If they were brought to light, they would supply new arguments to everything already said about this material, and what is yet to be said as well.

Therefore, we at this time will talk only about the sculptures in the seven Templar churches which, up to now, have escaped the ravages of time. Of these, three were discerned in Austria (Schoengraberian, Waltondorfensis and Berchtoldorfensis), one in Hungary in the city Deutschaltenburg, one is in the village of Murau in Bohemia two others (one Pragae, the other Egrae). In Styria, which to us is Fatherland, it is established in many places that the Brotherhood of Temple Militia resided there. However, no sculptures remain in the churches, and pictures in the tower of Neukirch in the Cilleiensi district were removed by a deacon of that place hardly ten years ago.

The Schoengraber Church

Among all of these the principal monuments, preserved in an amazing way through a period of five centuries among so very many calamities, is the church in the village of Schoengraber, built on the public road leading from Vienna to western Moravia, near the towns of Dietrichsdorf and Sitzendorf, where the principal habitations of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia are mentioned in their history. But so many sculptures are enumerated in the Schoengraber Church that a person could not engrave them on this bronze. But it is not only the high number that hinders publication of them all. Some of them (located so high up that, without aid of a ladder, they escape being seen) depict the most obscene and disgraceful acts.

Out of these, therefore, we exhibit only the lower series so as to strengthen our argument. But by throwing in a brief description of the upper series of sculptures, we leave their true natural effigy to the editors of things Spintherian and Freemasonic of the Middle Ages. Besides obscenities and things disgraceful, this series of images [omission in Latin text] and therefore adds less weight to the accumulation of our arguments, since besides the heads of Mete and Jaldabaoth (the one serene and beautiful, the other fierce and ugly; the one angelic, the other diabolical) more phantasmal things are present, which, even if indeed they do not lack a certain arcane sense, up to now our studies keep working toward demonstrating the same thing in the present. The bas-reliefs of the Schoengraber Church have achieved considerable prominence and up to now are well-preserved, including two series' of images, which from the posterior part of the church adorn on the outside a semicircular sacristy beautifully constructed out of square stones, so that each series might exhibit the system as complete. The lower one is to be viewed from left to right; the higher one from right to left. And since in this semicircular building there are three windows, the walls of which are made conspicuous, the work of the entire iconism is divided into three parts, so that there were three stations in the upper series and the same number of stations in the lower one.

Lower Series

In three stations three bas-relief images are contained, of which the first one represents the origin and start, the second the progress and development, the third the goal and triumph of Gnosis (that is, of the arcane doctrine of the Templars), so that after the symbols of the Ophites and of other Gnostics have been explained, there can be no doubt about the true sense of the images. We see, then, the history of the lapse of the first parents accomplished, to which certain things were added (but nothing pertinent to Biblical understanding) to be explained only from the figments of the Gnostics. For Eve is not veiled, as modesty would demand, but by her own hand is thoroughly laid bare and, in addition to the serpent, also a dog assaults her. The serpent embraces both the dog and Eve's arm with its winding coils. Whispering in her ear, he contrives the temptation, to which, easily yielding, with her other hand she displays the apple to Adam. Charmed, he is hindered by an ugly figure whose face bore the resemblance of the Devil. But if considered from a different angle, it cannot be denied that it bears some similarity to the head of Christ, crowned with thorns. This is Jaldabaoth, or Sabaoth, who, according to the doctrine of the Gnostics, tried to prevent Adam from yielding to seduction by the serpent, who, through Gnosis, that is, carnal knowledge, tried to show the way to Mother Achamoth. (See the sketch of this iconism at tab, III, fig. 1)

In the middle station a Templar, or Gnostic, is seen sitting on a throne, with his right hand blessing or swearing; in his left hand bearing a scepter. The throne at its base sits on that monstrous dragon whom we have come to know from the bas-reliefs of the second bowl, where the infant is threatened with absorption, and lest there be a hint of doubt that that dragon is the same about which Epiphanius speaks as a Gnostic symbol of the one who presides over the world, (who absorbs and again spits out every man not imbued with Gnosis), in this place a double infant can be seen, of whom one adheres to the jaws; the other, through the lower part of the body, is cast out by means of withdrawal. (See tab. III, fig. 2.) This is the dragon whom the Templars, having sculpted on their graves, trampled underfoot in the London temple. This, finally, is the same dragon who, at the time of establishment of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia, came out of Gnostic fabrications on the life of St. George, and with him, but without the infant, transferred into the British Shield. Also, for sure the Gnostic dragon absorbing the infant gave rise to the serpent Viscount, who up to the present can be seen in the seals of Milan. The hand blessing or swearing and the lily-bearing scepter present the same figure, just as on the most ancient coins of the Middle Ages, Emperors and bishops sitting on thrones are depicted blessing and ruling the world. The scepter here signifies world rulership. The figures standing by the throne indicate peoples bringing as a gift to a Templar or Gnostic (or, if you will, to the Order of the Temple or to the Gnosis sitting on the throne) fruits and animals of the earth (grain and egg). From various places of Scripture it is to be conjectured that the Gnostics thought that the right hand showing two fingers down and three raised meant a person possessed a certain secret and peculiar virtue. We believe those places have been perversely twisted to favor their opinion so that the Lord's right hand has performed virtue was engraved on the law's sepulcher (in Seelaender pag. 112 tab. B), where the right hand performing blessing covers the upper part of the cross so that, truncated, it might exhibit the figure T, that is, the sign of Baphomet. Scriptural too are such texts as: With a strong hand God led you out of Egypt (Exodus 3:10). I will send my hand and strike the Egyptians and the hand of the Lord will be upon your cattle (Exodus 9:22).

At the third station (tab. III, fig 3), we see a lion whom a Templar slaughters, with the assistance of three dogs, of which one grabs the lion from behind. This is the triumph of Gnosis, or of the spiritual Ophitic doctrine, over the religion of the God Sabaoth, who among the Gnostics is named Jaldabaoth, and under the form of a lion or a dragon, is trampled underfoot. You will trample the lion and dragon. Here, though, it is no longer trampled to signify contempt (which the Templars portray by trampling the cross), but now it is slaughtered by a Templar, with the assistance of a guide, who everywhere in these sculptures hints at the mystical and infamous kiss, by which Templars, in reception, kiss the spine at the rear. You see such a dog at the rear of a genuflecting idol (borrowed from the little book of curiosities and here delineated in tab. I, fig. 4), in which we recognize a Gnostic or Templar, who by means of a dog adhering to the posterior parts, indicates nothing other than the most disgusting outrage of the Templars. Hence, it is reasonable that by the cat, about which there is repeated mention in the accusation of the Templars, a puppy or dog is signified.

Through this slaughtered lion is made known what is the meaning of the ax and the lion's skin exhibited on the idols and bowls of the temple. The ax is exhibited as the instrument for killing the lion (see at the base of two-headed Baphomet tab. I, fig. 9 and in the procession of the mystic wedding on the second bowl in tab. II, fig. 2), just as the lion skin, a trophy of the lion already slaughtered, is tied around the limbs of the idols as a cloak. Even if the ax was already is circulated in the most ancient mysteries of the Good Goddess, and the cloak was already in use among the Essenes, the chief sense of the Freemasonic cloak, as in this cloak of the Templars, is to be noticed in the Essenic one. See, therefore, here in three bas-reliefs of the lower series the origin, progress and end of Gnosis, or of the arcane doctrine of the Templars, cunningly depicted through hieroglyphic images of the tree of life, of the Templar sitting on the throne and of the slaughtered lion.

The Upper Series

Even if it is not the purpose of this book to explore and explain all of the sculptures, since very many Freemasonic ornaments may be seen in the same place, nonetheless, let there be a brief mention of things which can contribute to confirming our arguments. As the lower order of sculptures, progressing from left to right, exhibits the entire symbolic history of Gnosis and of the Templar order, in similar fashion the upper system of bas-reliefs, proceeding from right to left, relates the biography of the Gnostic or Templar from infancy to death.

At the first station is discerned a boy, a future Ophite or Gnostic Templar, immodestly fondling a bear, an animal so addicted to this vice that among the Arabs is circulated a proverb [Arabic words]. To prevent this, and to claim the nursling for himself, the Templar charges forward with a lance in order to pierce the bear through and to lead the infant over to his own enticements, at which the abovementioned dog not obscurely hints. On the other hand, the boy, now having become an adolescent, resists the flatteries of the girl, who has tried to entice him by offering him flowers. Among these two erotic sculptures of early youth and adolescence, the top of vaulted stone with a square covering represents the Order of the Temple, to which adhere two Templars dressed in the robe of the order, and girded about, indicating the true support of their future life to be the angular stone and the door-key of the Gnostic edifice. The Freemasonic ornaments about this station agree very well with the Bacchic sense of the same form, composed from grape clusters and vine foliage, with phalluses intermixed (placed so high up that from the lower part they are difficult to discern), all of which are perceived to be, up to now, well preserved.

The station which is the middle of the upper series is just as the first, divided into three parts. Instead of a human or angelic head for Gnosis, or the temple order, there is a diabolical head there, that of Jaldabaoth, who draws to himself from one hand the feminine (Mete), from the other a Templar, struggling, and thus is a figure of tribulations and adversities by which Gnosis and its followers are attacked by Jaldabaoth. Another Templar, in flight and more fortunate, snatches himself free buy sitting on a lion that carries him off, as if fully tamed and obedient to him. From another standpoint, there corresponds to this fleeing Templar a dolphin (as it seems) in collusion with a bird so that its head can be absorbed by it. Since the lower part of the dolphin is cut off and only its upper part remains, one cannot assert what animal is represented there, although the same figures of a dolphin and a bird (indeed, a dove) in collusion and kissing one another are noticed on the golden cross of the Templars, preserved in the treasury of August Prince Archduke Anton, Supreme Leader of the Teutonic Knights.

The third station, divided into three parts, exhibits the abundant supply of all the figures. In the topmost stone of the vault, the keystone, the same head is perceived, with a magisterial cover, which we already saw at the first station, with two hands extended, of which the left hand swears or blesses. The right hand holds up a book (surely, of the new gnostic law, or of the arcane doctrine of the Templars).

On the right-hand side, where the book is, veiled Mete holds in her bosom the infant, to whom she holds out the fruit of the tree of Gnosis, namely, the apple. However, lest, in such a number of profane figures, that woman might be held to be the virgin mother of God, the total character of the veil, refers to it as belonging to the idols, and holds forth the twisted neck chains in which we recognize the gilded attire, which, according to the articles of accusation against the Templars, bears an idol at the neck. Next to the hand performing blessing there are placed mystical vases or bowls in diverse order, namely: three in a series; two up above and one separately. Their meaning remains hidden, but these individual bowls, already having been understood as a symbol for mystical societies, perhaps here indicate ballias, or chapter houses of the Brotherhood of Temple Militia, which are governed by this chair of order in Austria. Or, if you will, even here is to be sought a gnostic sense of a six-fold group, which already among the Pythagoreans was called the "genital number" and that of "marriage mates." According to the Gnostics, however, Jaldabaoth commanded the six virtues (that is, archons, which exactly correspond to Amschaspands[i] of the Magi) to form man. The same world, too, was created in six days, with reference to these six mystic bowls, which signify vessels of generation.

The middle station having been sufficiently explained, finally, we will turn, first, to the right, then to the left. You see on the right a woman veiled, with an infant, such as we have seen earlier on the idols, her head covered, with an infant. The demon Jaldabaoth tries to drag, by hand, this woman sitting on a chair, or to pull her to himself. With the other hand, however, and holding a trident from three human heads, which were piled in a basket along with other things, another trident is selected. If this woman, head covered, is to be recognized as Mete, what is the meaning of these three heads? Although I do not affirm it for certain, I think, nonetheless, it can be conjectured that, perhaps, these heads are the founders of the Mosaic, Christian and Islamic religions, which in serving the god Sabaoth, or Jaldabaoth, make known among mankind his form of worship, and therefore were designated by the non-believers of that age, when this church was built, as the three imposters.

On the left side is exhibited the end of a Templar's life, already dead and lying on the ground, with the Archangel Michael holding a judgment scale and weighing his deeds. The scale, on which were placed apples, desserts and other blandishments of the senses, and by which the Ophitic Templar's life is represented, descending to the Earth, shows that the judgment of Michael favors him, because in order to hinder Jaldabaoth, he tries to depress the other, ascending, part of the scale. This allegory of the scale of judgment about which we discoursed more fully in our commentary (page 288, Volume 5) corresponds very well to the total doctrine of the Gnostics, since, as we have seen above, the serpent, called by the Gnostics Michael, carries out the details of judgment in this way: Thinking, in the day of judgment, about the life of the Templar, or Gnostic, he accepts all of his disgraceful deeds as good works. In this way [goes] the cycle of a Gnostic's life, whom we see being educated towards Gnosis, that is the doctrine of "genital wisdom," from the earliest years of infancy. Thenceforth, we see him hounded by Jaldabaoth. He is, with the death of the same and the final judgment, terminated, and this double series of bas-reliefs, declares the double history of a Gnostic and of Gnosis, or of a Templar and of the entire order.

Besides these aforementioned bas-reliefs, in the sanctuary of the church itself, lions' feet were discerned sculpted, which are symbols of Jaldabaoth [and], as his footsteps here, are terrifying. In the four corners the four Evangelists were represented with considerable ridicule, under the figure of three animals and a demon (instead of an angel). In a dwelling pertaining to the deacon, from the region of the church, three bas-reliefs of Templars, inserted into the walls of the ruins of the chapter houses (now a cellar and wine cellar) are noted to have been brought over here. Dressed with the solemn habit, a sword is in one of his hands, and in the other he holds the sign of Baphomet (namely, a phallus; that is, the key of Gnosis, hidden under the sign T).

2. Church of the Templars of Waltendorf

Where the mountains descend into the plain Tayensen, the church of Waltendorf arises, to which not only sculptures but also the idols having two heads, (which in the year 1792 were unearthed out of a subterranean location previously unknown) testify their belonging to the Templars. These idols, partly wood, partly pottery, partly stone, are believed by the diggers to be the work of devils, and having been thrown into that place, were a childish plaything, as many yet living will affirm. From their description it can easily be ascertained that these idols were nothing but ones of Baphomet. From the south side of this church can be discerned a wall brought to a completion, which (as will soon be proved) evidences that the fragments are of a cloister built on the south side. Finally, outside on the wall various bas-reliefs have been inserted, of which three, according to the Eislianam) delineation and explanation (which you can read about more fully in Archiv fur Geographie Historie Staats – und Kriegskunst, Number 44, 45) is to be discerned here. (See tab III, fig. 14, 15, 16.) You will see in the same place a Templar knight who holds in one hand a branch or a flaming sword, in the other a staff in the form of the Baphometic sign T, then a dog (fig. 14), and finally the Templar himself (whose ceremonial hat is the same as that of the idols), clothed with the skin of a lion already slaughtered, sitting in the form of an extended tub and fondling his penis. All three of these, the T, the dog and the lion, are mere symbols of the Templars and Ophites.

3. Berchtolsdorf Church

In the village of Berchtolsdorf, commonly called Petersdorf, which is no more than two hours distant from Vienna, there is a church and chapter-house together with the ruins of a cloister, so well-preserved that it is a wonder how they endured for so many centuries amidst so many and so great calamities from and sieges by the Turks. In this church, built in Gothic style, no sculptures were noticed, but in the troop of Baphomet a huge T sign is discerned, made up of two large stones, of which one was upright, the other lying across it. On the exterior part of the church above the door, a bas-relief appears, but bruised at the middle, which perhaps can be taken as a likeness of God the Father and of the God-equal Virgin by persons who have not been initiated into the secret doctrine of the Templars. But since the figure bearing the scepter looks like the one in the Schoengraber bas-reliefs, sitting on the dragon, and together with another female has a veil spread out on her head, we think it not absurd that the first woman indicates the Order of Templars, and the second woman indicates Mete.

South of the church there exists up to the present a cloister of the Templars, nearly destroyed, yet very well-preserved as to distribution of the building. With the church at Schoengraber, too, on the south exists a cloister, upon whose foundations we see constructed a lodging house. That this [type of] cloister always arises on the south is no accident, but seems to have been situated there on purpose in imitation of the Jerusalem residence, which, as Willermus Tyrius[ii] testifies, “The king had yielded to them in the palace located on the southern side of the temple.” This type of reason also agrees wonderfully with the placing of the cloister next to the Titurel temple. Hence, is confirmed that the temple in Titurel existed as a paradigm for all Templar churches, or better, to have been decorated by the poet according to their image. 52)

4. The Church at Altenburg

In a town of Hungary, Deutsch-Altenburg, near the boundary of Austria, an ancient Templar church exists in which, similarly above the door, a certain mystic figure is exhibited, the meaning of which can be rightly interpreted from already well-known gnostic fabrications. You see here the masculo-feminine Mete, or Achamoth, dressed in a mystical cloak and bearded, up to whom comes an angel with a veil. Since in the Pleroma, Sophia (Achamoth, Mete) had approached angels, and observing them naked, had blushed for shame, she snatched a veil to cover her head. Therefore, this is the veil offered to her by the angel in this bas-relief, and that is what is so described in Titurel. It cannot be denied that the description was wholly borrowed from a particular Gnostic representation; that is to say, concerning the angel descending from the heavens and bringing the veil, and concerning the female dove, likewise descending, which signified the Holy Spirit. For the Gnostics believed the very same Achamoth to be the Holy Spirit and represented it under the image of a dove.

5. The Church of the Village of St. Martin in Szaladen

On the border of Styria and Hungary, in the district called Murau, from the itinerary of the late illustrious Count a Teleky[iii] we have found to exist a Templar church adorned with various profane hieroglyphic sculptures and provided with subterranean areas. The sketch of these we had intended to incise onto bronze, along with so many other sculptures which we here exhibit, in hope that after six months during which we left off editing this dissertation, while awaiting these figures (promised by the Most Excellent Count Georgio Festetic), [the dissertation] abiding so long under duress. Finally, after the expiration of a year, we gave up on it being published.

Therefore, concerning this church of St. Martin, bishop of Pomocje, on the peninsula called Murau, we will add here only a few things we were able to learn from the letter of a parish priest, the Rev. Joseph Horvath, through a friend.

That this was once a Templar church is proved by the fact that its daughter church of New Duor (Ui Udvar), distant from it by only a quarter hour, at one time had been of the same association, and had flourished up to the year 1277 CE, according to the testimony of Szentivany (in dissert. Paralip. Catal. 44). The predicted New Curia, which pertained to the church of St. Martin as a daughter to her mother, was given a praeceptor [teacher] subject to the Priory of the Gold Cloister in Croatia. Also, in the time of Father Augustine Gazotti, who was constituted bishop of Zagreb, a throng of cross-bearing soldiers, well known according to historians, existed in the Church of the New Curia on the island of Murodravana, above Csaktornyam. The year, which was seen inscribed on the left side of the arched altar in the Church of St. Martin, testifies to some recent repair of it, namely, 1468. However, sculptures certainly a century or two centuries earlier should be compared with the secret doctrine of the Templars. They consist of figures of a red cross of varying size, and of heads (which, whether they bear the stamp of Mete or Jaldabaoth, is difficult to decide from a distance).

As to other Templar churches or cloister residue in Hungary, even though we vigorously busied ourselves looking for them, we have been able to discover nothing certain. This alone is to be noted: Coins (to be illustrated below) found among bronzes in a certain building not far from Csekut (District of Weszprim) testify that this was a Templar building. The people attribute this to a certain order (Vörö Baratok, that is, the “Red Brotherhood”) and in that past year very large stones, on whose face various figures had been sculpted, were converted for use at the mill. Gilded coins found in a pottery jar in the same location are very much the same as the gilded coins extracted from the brick wall of the cloister of Wultendorf, and as the gilded coins found in the ruins of the Templar stronghold at Neunkirchen, in the district of Cellejensi in Styria (also found in a pottery jar). Thus these coins coming forth from the ruins of Templar mansions in Austria, Styria and Hungary, through similarity of type, offer wonderful testimony.

6. The Prague Church

According to the testimony of the principal writers of Bohemia’s history (who are the following: 1. Continuator Cosmae, 2. Hajek, 3. Paprotzki, 4. Betzkowsky, 5. Gelasius Dobner, 6. Pubitsckka, 7. Voigt, 8. Redel, 9, Pelzel, 10. Rohn, 11. Dubravius, 12. Hammerschmidt), the Prague Temple (with its cloister) began to be built in the name of St. Wencesla by the first king of that name about the year 1249, and was finished in the year 1253. The architect of this was a lay brother by the name ofAnastasius. During a period of 15 years he built diverse Templar temples and inns in the same way, in the places called Tiffenbach, Zwikow, Hluboka, Bürglitz and Stara. In the year 1311, after abolition of the order, the church with its cloister, was transferred, by King John to the Order of the Knights of St. John, and thereafter, under the prior of Berchthold from Henneberg, sold to an order of nuns under the rule of St. Dominic. Since the year 1782, after the abolition of the nuns, the church with its cloister, having been bought, even now is possessed by a knight, according to Schoenfeld--a man very eager for antiquities and most expert in their preservation. There exist in that place most precious monuments of a double genre; that is to say, glass in windows, depicted by the skillful artifice of the Middle Ages, and others on the walls of the cloisters (called in everyday speech Kreuzgang), expressed in colors, which through many centuries lay hidden covered in lime; now, though, with the covering fallen away or corroded, with the colors being quite well-preserved, spread out with oil, they shine. All fifteen glass objects depicted (which you may note at tab. IV, num.13) exhibit the very same figures as certain gilded coins of that age--very singular figures, which not being understood up to now by numismatic specialists, have furnished occasion for various comments. That all of these represent nothing other than Mete we will demonstrate further down in the discourse on numismatics. The twenty-four Freemasonic symbols (in the same tablet noted under letter B) are depicted in the cloister above the wall, in disks, of which the diameter is twelve fingers. That these temple symbols are identical with the Freemasonic ones we will soon prove, noting only that besides the well-known instruments of wall makers, here also occur the sun, moon, stars, sword, truncated cross and seven serpents, all of which, plainly, are Templaric or Ophitic symbols. Concerning the seven serpents, or concerning the water-serpent provided with three heads as a Gnostic symbol, see the mystical ode of the Thebaic Gnostics, wherein the Reverend Bishop and most learned Doctor Münter published many things concerning the Gnostics and Ophites whom, as Templars, he could by no means look upon as innocent.

7. The Egra Church

In this city, there are two very ancient churches on Mt. Castelli that have survived many grievous events of the Middle Ages, most celebrated in Bohemian historical accounts, of which one is higher, the other below it, subterranean. Here, in the time of schism between the Catholic and Reformed religions, they celebrated their sacred rites at the same time. But anciently this was a Templar temple, which had an underground church, as everywhere, for a chapter location. There, in the place of angular stones and keystones for vaulting, are seen the most obscene objects, all of them pertaining to generating, or to Ophitic Gnosis. You see these column ornaments and capitals sculpted in tab. 4. In fig. 31 you see a male and female shamelessly displaying their sex. In fig. 32, Baphometic capitals are exalted to the apex of the columns. In fig. 33 we see Sphinxes, about which there will be discussion below in the numismatic discourse. Meanwhile, you may wish to compare them with tab. 5, nos.19, 30, 31, 45, noting that the shape of these things agrees with that of the gilded coins. Finally, in fig. 34, we see serpents with twisted coils embracing themselves, with dogs' heads such as are seen in figures of Abraxas (see tab. IV, fig. 1, 2, 3, 4) and other Gnostic monuments. You will see under the same number in the lower figure the same bird and serpent, united in one body, playing together with kisses, as are seen in fig. 11 and 12, of which one shows, instead of a serpent, a dolphin as the ornament of the Templar cross preserved in the treasury of the Supreme Magister of the Teutonics. Such figures seem to have been sculpted also in the church of Prague mentioned above, since the bas-reliefs of all of these angular stones, keystones and vaulting were scratched. It is for certain that this is not to be attributed to damage due to the passing of time, but to the pious zeal of nuns who, since they were not able to withdraw these sculptures from view as pictures forgotten due to lime, preferred to destroy them.

After these descriptions of the Templar churches in the Austrian Empire, many of them up to now not yet described, it is permissible to recognize them as such, or at least as the work of the Gnostic Freemasons. Many such things can be seen up to now both in Germany and France. We make special mention, first, of the Erfurt Church and, secondly, of the church at Mount Montholionis, situated at Pictavis.

The Erfurt church of the Templars today belongs to St. Michael, and has been restored after four centuries from the ruins of conflagration. It exhibits no monument of an earlier age, but in other churches of this city, many Freemason monuments occur. Even if these monuments cannot be proved to be of the Templars, we consider them to be noted as Freemasonic ornaments or symbols of this age and, above all, they agree with the Schoengraberian sculptures. You see in the same place a bear who seizes a man, as [happened to] an infant in the Schoengraberian sculptures. There are in that place, on the lofty western pillars, dogs on the outside, and in this church, in place of a female Caryatide figure[iv], a boy standing on his hands, holding up his prokton[v]; finally, on the vault stone we see a certain monstrous figure engaging in the most vile embracing and kissing with an infant (see tab. IV, fig. , 2, 3).

Similar hieroglyphic figures of heads, both of animals and of monsters, according to the testimony of Millinus, occur principally in Pictavis, which was the principal seat of the Templars. The most notable of all is the octagonal church on Mount Montholion, which Montfaucon[vi] attributes to ancient France. But Millinus[vii] restores it to the Middle Age. Among the statues which are seen there, the two sketched here are certainly Ophitic.

IV. On the Doctrine of the Ophites

Although we will now, in explanation of the monuments, touch upon many things regarding the most evil doctrines of all Gnostic sects, for the purpose of explaining the Ophite system [in particular], as it is found in the writings of the [Church] Fathers, here we shall only briefly expound upon it. Hence, we will go over these subjects quickly, so as to demonstrate the connection between Ophitic orgies and the most ancient mysteries.

No one, indeed, doubts that the doctrine of the Ophites was only a sect of the Gnostics and a heresy from heresies (Irenaeus, Epiphanius, and Theodoretus). Therefore many things about which the most weighty historians of the Ophites are silent, are to be found in [the Fathers'] general comments about Gnostics, and especially out of the history of the Valentinians. Truly there are passage written [by the Church Fathers] about the general system of the Gnostics that add clarity to many of the things being discovered in our monuments. For the sake of brevity, those who find our explanations insufficient must thoroughly read Mosheim's history of the Ophites[viii]. In the first place, we believe that a matter to be investigated is that the correct interpretation of the word Gnoseos (which in the Scriptures signifies true wisdom), has been wickedly distorted. Of no concern to us is anything about Gnostic Neoplatonism, whose spiritual system is expounded in the Apocryphal books of St. Hermes Trismegistus; nor anything about a Gnostic Christian, who, in the Stromata books [by Clement of Alexander] is presented as the perfect ectypon of wisdom; nor anything about heretical Christians. We are only concerned with the most wretched Ophite Gnostics, who, since they trample Christ, in absolutely no way are to be called Christians. Their doctrine, taken from beliefs of the most ancient mythology of the Greeks, Phoenicians, and Egyptians, expands with its fictions the old doctrine of oriental philosophy, and pollutes in every way the true Bible text so that, therefrom, a certain unspeakable monster issues forth.

If you wish to go back to the true origin of Ophitic doctrine, you can derive it easily from Tautus [Thoth] himself, who, according to Eusebius, first introduced the worship of serpents. In the most ancient religions of all nations the serpent plays principal parts, as in the Indian, Orphic, and Druidic systems. However, many who inquired into the origin of serpent worship (as very recently [did] the most learned English Mythologist [George Stanley] Faber in The Origin of Pagan Idolatry) failed sufficiently to distinguish the double meaning of the serpent, since the principle of evil, Typho, is represented by the dragon, and the principle of good, Agathodaimon [good demon], or Nous [mind], is represented by the serpent. Now, the investigation into the origin of the Ophitic doctrine having been, for the time being, set aside, we will undertake to expound the system of the Gnostics:

Butho, that is, the bottomless pit, the First Father, called Aeon, Proarchon and Perfect, was cohabiting with Ennoia, otherwise called Kharis, otherwise Syge. From them proceeds Nous (Mind), who was called Second Father, and Arche, and Monogenes, and First Son and Truth. These generated Logos, that is, the Word, and Zoen, that is, Life. Out of these arose the First Man and the First Church, the prototypes of the [human] first man and of the Church on earth.

Out of this ideal ogdoas [group of eight], whose seat is the Pleroma, that is, out of fullness, or the spiritual universe, so called, ten other Aeons proceeded, again twelve, so that the number of them [eventually became] thirty. The last of these was Sophia, that is, wisdom, or holy spirit, who among diverse Gnostic sects bearing diverse names was also called Achamoth, Prunicos, Barbelot, Noria, and Enthyhmesis. This ultimate masculo-feminine Aeon, wishing to learn about the First Father, wasted away in this desire for knowledge and cognition, and would have been dissolved, except that, in order to emend this most miserable cupidity, Horus had come up to Terminus [the end] of all things, displayed under the image of a cross, crying out, Iao! The end of carnal desire was, therefore, the cross, otherwise called Horus, otherwise Fundamentum and Lytrottes (that is, dissolving), Carpities (that is, fruit-bearing), Horothetes (that is, the end of punishment), and Metagoges (that is, the conductor).

Sophia. struck down at the clamor. Iao withdrew into the Pleroma. But Enthymesis (that is, intelligence, or better, his will), which had indulged the desire of acquiring cognition of the Father, went into exile outside of the Pleroma, that is, the seat of the Aeons, and then was called no longer Enthymesis, but Achamoth. This masculo-feminine [deity], even the same one called Metropater by the Ophitic, was accepted as one and the same Aeon.

This woman, aflame with desire for getting cognition of Christ, leaped forth, as previously mother Sophia, driven by the desire to get cognition of the Father, had also done. Christ ran to meet her, as to the mother of Horus, crying out Jao! Struck down by this outcry, she generated matter so that out of her tears and laughter came forth water. Along with Christ, to whom she was said to be converted, she was a light to the nations. Christ then left on Earth an only-begotten Paraclete. He, together with angels, came to Enthymes, already called Achamoth, who, when she saw the Paraclete and nude angels, became filled with shame, and covered herself with a veil. Finally, out of shame she generated all existing things, material, animal and spiritual. She also generated a Demiurge, who also was called the Third Father, that is, counting from the First Father (Bytho), and Second Father (Monogene [only-begotten]).

This son of Achamoth, situated outside of the Pleroma, (the seat of the perfect Aeons) founded the world, distinctions being made between animal and material substances, and the sevenfold order of the heavens, which is called Sabbath in opposition to Pleroma. This Demiurge, or the creator of the heavens and of the earth, named Jaldabaoth, or Sebaoth, with six Archons, his sons, and with Mother Sophia, established the second Ogdoas, the lower one, according to the paradigm of the upper Ogdoas. From the liquid of Mother Sophia’s tears, the Demiurge formed man, both animal and human. He did this not by himself, but was assisted by six archonic virtues, his sons, whom he called upon to help him create man using these words: Come! Let us make man in our image. Once having been formed, the Demiurge, endowed with only demonic virtue and not knowing the Supreme God (Monogenes), acting in haughtiness, saying: I am Father and God Sabaoth [of armies, hosts], and besides me [there is] no God. Mother Achamoth, though, hearing these things, responded to him: I do not want to lie, Jaldabaoth, for above you is Anthropus (the first man of the Pleroma) and the son of Anthropus.

Having formed man, Jaldabaoth (with his six helpers) inspired him with part of the divine light, of which he himself was full. Therefore, the man, immediately endowed with mind, began to give thanks to the First Man in the Pleroma (that is, to the true only begotten God), no longer reverencing the fabricator Jaldabaoth and his six helpers.

This doctrine of the Valentinians and of other Gnostics concerning the Pleroma and the upper ogdoas seems to have been given less attention by the Ophites, who directed their attention more to the lower ogdoas, who were time and again involved in altercations happening between Jaldabaoth and his mother, Achamoth, after the creation of man. No doubt, Jaldabaoth, envious of the particle of light in the man he had formed, decided to withdraw the light from him through the woman. That the mother might prevent this, she drew herself down into the twelve parts of the serpent, who was also known as the son of Jaldabaoth. Through him she persuaded Eve that, contrary to the precept of Jaldabaoth, she should seduce Adam into eating the fruit of the tree of life and knowledge, and that the new awareness gained thereby would show him the way to Mother Achamoth.

Now that this very brief exposition of the Gnostic and Ophitic system is completed, all of the symbols expressed in our idols representing Mother Achamoth, or Mete, will be explained singularly and collectively with a fresh interpretation in new light. Of these, we will address the twelve principal ones each individually. Separately, we have seen to their being incised on bronze, so that their arcane symbolism and its connection with with all of the symbols of the Freemasons might appear in clearer light. Aside from the palm branch, the Calvary and the sword, (three things common to the Ophite Templars and the Freemasons), the twelve principal symbols in sequence are: 1. Truncated cross, 2. bowl. 3. Serpent, 4. veil, 5. Chain, 6. Girdle, 7. rod, 8. Book, 9. Sevenfold candelabrum, 10. Sun, 11. Moon, 12. Stars.

1. Truncated cross, which, as we have explained, signifies both a phallus and a key.
2. Mystical chalice
3. Serpent, guide to true Gnosis, indicates the most filthy licentiousness, through bending (similar to contorted inner parts) and because of astuteness, was named Cosmocrator (Ruler of the World).
4. The mystic veil by which Achamoth, having seen the nudity of the angels, covered her head. The significance of this veil among the Freemasons (through the passage of time being poorly understood) was that it was believed to indicate the veil of the temple, as also the tassels hanging from the phallus were interpreted as the fringe of the veil. (see tab. I, fig. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13).
5. The hermetic chain, [seen] as a collar going around the neck of Mete (see tab. I, fig. 1, 6).
6. The girdle of Mete, made from the skin of a slaughtered lion, signifying the abolished worship of Jaldabaoth (see tab. I, fig. 2, 6).

7. The rod, by which the orgies of a wedding are preceded, and the ax, with which the lion is to be slaughtered (see tab. II, fig. 2 and tab. III, fig. 3).
8. The sevenfold candelabra, also a symbol of the old worship to be extinguished, and, in Ophitic orgies we see it extinguished (see tab. II, fig. 1).
9. The book of the new law, or the codex of arcane doctrine (Ophitic, Templaric , Freemasonic) (see tab. II. Fig. 1).
10. The sun, moon and stars on idols and bowls of men who generate [ithyphallic fertility idols] are symbols of the new doctrine. This star symbol is called by the French Freemasons etoile flamboyante [“flaming star”]. It is the same thing referred to by the Teutonic term signatstern[ix], which name, according to the inscription of the Templars, to be cited below, means distinguished is Mete’s charity, according to the view prevalent today (see tab. II, fig. 5, 7, 8).

Since these symbols are still in use among the Freemasons even today, and since much concerning their origin has been thoroughly looked into, it is proved that many of them are very ancient and already were used in various mysteries of the ancients.

1. It is clear from the writings of the Freemasons that, among them, the hammer took the place of the truncated cross, which signifies a phallus and key (see Signatstern I, 266, II, 180, 190, III. 193, and 262). The true sense of this hieroglyphic note, has already been discussed above.

2. The symbolism of the bowl is seen as the same by today's Freemasons as it was by the [Church] Fathers [writing about the Gnostics] Fathers (see Signatstern I, p. 327). We have described two or three such bowls in the treasury preserved at the Imperial-Royal palace, and two or three of them are seen in the sculptures of the Schoengraberian Templar temple. In the Sibylline mysteries we found both the vessel called Cernos, and the cymbal, out of which one drank (Clement of Alexandria, Protrepticus, p. 14).
3. The Belt, which among the Freemasons designates the unity of the brotherhood, and was accepted among the Templars in the same sense by that most vile society. Also, no one is ignorant that both from the most distant antiquity up to the present, among the Brahmins and Magi, the belt is held as a most holy and mystical bond. See in the writings of the Farsis about the Costi (from which the Cestus[x] is to be derived), and in the Brahmin system described by Fr. Paulinus[xi], what things are said about this belt.
4. The veil by which Achamoth or Mete covers her head, we think refers to Pherecydes Peplon[xii], of which Origen (Against Celsus VI, 621) and Clement of Alexandria (Stromata VI, 621) make mention. Under these fables lie, we don't doubt, a most ancient tradition regarding man's fall through the serpent, and concerning the veil which Eve, coming out of paradise, required for covering nudity. These beliefs of Pherecydes, confused with traditions of Scripture, seem to have given to the Gnostics occasion for inventing fables regarding the veil by which Achamoth, upon seeing nude angels, covered

5. The symbolic chain, which is used at the conclusion of the ritual meals of the Freemasons, hangs from the neck of the idols, as a necklace hangs down (see Signatstern III, 121). It is in reference to this also that the Freemasons encircle the neck with rope (see Signatstern I, 120 and III, 65). Also, we have said that this is to be compared to the Hermetic chain of the Neoplatonists, and to the gods' chain in Homer.[xiii]
6. The girdle by which the idols of the Templars are girded, just like today's Freemasons, was in use not only among the Essenes, but was required already in the Eleusinian mysteries, as the final rite of initiation was performed girded with precious stones in the pelt of a hinny (see Recherches sur les Mysteres du Paganism, Vol. I, 347).[xiv
7. The rod, held in hand by one of the ministers of the mystic wedding, which is engraved on the second bowl, was used in the Sabazian orgies, as can be seen from the aforementioned work (see Vol. 2, 96). To this rod perhaps the Freemasonic gauge corresponds, even if the identity isn't apparent. Thus, on the contrary, Freemasonic instruments, even if they are not portrayed on our idols and bowls, are perceived everywhere in the mathematical figures on Gnostic idols, temple bowls and seals. (See also the icons sent forth from the book Abraxis about Nicolai)[xv]. In place of such instruments as the square, the compass, and the lead plummet [plumb-bob], we have found the square, the compass and the triangle. However, in pictures on the windows of the Templar church of Prague, we have seen sketched out, very diligently, all of the Freemasonic instruments.

8. The Book and sevenfold candelabrum, which signifies the Old and New Testament were borrowed from this.
9. It would be unnecessary to prove that the sun and moon were the most ancient gods of all nations. In the Eleusinian Mysteries the sun and moon were represented by the Daduch and Epibom (V.S. Croix I, 397).[xvi]
10. The stars (shining and radiating things of the Freemasons) are certainly none other than Lucifer, in which Mithra (the Genius of the Sun) according to the Zend-Avesta books, delays, and in which even today, according to the poetic myths of the Persians, Anaitis resides whose lyre resonates with the solar rays instead of strings. We have said already that the Letter G, inscribed on this star by the Freemasons, has the same meaning as on our monuments (see tab.2, fig. 9), namely, Gnosis (Die höchsten Grade der Freimaurerei, Berlin, 1804, S. 25).[xvii]

Besides these symbols common to Templars and Freemasons, there are some others of them, which, undeniably, came into use also by the Templars, although we have not found a trace of them either in sculptures (on idols and bowls), or in the exposition of the system of the Gnostics. Of that kind, for example, are those most celebrated columns of the temple, Jachin and Boaz, which call to mind those more ancient columns of Hermes and Hercules. Concerning these matters, we see on the bowls and idols, indeed, not a trace, but they are depicted in the Templar church of St. Anna of Prague. Also, they are perceived engraved on the wall of the citadel of Pottenstein (which was a seat of the Templars). In the same place you see a feminine figure adorned with nipples, which on account of a hammer is called Faber [artisan], snugly fit between two columns so that she can sustain both of them as they stagger and threaten ruin (tab. III, fig. 9). This is that Mete, or Sophia, who here, bearing a hammer instead of the Baphometic character T, tries to support the two tottering columns of Solomon's Temple with all her might (arms and back)[xviii], or to put it in the very words of the inscription, distinguished by virtue and charity[xix]. These two tottering columns are the same as those which, having collapsed into the form of St. Andrew's cross (X) following abolition of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia, the Freemasons tried to rebuild with all their power. By joining the letters together and separating them into words, we can read there (tab. III, fig. 12): "the distinguished charity of Mete uproots the enemy." Further down we will present more proof that this "distinguished charity of Mete" was nothing other than paiderastian [Greek, "pederasty"]. At this point it will suffice to address the fact that Mete is sealed on the forehead with the Tau sign (a Baphometic character) (see tab. I, fig. 1), which the Ophites, along with many others, seemed to have taken from the Mithraites, for, to use the words of Tertullian, (De Praescriptione Haereticorum [The Prescription Against the Heretics], 40), Mithra placed a sign on the forehead of her soldiers, and under the sword redeemed the crown.

Besides these (of which, up to now. nothing has been gathered from the idols, bowls and writings of the Gnostics, but which, nevertheless, are observed in pictures of the churches and sculptures of the Templar citadel), it seems reasonable to us that other Freemasonic dogmas (about which there is nothing in our monuments) had already been transmitted in the arcane doctrine of the Templars. For example, consider the myth of Hiram slain, whose columns we discern in the little windows of the church (and engraved on the walls of the citadel of Pottenstein). This masculo-feminine architect, sustaining these columns, we observe to be none other than Mete. Hence, not rashly, we think that the architect Hiram, slain by his three officers, represents nothing other than Gnosis, or natural religion, slaughtered by three officers (the three heads of whom we have mentioned above).[xx]

These are the three heads which are seen in the Gnostic seal (see tab IV, fig. 5), and which are depicted in the Schoengraberian bas-reliefs using a trident to free Jaldabaoth from a coffin of sorts. They were also signified by the three knots of the Templar belt. Besides these three human heads, hated by the Gnostics and Templars, we discover three additional animals loathed by the Templars and Freemasons. We have seen in the bas-reliefs, idols, and bowls found at Templar churches that the Lion, the dragon and the bear represent Jaldabaoth, the one presiding over the world and the author of effeminacy. Also, the lion, bear and tiger were to the Freemasons bitterly hostile animals who disturbed the peace of the “blessed valley.”

At present, many other symbols of the Gnostics and Freemasons, being in agreement one with another, we will lightly graze. St. John [the Baptist] (whom Freemasonic societies venerate as a patron, and who, their tradition goes, was imbued with a particular arcane doctrine (Gnostic, to be sure), is now held by Gnostics as a special object of reverence. They twist Scripture texts in favor of their own understanding. For example, What did you go into the desert to see? A reed being agitated by the wind? [Further], Among those born of women there arose no one greater than John the Baptist. By “reed” they understand John not yet perfected; by “greater” than those born of women they understand him now initiated. At length, they declare themselves to be greater than John. Indeed, they say, These things refer to us, so that the one among us who is less, that one is more outstanding than John (St. Epiphanius, Against Heresies, Book 1, Heresy 6). From John, or from the fiery baptism of the Mithraites (compare Welker and Zoega’s Abhandlungen [Treastises] I, 376), both the Gnostics and the Freemasons chose the spiritual baptism of wisdom and of fire, which we have found everywhere on idols and bowls. Because it provides purging from the most vile dregs of unspeakable lust, among the Freemasons it was called die Lichttaufe [“the Baptism of Light”]. In this baptism, as we have already shown above out of many passages of the Church Fathers, there are certain especially foreign words, either Hebrew, or others unknown to the profane, that were employed (see Epiphanius Book I, Vol. III, 20, and St. Irenaeus, Book I, ch. 21, 3), in which they injected a major horror for the initiates. In the same way, too, the arcane words of the Freemasons are all Hebrew, such as Macbenac, Gabaon, Boas, Jakin, Giblim, Chochmah, Hach olel, Jah, Jehova, Elohim, Adonai Schadai, Gagas, Elruach, Urim Tumim (see instructions of diverse grades here and there, Signatstern I, 130, 18, and what Welthusen says about them in Pokeach Iwrim [by Johann Kaspar Velthusen] from1804, pages 44, 54, 88, 160, 164). Finally, we have come to recognize that various values and rites among the Gnostics and the Templars are the same among the Freemasons. For example, the number thirteen, was sacred in the election of the Temple Magister, but among the Gnostics signified the number of Aeons (twelve) along with the First Father, was held as sacred also among the Freemasons (see Signatstern I, 190. See page 105), and in their monasteries a watchman armed with a sword kept watch (Frere Gardien, French for Guardian Brother), just as in the chapters of the Templars it was customary for one of them to keep watch.

These things, if our conjecture is correct, easily [connect] the lineage of the Mathematici [astrologers] of the Middle Ages, that is, to the Freemasons and their secret mathematics discipline, and one may reference that to Oriental, Chaldaic, Syriac and Egyptian philosophy. The things that we refer to regarding establishment of the first Freemasonic temple, or Solomonic House, from Arab historians, deserve greater attention, since no episode in history is known to us which better explains the establishment of Freemasonry. We believe that “temple of wisdom” (Darol-hikmet, [Arabic writing]), which Hakemus[xxi] established in Cairo at the end of the eleventh century, to have been the very first Masonic Lodge to which histories attest. However, this temple of wisdom (as we learn from Macrisio) is a certain kind of academy in which were handed down precepts of mathematics for the clarification of all philosophies, enhanced by regal wealth, and the numerous crowds of students of every kind and sex. In addition to this public doctrine, there flourished in the same place, also, an arcane discipline. There were various levels to it, through which the candidate was launched. Ultimately he was taught to believe nothing and that it is permissible to do anything. Apostles of this incredible sect were soon diffused through all of Asia. Everywhere they would seek and adopt followers. Thus this new, impious doctrine, under the name Ismailis, acquired very great fame, and with fame, power. From the number of these apostles, too, was the [well-known Hassan Sabah, founder of the Assassins. He became the leader of this most famous order through sword and dagger. He resided in Persia in the citadel called Alamut, and ruled over two very large priories according to his own whim, one of them belonging to Chorassania, in the East, the other one, the western, in the mountains of Syria. The oriental Prior stayed in the mountains between Tortosa and Anntaradum, according to the writer of Gestorum Dei per Francos [The Acts of God Among the French, written by Guibert of Nogent in the early twelfth century], very well-known by the name of "The Old Man of the Mountain" [سـنان الـدين رشـيد, Rashīd ad-Dīn Sinān]. He was involved with the Templars in various interactions, both in peacetime and wartime, so that, at first defeated by the Assassins, they later became tributaries to him.

The identity of the symbols of the Templars with those of the Freemasons having been demonstrated by evidence, and the rites of both, on the whole, having been explained, it is now time to investigate the true origin of the Freemasons, and since we have never been admitted to their inmost parts, all the more freely shall we speak concerning their mysteries. Nevertheless, lest the reader lose faith in our conjectures, thinking them merely the declarations of the profane [the uninitiated], what is to be considered is that we have already scrutinized the instructions for the different grades [of Freemasonry] on various occasions in the time of the Egyptian expedition, in a home inhabited by French people and abandoned by them, and through us snatched from the inhabiting Turks, and then in writings made public through heredity, so that in whatever is published in books on Freemasonic mysteries, (La Maçonnerie Adonhiramite, Signatstern, Sarsenna , etc.), we will be able to sufficiently discern what is true and false. Therefore, although we are not publishing arcane things or violating oaths of secrecy, nevertheless, as aware ones--not indeed initiates, but aware ones—we should be allowed to more freely to bring forth our opinion, and to investigate the fount of Freemasonry.

Although the doctrine of the Templars (no doubt purged after destruction of the order) coalesced with that of the Freemasons (which is evident from their identical symbols, monuments and rites), I, nonetheless, reckon that the Freemasonic order is older than that of the Templars. I say this not because of the Freemasonic tradition which speaks of the synod held in England already in the ninth century, (see Sarsenna), but because of information gleaned from the history of buildings, and from monuments of antiquity.

The symbols of Freemasonic doctrine referred to here are mathematical figures and building instruments, which we find in pictures from the Templar churches and on Baphometic sculptures, with more of the same are being observed on the more ancient buildings, especially Scottish ones, and on the Gnostic monuments, as well as on the figure of Abraxas. (See the illustrations of lions taken from Macarius [for Abraxas and Apistopistus), and used by Nicolai in the ornamental frontispiece of his book.) The same things are being discovered in monuments of yet an earlier age, namely, the Roman (table, IV, fig. 9). Because of the inscriptions on these no argument can be brought against these being put there by the Freemasons, or wall artisans.

Since astronomy makes full use of geometry and its instruments, and out of the abuse of astronomy arose astrology, it seems to us reasonable that the astrologers, who in the time of Domitian were called Mathematici , (as with Suetonius and Juvenal[xxii]), used the same instruments.

Therefore, we believe that the geometric figures sculpted on the sepulchers of women and freedmen signify that either the one who placed it, or the one upon whom a monument was placed, was initiated into the secret mathematics discipline, which flourished during the last days of the Roman Republic. This doctrine was pernicious to religion (as we see from Suetonius), so by counsel of the Senate they were expelled from the city, and here we may find the origin of Oriental, Chaldaic, Syriac and Egyptian philosophy.

Also, that a deeper connection (or communication) between these two orders--that of the dagger (Assassins), and that of the sword (Templars)--is proved by the fact that the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia, in expeditions against Egypt (which was the center of the Ismaili doctrin) openly showed favor to the enemy, so that twelve of them, due to the citadel of Karak having been handed over, perished suspended in a trap. Therefore, to those Freemasonic traditions about the arcane doctrine established by Walter Montibarensis, and communicated to him in a cavern through certain oriental sages, some faith must be invited. For by these sages we think some Syrian Gnostics, or Ismailis, are to be understood, through whom the arcane foundations of this doctrine flowed down to regular Canons and, from these, to the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia. More about the Cairo Temple of Wisdom, in imitation of which the Domus Salomonica [Solomonic House] of Bacon seems to have been built[xxiii], you will find in our History of the Assassins, to which, now published, we refer the reader[xxiv]. Here it is sufficient for us to tread in the most ancient footprints, to the extent historical forces admit. Now going back to the genuine doctrine of the Gnostics and the Ophitic [doctrine] of the Templars, we will demonstrate an intimate connection between this and the most ancient doctrines of Persian cosmology and Syriac mythology, so that by [the phrase] “that ancient oriental philosophy” (always in heavy use by recent historiographers), it easily becomes clear that this is to be understood as nothing but Gnosis. The entire doctrine of Gnosis, as we see, revolves around two main points, that is to say, cosmogony and generating, so that it seems not at all granted to mortals to know how this world was generated, and to investigate how through generating it is continually preserved. Cognition of this mystery, and of the origin of evil, was the main focus of philosophy among all peoples, which they tried to attain in various ways. [But] after numerous and vexing labors attempting to discover true knowledge, they found only that they knew nothing. Frustrated in their hope, they nevertheless busied themselves to dig up the true beginning of all, and to explain the primal cause of all phenomena. Thiscame down to the point where, persuading themselves that [there is] nothing more than the duplex genre of nature, masculine and female, which then resulted in the worship of the sun, moon, stars and elements, to which every mythology can be reduced. However, since they abandoned what can be subjected to the senses, wishing to penetrate more deeply into the mysteries of the spiritual world and of the origin of evil, they were driven into an abyss of the most ridiculous fables.

The most ancient of these fables are the Syrian or Egyptian ones, which, having been preserved out of Sanchuniathon[xxv] and Manetho[xxvi], agree with what those writers of Greek affairs handed down to us concerning the religion of those people. In the end, the source of these things is to be sought in India, even if we do not doubt that in the present light we will not advance beyond Persia and the beliefs of the Zoroastrians, which are sufficient for demonstrating the original identity of this doctrine. First, we will investigate briefly the Gnostic cosmogony, and their doctrine about the origin of evil in the most ancient mythologies. We will then compare the mysteries of the same with the rites and ceremonies of the most celebrated mysteries. Finally, we will reveal what amounts to nearly the same arcane doctrine, which slopes towards mere pantheism, and today, in large measure, flourishes in the Orient, so that, to make humanity aware, the dictum of wisdom may be proclaimed: There exists nothing new under the sun.

Hence, we are to begin with cosmogony. The “first aeon” of the Gnostics was borrowed from Plato’s “aeon,” and is from one and the same oriental fount, since the word aion is Persian [awan], and signifies nothing other than the birth of time , which definition you find in the writings of Plato himself.

In time, two principles of all things, the mental and the material, came forth, which established the perfect dualism [written] of in the Persian books, in which the beginning of spirituality (the summum bonum [supreme good] of Plato and the Gnostics) is called Ormuzd; whereas the beginning of sensible [physical] things is called Ahriman. Although spirit and matter both [presumably would] have worked together for forming this world, after it was formed, being in continual opposition, they were perpetually conflicted. This dualism, which the Gnostics expressed as a long lower series of aeons under the name of Sophia and Jaldabaoth, pervades the whole world right from the beginning to the end.

According to Plato, out of the supreme good, or Eternal God, proceeds the mens creatrix [creative mind], or Demiurge, and from this proceeds the anima mundi [world soul], which constitute the first Platonic trinity. Another, lower [trinity], one and the same, we find constituted out of idea (or Father), out of matter (or Mother), and out of product (or son, that is, the world).

The Gnostics tried to imitate this double Platonic trinity by the multiplication of aeons, so that in their upper Pleroma you can discern the First Father, the First Son, and the Holy Spirit, or Sophia proceeding from the last [aeon].

However, in a space located outside of the Pleroma [you can discern] Mother Achamoth, her son Jaldabaoth, and this visible world (the work of him and his six sons). [Regarding] the primitive trinity derived by the Gnostics, [we hold that], even if one cannot find it in the Persian cosmogony as exhibited by the documents left behind to us in the Zend, nevertheless, we think that it did exist, because it occurs both among the people of India and among the Egyptians, as well as among the most distant peoples. Indeed, [it is found] in that celebrated hieroglyphic placed above all the doors of the Templars, because the globe represents the sun (which Plato and Hermes Trismegistus declare to be a most apt image of the supreme good). However, under the serpent, Kneph, or good, at length a Demiurge was created, and it is more than reasonable that [his] feathers and wings are to be understood [as representing] the spirit or animating principle of the world. But Eusebius, under a similar figure, teaching out of Sanchuniathon that the world itself was to be understood, was too obscure to be grasped clearly. If a person is unwilling to concede this upper trinity, which corresponds to the trinity of Plato, [then by the same reason that person] will he deny their second trinity, made up of the Father Osiris, of the Mother, Isis, and of the Son Horus, which we see not obscurely expressed in the very same words in the doctrine of the Plato, Timaeus regarding the World Soul, and also in Plutarch's tractate on Isis. Timeaus, assuredly, called matter Mother and Seal [illegible Greek word]. We have seen already above that this image of the seal was preserved in an adulterated form in Gnostic ceremonies, where the discourse was about baptism. Since they named the one doing the baptizing “Father,” and “Seal Affixer”, [they named] the one baptized “Son.” That the six Gnostic Archons, with the seventh, Jaldabaoth, match up clearly with the six Amschaspandis and Ormuzd of the Persians, and by the sons of the Demiurge in Plato, as [well as the Hebrew] Elohim, we have already considered above, and here we make note also of the eight principal gods of the Egyptians, the number of which occurs everywhere in the Gnostic formula inscribed on idols and bowls (I and seven, our race). Finally, this is also the number of Cabirs, the seven of which, together with Asclepius, the eighth (as stated by Eusebius, referencing out of Sanchuniathon, according to Philo), the Phoenicians restored into their commentaries. One may conjecture that the Cabiri of the Phoenicians, just like the Amschaspandos of the Persians, the sons of God talked about by Plato, and the Archons of the Gnostics, were helpers of the Demiurge in creating the world, and [we can infer this] from their symbol (namely, the hammer), which all these Demiurges of God bear.

Besides creating the world, we additionally discern that the six Archons of the Gnostics helped the Father, Jaldabaoth, in forming mankind. We also see, among the Ophites, another son of God (indeed, Noun, that is, Mind), in the form of a twisted serpent, which seems to have been borrowed from Ophion, Pherecydes, and ancient beliefs of Syriac mythology. As Ophion, a giant endowed with serpentine feet, leader of the Sons of Earth, tried to vanquish the gods, thus too the Ophites taught that the Mind, or serpent-form son of Jaldabaoth having been hurled down into the world, also generated six sons (himself the seventh), in imitation of the archontic hierarchy. These sons, being inimical to mankind, resisted it, on account of the punishment endured by the Father because of man.

But regarding the origin of Ophion himself, the most ancient mention of whom we have found in the writings of Origen, and in the writings of Eusebius referencing Philo, it seems that it is all the more to be sought by us in Egypt. [This we think especially] since also Philo, according to Sanchuniathon, connects the Egyptian Agathodemon, or Kneph (according to the tradition of Ereis, in agreement with the tradition of Pherecydes), to Ophion. What Philo says at length in the passage already cited above agrees very well with the beliefs of the most ancient Orphic cosmogony, as seen from the information that has been preserved in the writings of Athenagoras[xxvii], where an animal in the form of a serpent arises out of water and matter, with the head of a lion, and holding God's seed, out of which were formed Heaven and Earth. These are the most ancient vestiges found in Greek writings of the serpent in Syriac cosmogony and mythology, which we can pursue beyond Egypt and all the way to India.

Having made plain the genesis of the Gnostic Demiurge and his sons in the most ancient mythologies, we will now, in the same way, follow Sophia, or Mete.

On this subject we have already shown above that many attributes of Rhea, Cybele, Venus and Hercules were gathered into the figure of Mete. In fact, we also found in Sanchuniathon that all adornments attributed to [these] various gods and goddesses were nearly the same. Thus, the name (Achamut) was borrowed from Rhea (called Mot or Mut), the triple crown from Cybele, the masculo-feminine gender and the name [Arabic word] from Venus, the horns from Astarte or Proserpina, the veil from Isis and Minerva, the triple-faced dog, to which the Gnostic Hodegetes was consecrated, from Hecate, and finally, the multiple eyes and ears, which we frequently see sculpted on the whole body, from the Phoenician Saturn.

Indeed, the sun, moon and stars which are sculpted everywhere on the breast, back and arms of our idols, [are] the main elements of the Gnostic diagram, and are in agreement with the Platonic diagram, the description of which the composers of that most illustrious Ophite diagram seems to have had placed before their eyes. In the final end, the Achamoth of the Gnostics, from whose sight and tears came forth the elements, certainly is none other than nature herself (from the insertion of Mind into matter), whom the entire Orient celebrated, though under various names (that is, under the name of Isis, Ceres, Astarte, Goddess of the Orient, Good Goddess, etc.). As to the ceremonies of the Ophitic orgies, or the mysteries of the Templars, we have hinted above that all of these, too, are derived from the most ancient mysteries, and this will confirm here with only a few citations.

The Ophites celebrated the elevation of the phallus, with sculptured bowls situated underneath a serpent depicted in the form of a phallus that was suspended from the Tree of Life. This was held as the greatest festival of the Dionysiacs. The mystic bowl or vase (called cernos by the Eleusians) [is something] we come across everywhere.

They revered the serpent with a most holy form of worship: lustrations used not only in the Bacchanalia, but also everywhere in the mysteries of the Good Goddess (see S, Croix II p. 182). These lustrations came under the name of "baptism," or Baphes, since those initiated were called Baptai.

A rod and belt, too, were sacred to the worship of Bacchus (see in the same book, II p. 96 and I. p. 347). The phallus and serpent were preserved in mystic boxes (see I. p. 318 and II. 88), as the Ophites preserved the serpent in a ladle, and the Templars [preserved] Baphomet in their coffers. Profane persons (bebeloi) were kept away, as also in the chapters of the Templars a knight would sleep overnight [near the coffers] in order to prevent access by profane individuals. Finally, Gnostic suppers and marriages, which were Eucharist for the Ophites, were established according to the pattern of those things which had been celebrated in the Dionysiac and Eleusinic [mysteries]. In the Dionysiac [mysteries], surely the creonomia (or "dividing of meats") was nothing other than the mystical supper or Eucharist (see S. Croix I, 85). Also, the rape of Proserpina by Pluto, which the Hierophant celebrated with a female priest as hieros gamos [Greek, "sacred marriage"], lights out (see S. Croix, I, 366), what is that, if not a prototype of that mystical wedding which the Valentinians and Ophites celebrated, lights out, by promiscuous sexual relations?

Furthermore, in the ceremonies of the mystic wedding (depicted on bas-reliefs and bowls), where a bull is seen going through the ritual fire, we see the ministers administrating many of the most-ancient mysteries. Behold! You have (tab II, fig. 2) on the right-hand side of the ritual fire, standing nearby, the Epibomum[xxviii], who, standing around the ritual fire, or mystic altar, is about to place another piece of wood upon it, [while] another, bearing a rod, follows. On the left, you see the Daduchum[xxix], who, along with a torch, also bears a hatchet. Another figure holds a book and a ladle for the lustration of initiates. The Hieraulen[xxx], playing the pipe, is also the Spondophorum[xxxi], and carries a pail of water for libations. Finally, on the left-hand side, next to the ritual fire, is the Stolisten[xxxii], who bears a stole[xxxiii], as if he himself is the Hierophant [the priest]. In one hand he carries a chalice, [or rather] a bottle (called a caraffe[xxxiv]), and in the other, ring-shaped bread. The lighting of the ritual fire (according to Tertullian) signifies the mystic pyre of universal conflagration, which the Gnostics adopted from the Stoics, and through which they taught that at the end of the world, everything will be dissolved.

This dogma concerning universal conflagration is consonant with the most ancient belief of the Stoics, who got it from Chaldea. Also, the first Gnostic cosmogony concerning the immersion of spirit into matter through a certain ignoble passion, and concerning the formation of the world, [is something that] one may find in the doctrine of the Phoenicians as reported in the writings of Eusebius, based on the work of Sanchuniathon. Indeed, just as Sophia, out of a burning [desire] to get knowledge of the Father, fell into matter, thus, too, (in Eusebius) the spirit of this very prince of the image of the Supreme Being proceeding out of the abyss called Bau. This supplied Plato with a most beautiful idea regarding the Supreme Being under the image of the sun. Those holding fast and treading in the footsteps of the Eleaticorum[xxxv] draw all to that superior, immaterial light by which the mind of man, enlightened by the divine, attains to superior levels. The Ophites, though, my no means tending toward moral perfection, thought that the highest peak of all science [knowledge] is to be placed in carnal knowledge. Under the term "enlightenment" they saw nothing other than coitus and promiscuous shameful desire.

This most vile interpretation, by which the Ophites befouled the ancient doctrine, or philosophy, of Oriental wisdom, was to be considered certainly not as true and genuine, but as a heresy from a purer doctrine. Befouled in this way in its own fatherland by Greeks, Syrians, Semi-Barbarians, and Semi-Christians, and soiled by an inundation of the most disgraceful sensuality in the Orient, this very ancient discipline, when cleansed from all these evils, went on to flourish, and even survives today in the mystical doctrine of the Sufis. Even if they number the absolute all like the pantheists, which no one can defend[xxxvi], how very greatly, nonetheless, does its luminous purity shrink away in horror from the perverted imaginings of the Ophites, whose dark orgies were indeed celebrated at night, as Tertullian has already said, and whose epiphania, [Greek, manifestation, root of "epiphany"] and photagagia [Greek, "enlightened guidance"] is nothing but an outpouring of desire, by which they believed they could attain to that divine moistening with light of Sophia (about which we have spoken above, referring to the [statements of the Church] Fathers).

After we have shown that the Ophites (and their followers, the Brothers of the Temple Militia) imitated the most ancient mysteries in their orgies, and that all of their natural and supernatural philosophy was the product of certain rude babblings from the most ancient Greek philosophers, having transacted their moral (or rather immoral) cosmogony and aeonology, this is the place for investigating their doctrinal side. From the unrestrained license by which they indulged every desire, certainly it is proper to pronounce their being pigs of the flock of Epicurus[xxxvii], whose physical dogmas (such as the conflagration of the universe [idea] borrowed from Heraclitus), and the moral apothegm hos edista [Greek, "as gladly"] they dragged over to their own interpretation. But various dogmas and imaginings of the ancients seem to suggest that arcane doctrines and paiderastias, [Greek, "pederasty"], common among them, are to be excused. There were two opinions especially that they twisted in defense of their shameful indecencies; the Socratic one, "know yourself," and the prior, Epicurean one, "respect God." That first one ["know yourself"] was to their shame, since by "knowledge" they understood nothing but the carnal. The other one ["respect God"] they interpreted so as to teach that by means of the moistening with seminal luminescence they themselves became gods.[xxxviii] Above we have seen what, formerly, Plotinus objected to regarding the Gnostics always bearing in their mouths the words "respect God." It must also be added here that the Templars, as Gnostics, held themselves to be gods. Of this fact we can bring forth no clearer testimony than the place from Titurel[xxxix] where the perfected Templar himself is called "God," [or specifically], Tempelgott [German, "Temple God"]. It remains for us to comment on yet another expansion, or rather subversion, of the Delphic dictum. They substituted in place of that golden sentence, “Know yourself,” the crafty, “know all, but let no one know you.” On this truly Machiavellian principal rests their whole politic, which up to now they try to sustain by the gospel precept, “Be wise as serpents.” To this depraved wisdom they connect unrestrained conduct, so that they seem to have proposed as the highest expression of wisdom the precepts “Pursue all,” and “All is permitted.” That this goal of the moral (or, better, immoral) Gnostic-Ophitic doctrine is precisely the same as what has been placed before true initiates at the ultimate doctrinal grade of the Assassins and of the Ismailis, we see in the words “Nothing is to be believed, and everything is permissible.”[xl] To what exceedingly shameful deeds this goal of the Gnostic-Ophite doctrine drives its followers, once all types of evil desires have been exhausted, and that one must commingle with the contaminated flock of those who have purchased infamy, is clear enough. Certainly nothing either great or good was ever to be expected from the followers of this doctrine, unless men endowed with a higher political genius, having subjected the doctrine to their ambition, used it as an instrument for attaining the highest goal of [their] ambition. Such persons, already destined by nature as leaders, sought the highest goal of their labors, not in satisfying desires, but in conducting state affairs. Finally, people eagerly followed this doctrine because, once a person wickedly indulges every sensual craving, it renders his associates more inclined to all types of illicit activities.

The history of the entire East and West, however, provides us only two (but these very grand) examples of this truth: in the order of the Assassins, and in that of the Templars, each of which, fortified by the arcane doctrine, sought to conquer the world in nearly the same way. In only this were they different: The Assassins dealt widely with their enemies also with the dagger. However, the Templars used only the sword against the enemy. Each order, though distinct, wore a white mantle with red insignias (a cross among the Templars, and a sash among the Assassins). They had numerous institutions that were in agreement in an amazing way, especially in that they very zealously practiced revealed religion (which their own arcane doctrine wholly repressed), and very urgently defended it. They believed that at the right time, the occasion would come in which Gnosis sitting on the throne, the lion slain, and the dragon (or the world) trampled under the heel, [they] would gain control over every spiritual and temporal power. The Templars, therefore, thought the only virtues to be political ones. (These were fortitude and prudence, and, being linked together with love (that is, paiderastias, [Greek, pederasty]), made all other things worthless. They though the only virtues to be what would open the way to government, and they supported [these]. Their symbols, the sword and the dog, exist everywhere on their sepulchers. But the secret things of Mete (that is, of the Gnostic Sophia, the serpent and the Tau symbol) are discovered only in the inmost depths, if openly exposed, or by certain hieroglyphic notations hidden away from the eyes of profane ones, or used in such a way that the profane will believe that such a thing is a mere Freemasonic ornament. Thus it is in the Berchtolsdorf Church, in the right-hand part of the choir area, and in the church of the Templars called Acci Catena in Sicily, where the Tau is often sculpted into the pavement.

This idea of Mete--that is, of wisdom (aseveias [Greek, impiety) and love (paiderastias [Greek, pederasty]), are in various ways symbolically represented, both in bas-reliefs and on idols, as well as on pictures and coins (as we soon will see): now as a masculo-feminine idol; now as a head-only Baphometic; now as a serpentine Sphinx; now as something repulsively ending up as a fish; these things forming a monstrosity. Wherever you discover such figures in Middle Age buildings, you can hold for certain that their designers had been initiated into the Gnostic doctrine of that time, and in all churches possessed at that time by the Templars you will find (unless a destructive age had consumed them) such symbols. Therefore, the dragon absorbing an infant is seen everywhere, in bowls with a bas-relief (tab II, fig. 4), in bas-reliefs of the Church of Schoengraber (tab. III, fig. 2), and in the Church of St. Aegidius (tab. IV, fig. 20), or the dragon in conflict with a knight[xli], or a lion bound, trampled and killed by a man (tab. III, fig. 3), or a person fondling and behaving indecently toward the Baphometic head (tab. IV, fig. 22), or serpents carried by a man in his hands, be advised that these symbols indicate the Gnostic doctrine of the Freemasons. This Gnostic doctrine, common to the most ancient Freemasons and Templars, seems, with the passing of time after abolition of the order of Templars, to have been preserved only in the inmost parts of some etairion [Greek, “comrades”] of the Scottish Freemasons.

Here, opening a new scene, up to now unknown to all numismatists, we have focused on one hundred coins struck in bronze (see tab. V). Out of these eighty-two are unpublished. The remaining eighteen were known but had not been understood. Nearly all are gilded with silver (with a very few that are solid), which, as gilded things, served not for money, but as tokens for brothers to recognize one another.

We have already mentioned above that gilded coins of altogether the same type were unearthed in the ruins of a Templar castle near the village of Neukirchen in the District of Cellegensis in Styria, as well as in an enclosed area of the church of Waltersdorf in Austria, and in Hungary amid the ruins of a certain monastery which tradition attributes to “the Red Brothers.” From these, in order to diminish the confusion of styles, only the principal ones which represent the different figures are here seen incised in bronze.

Silver Gilded Coins from the Gadollian Collection

As with many others, the first thirty-six [coins] found in the castle of Rabensperg had been cast by a Deacon of the place for the purpose of banquet furnishings, so His Excellency, the illustrious Knight Gadolla, in order to remove them from the common [fate of] ruin, under that Deacon, of all the [other] Templar monuments [there]. For the Deacon had whitewashed all of the pictures, and he converted the meeting place at the head tower (containing twelve stone chairs fixed to the wall, with a thirteenth for the teacher or leader) into a milk cellar. He immediately produced knives and forks and out of the coins discovered. But luckily, out of wisdom, the knight mentioned above (a man most lauded for all kinds of philosophical studies, who speaks much of their treasures) came upon this confused heap and out of that numismatic disaster preserved fifty gilded coins, all unknown, all marked with figures up to now inexplicable except for the aforesaid, which can be easily illustrated. All, finally, are Templar [coins], bearing their well-known symbols. Out of these fourteen are so damaged by use or by antiquity that their figures are either doubtful or wholly inextricable. But the remaining thirty-six, very well preserved, we subject to faithful eyes in the first three series of our tablet (see tab V).

The first series contains coins which have been marked by the published signs and symbols of the Templars: with a cross and a sword, with dragons of various types, and with an eagle (or, rather, as we will demonstrate a bit further down, a Phoenix).

The first six of these are marked by dragons, of which some have the head of a bird; others, of a dog; others, of a cat. Therefore, I think they are to be held not as [depicting] a hostile dragon (who, for the Ophites, was the overseer of the world, and who was opposed by the Templars (under the figure of St. George), but, rather, a friendly dragon, or a serpent, (a familiar household god of the Ophites), since even in the seals of the Gnostics -- called Abraxas--the serpent is depicted now with a lion's head, now with a dog's head (see tab. IV, fig.1,2,3, 4).

The next three coins represent three eagles (or perhaps phoenixes) which are perched on a bow (probably representing Iris, goddess of the rainbow), just as in numerous well-known gilded coins from [Bishop Frederic Munter of Seeland] we see an eagle perched on a bow. More about this bird, whether an eagle or a phoenix, [should be said regarding] another of the following gilded coins, where volo Eoi[xlii] (ich fliege ins Morgenroth) [German, “I fly into the dawn”] is written. The last two coins of this series bear the cross as an image, but are distinct in certain other attributes. On the tenth coin you see a sword erect between two heads of dragons. On the eleventh you see the cross rising out of a head, and in the twelfth [the cross] is situated between two Ms. As for the first one, it is known to us that the Ophites and Templars understood the cross [to be a symbol of] the Tree of Life, or that Baphometic character which, in a Gnostic sense, ought to trample underfoot the dragon: that is, the overseer of this world. On Coin Eleven, the cross (a sign of life) arising out of a dog’s head alludes to the well-known predilection for the dog. Finally, the cross placed between two letters M indicates the doubled initial letter of Mete.

The second series contains twelve coins all inscribed with chalices. The first six (tab. V, fig. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18) are simple goblets without a lid. The chalice on fig. 19 is kept safe by two erect serpents, just as you will see very frequently sculptured on mystic Dionysiac vases. Such snakes are also seen on vases commonly called “Etruscan,” which, most reasonably, represent kteida [Greek, meaning unknown], and they [are shown accompanying] initiates into the sepulcher. There are chalices on fig. 20 and 21, the first of which is provided with handles. One of the things I noticed is that between the lid and the bowl itself there is a space where two letters, R and L, can be read. These are, therefore, those mystic bowls, three of which, adorned by sculptures (which have already been explained by us above), and which here on the coins have been covered by lids. These are the same chalices which, marked with lilies, crosses and that same figure of a Pythagorean pentagon that occurs on the lid of our bowl (see tab. II, fig. 5), are seen on the Maltese sepulchers of the knights of the army of St. Louis, returned from a tortuous expedition. [These coins] have been brought to us from the Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Bishop of Seeland, Doctor Münter, and we exhibit them to the eyes [of persons interested].

It will not be out of place here to examine what the letters R L signify, and to make a conjecture as to their hidden meaning. We think they are nothing other than the most frequently used parts of the word Gral, which coincides very well with our arguments set forth above concerning the identity of the Grali with the temple bowl. On the base of the two-headed sculpted Baphometic vase, a G is engraved in the same place, the sense of which, through the added Arabic word [Arabic writing, fenn], does not remain ambiguous; that is, Gnosis. With this initial G, now implied as a notation, only the third letter of the word Graal is missing: namely, the letter A. But by turning the figure of the chalice upside-down, [this letter] is expressed by a transverse line, so that, along with these two conspicuous letters RL, there should remain to us almost no doubt that the word Gral ought to be understood. In the same way, too, [on one of] the Baphomet idol[s] (see table I, fig. II) we see expressed only two letters, M and E, of the word “Mete,” with the remaining two indicated by asterisks, so that the entire word would easily be restored to the initiated reader, though it would escape the profane ones, which was in every way necessary for protecting the mystery of iniquity.

Since the things said [above] are easily verified by a look at the monuments offered to view, let us now attempt to divulge the true sense of the mystical word Gral. If G, placed on a bowl (see tab. II, fig. 9), indicates Gnosis, one can also suppose that the three remaining letters are only initials of certain mystical words which, put together, exhibit this word Gral as a token of Gnostic confession. While [we are] in no way stating anything certain about the significance of the three remaining [letters], since so many false interpretations up to now have been published, we will suggest some that are more probable, [being in agreement] with the mystic sense of the Gnostic doctrine. Thus, G R A L could signify: Gnosis Regit Animas Liberas [Gnosis Rules Free Souls]; or Gnosis Regina Artium Liberalium [Gnosis Queen of Liberal Arts]; or Gnosis Retribuit Animi Laborum [Gnosis Rewards the Labor of the Soul]; or, finally, what perhaps is most similar and most in agreement with Gnostic doctrine, Gnosis Reducit Animam Lapsam [Gnosis Brings Back the Lapsed Soul], or Redintegrat Animum Lapsum [Restores the Lapsed Soul].

The three last coins (22, 23, 24) of this series exhibit three chalices [on each coin], into which, in two of them, were interposed three lilies; and in the last one of them, three heads. Nowhere, indeed, did we find that the lily had its own significance among the Gnostics and Templars, but the lily occurs everywhere in Templar monuments and sculptures, especially on the end of the scepter, and therefore it perhaps has no other meaning than that of the scepter of dominance.

Thus you see very frequently the lily-bearing scepter in the bas-reliefs of the church of Schoengraber, and in the enumerated gilded coins of the Templars. The same thing is seen also on the Maltese sepulchers already cited. Hence, whatever meaning it may suggest, it is certainly clear that it was some temple-related symbol. The three heads placed between three lilies are to be compared with the three Gnostic heads suspended on the tree, a reproduction of which you have in [one of the] Abraxas [coins] (tab. IV, fig. 5), and from which Jaldabaoth extracts a trident from a certain two-handled jar in the Schoengraber church. At this point, we rightly transfer to the twelve coins of the next series.

The first two of the third series (25, 26) feature a bowl in connection with a head, which certainly is nothing but [the head] of Baphomet, which we see depicted in all that follows, most ugly and terrible. This [image] truly agrees with the deposition of the Templar Raoul de Gysi, who in seven chapters [Templar properties] had seen him [Baphomet] to be terrible and similar to demons. Coin 27 and Coin 28 each exhibit the letters F and R, of the same type, which we believe to have been put in place of the chalice, to represent its name (Graal), since F (not F) can be considered as the Digamma, that is, the double G. Coins 29 and 30 bear [Mete] in the form of a sphinx, which especially agrees not only with the deposition (which says this idol had four feet), but also indicates a transferred meaning of Mete: namely, they themselves [view] this idol now as Sophia, or wisdom; now Mete, or prudence. It is no wonder that this idol, or head, was taken in so many diverse ways, for it seems that as many as were the heads of the initiates, just so many seem to have been the diverse opinions about the figure of Baphomet.

Coin 31 exhibits a no less terrible figure of Baphomet which, extending his arms, seems to seek being embraced. Coin 32, if found elsewhere, could be believed to be an image of a clown, but it being found together with these gilded tokens, all of which are Temple-related, [means that it] represents nothing other than the Baphometic head covered by his hood; or, if you will, one of the Templars who used to adore that [idol] with unremoved hoods. In Coin 33, in place of the hood, the head is covered with a crown (indeed, with a remarkable Persian tiara). On the next, the 34th, this same effect is created in the form of a Roman Emperor’s crown. The letters F and R written on it demonstrate this cap to be of the same type as what is shown up above of Baphomet, to which, in place of the chalice, the initial letter of the same name G was added. In Coin 35 a star is coupled with Mete’s head, which, both in idols and in bowls, everywhere seem to be connected to her. The head is inscribed onto the star, which most accurately corresponds to the bronze star (see tab. II, fig. 16).

2. From the Moczyano Treasury

Alex Moczy, most excellent Hungarian man, especially intent on collecting signs and coins, armed with letters from the office of the Pope for expediting matters, told us that there were found (indeed in the ruins of the monastery Vörös Barátok, or of the Red Brothers) numerous gilded and solid coins. Of these, we felt that only 24 should be chosen and examined, due to the similarity [of the others] with those already described, and because of the locations where they were found, which in Series 4 and 5, from Nos. 37 to 58, you have incised on bronze.

You will easily distinguish the solid ones from the gilded ones, since the former were imprinted on both sides; the latter on only one. On No. 37 (a solid one), in the same place where the letter G (the initial letter of Gnosis) would otherwise be, a bust or monument is depicted (here not sufficiently conspicuous as to what it is, but that is be clarified below). On the other side there is a representation of an animal, perhaps a dragon, at which a certain man or beast wearing a hood is looking. Since we have already found this hood on the sphinxes of Nos. 29 and 30, one cannot assert that a hood always signifies a monk, except to those who hold, as the author of Monachologia [Monkology][xliii], that monks and beasts are synonymous.

Coin No. 38 (solid) exhibits, on the front, the tower of a temple erect between two lilies, and on the reverse side the Digamma, or double G, inscribed on a crown. In No. 39, [we see] on one part the Baphometic head; on the other side, once again, the sepulchral monument or bust, which was to be seen on No. 37, and which will occur yet more quite often. On the following eight gilded coins can be noted: Baphometic heads (No. 41 and 42); a dragon (40, 46) a star and moon (41, 43); eagles (40, 44); that monster which we mentioned already regarding No. 31, and which here appears to have a key in his hands (45); an armed Templar (47); and a dragon, or lion, who holds a sword

Coin 49 (solid), comparable with 37 and 38, with which it is supposed to go, has the G in common [with them]. No. 50 should be compared to 45 and 31. Certainly this figure cannot be called a king (due to the wings), nor an angel (due to the key shaped as a serpent and due to the crown). Therefore, is to be taken as some monster not yet explained; namely, for Baphomet. What the is signified by the animals depicted on the other side of this coin, and in many which follow, is not obvious, since beyond dragons, lions and eagles (explained by Gnostic imaginings), nothing is clear to us from that source regarding deer, panthers and the unicorn displayed here. On Nos. 51 and 52 a chalice is being carried by these beasts. This chalice [has been] interpreted as merely a coat of arms. It is also customary among numismatics to interpret the hood of a Sphinx as representing a monk. On the reverse side of Coin 52, for the third time that bust occurs which we have seen on Nos. 37 and 39. No. 53 shows a dog with the epigraph TOTAE, and on the other side there are six lilies composed in the same fashion as the six serpents in the Abraxas [seals] (see in Macarius). On No. 56, and also 57, a head bears a towered crown just like Mete (see tab. II, fig. 1 and 5). A lily-bearing scepter in one hand, and a cross in the other hand sufficiently denote the Templar order dominating through the cross.

3. Coins Found in the Ruins of the Templar’s Monastery at Waltersdorf

Of the gilded coins found in that place a half-century ago (which the Magnificent Count Ferdinand from Colloredo shared with us most generously), we were interested in only six, incised here in bronze, since most of those remaining are either obliterated, or are the same as the others previously mentioned (found in the ruins of the Templars’ castle in Styria and in the monastery in Hungary), and through the amazing agreement [of their symbolism] our interpretation was confirmed. These six coins bring forth the most remarkable evidence regarding the Templars. Besides the Baphometic head worn with a hood seen on No. 59, you will see in the same place on No. 62 the Ophitic Mete wearing a towered crown and holding two snakes[xliv], just those figures in the bas-reliefs of the church of Pictavien, as well as the many idols in the Imperial-Royal treasury and the collection of Schoenfeld. In No. 63, these two serpents accompany a chalice, and in No. 64 a serpent hangs from a chalice. The letter B speaks of Baphomet, and the other hieroglyphic note, T, it is reasonable to assume, signifies nothing other than the mystical Tau character: namely, Baphomet.

The name of this Mete, whose head we have seen depicted already in various figures, occurs also on Coin 36, where H and T are written on the side. Above the lily is seen an upside-down M, so that the twice-repeated Letter H is to be read “MHTH.” One may see that this is the same name which occurs in one of their silver-gilded [coins], and which has already been often brought up.

4. From the Coin Treasury of Bretfeldiano

On coins 65 and 66, you see on one side two keys placed criss-crossed, which make up the letters M and T. Two letters H in the beard area, occupied by keys, were implied, so that, [all put together], the name “MHTH” might spring forth. This key was used more aptly as a graphic sign, since the Baphometic character of the phallus was also called “the key of knowledge.” In No. 67 only one key, in the form of a Crux Ansata[xlv], forms the two letters T and H, so that the two final letters of the word Mete are to be read here, as on the idol in tab. 1, fig. 2. The remaining two [letters], however, are to be supplied [by discernment].

On coin 68, the name Mete, in Latin letters, is narrowed into a sign, so that the third line of the letter M affects at the same time the letter E (to be read twice). The cross, though, effects the letter T. In the same way, the character on coin 74 is to be explained, where Mete can be read if you view the coin not upright but horizontal, from the part where this [combined character] is connected with the image of a crown. M, indeed, occupies the entire width of the coin, and its two extreme lines were simultaneously also formed into the letter E. Similarly, coin 75 also implies that it is to be explained as a Baphometic triple crown, common to both this coin and the previously-mentioned coin. Coin 72 brings forth a similar image on both sides: namely, a cross and circles, upon which B (that is, the initial letter of Baphomet) is inscribed. The characters on coins 70 and 71 I would not dare to explain in any conclusive way. These letters C and A with a connected cross seems to be nothing but the first syllable of the word Charitas [“love, charity”] which we have already seen joined with Mete in another Templar inscription. Coin 73 [is] the Templar coat of arms. In nos. 75 and 76, the secret symbols--namely, a serpent and a dog--present themselves.

4. From the Coin Treasury of Gotvicensis

In the celebrated Gotvicensis convent, which has the most ancient reputation in the literary republic (because of the doctrine of present-day convent monks, and especially of the most learned Abbot, the Most Reverend Arrigler, at one-time professor of hermeneutics, and of Frederic Camerarius), as a tree flourishes with new vigor, a treasury of gilded coins is preserved, for which there is no match in Europe. Most of the coins published by the Bishop of Seeländ were sold by the same Abbot of that time. Here were are looking at the originals, out of which most ample treasury the next six were most generously shared with us by the Most Reverend Abbot. We have published their unique hieroglyphic inscriptions, and we will demonstrate that, as said above, they were Templar-Gnostic tokens. You also have, on coins 77, 78, and 79, the monument or tomb, which we have observed already in Nos. 37, 39, 52, shown here with flourishing palms. On one of these two monuments is inscribed a cross; on the other a double Gamma. It is not to be doubted that the tree arising from the tomb, which is distinguished by the epigraph Gnosis, is none other than the tree of life, or of knowledge. Regarding the tomb itself, I dare not affirm anything certain, but we consider it to be the same as the bust in which, among the Freemasons, the leader Hiram, having been killed, was buried, and for whom a palm branch blossomed, which in later time was changed into an Acacia branch. If we are not able to firmly assert that these and similar coins were used as tokens of the Templars, it is, nonetheless, more than certain that the Freemasons [used them], and in the final end, they are symbols of the same Gnostic doctrine. Concerning the last one and those similar to it, so that there remain to you no doubt, compare nos. 77 and 79 with the Gnostic seal (tab IV, fig. 6) taken from Macarius, where out of the bust, or human trunk, such a tree flourishes.

The next (No. 8) exhibits a temple building, of which the ichnography [architectural ground plan] one can see in a temple coin in the writings of Faure S. Vincenes. You see there, under the title jettons trouvé sous le Fondements d'une maison de Templiers pres Anquignan ["coins found under the foundations of a Templar house near Anquignan"], two coins, on one of which can be seen the ichnography of a building with four towers. This probably represented the temple building, constructed on the model of the sanctuary at Jerusalem. In No. 80 you have this entire Jerusalem temple with four erect towers. The very well-preserved inscription contains the following letters, which if read from left to right, make no sense: ASSS

SIMOONIVQ. But by reading from right to left, beginning from the first note of distinction placed between two letters S, the letters go in this order: SSTAQUINOOMIS. Assuredly, this too makes no sense, unless [you consider] the mystery of the letter M, here placed in an oblique way [rotated 90 degrees counterclockwise], which therefore could be read E, as in a Greek letter S. [This technique] has already been revealed from the Gnostic [tokens of] Abraxas, where the word Chnusis is to be read from Chnumis or Chnuwis, hieroglyphically indicating Gnosis. With these things understood, the sense of the text of this inscription is easily revealed: namely, SSTA. That is, Sacrosancta QVINOOEIS, or Quinoosis, or Gnosis, whose name aporreton, [Greek, unspoken], is in this way hidden away from the eyes of profane ones, intelligible only to the initiated.

Coin 81 represents an eagle or, perhaps, a phoenix, [next] to which is written, in clear letters, VOLO EOI, that is, I fly towards the dawn. But read in a peripheral way, epigraphically, it is truly enigmatic. It contains the following letters, to be read from left to right: ROH, then OP and H (by a note contracted), and then again clearly VIO. The letter which follows has the figure of an N lying down in the shape of a Z, and in this way it is to be read as another [letter] (in this case an A). The remaining [letters are] NBVIQAI, which, by inverting B and V, we think should be rendered, Roh Ophyio Anubiquall (que). Roh, an Arabic and Hebrew word, means “spirit,” which to the Gnostics was the same as Sophia, and was represented also by a dove. So therefore this bird, which at times we have called either an eagle or a phoenix, is perhaps the figure of a dove. Following the word “spirit” is the name of a serpentine genius, Ophiui or Ophione, which occurs ever so frequently in the inscriptions of Gnostic seals of Abraxas. Perhaps here, together with Roh, this name is to be understood as “serpentine spirit.” Frequently in the Gnostic sculptures we see a dog connected with a serpent, so that very often a serpent is shaped with a dog’s head. Therefore, even here Ophiuio (that is, the serpent genius) is connected to the name Anubis (the canine genius), which is very frequently is inscribed on the Abraxas [seals]. It is no wonder that these two tutelary gods are named on a gilded temple coin, but far more curious is the inscription of the following coin (82), where besides Mete (the name of the god of the Ophites, already well known), also Isis and Ertha[xlvi], occur, being two divinities of the ancient Egyptians and Germans. Following this, we read, most gloriously, ME-E, ICID, ERTHV, GLHAR, revealing five letters transposed from the name Grael (instead of Graal). What the V between Ertha and Grael signifies, I do not know, unless it is put for the Germanic copula und. From this inscription it is clear that the Templars, along with Gnostic and Ophitic symbols, also mixed together other myths from ancient religions, and in various ways founded and adorned this impious doctrine in the name of their own science and their own will.

5. From the Schoenfeld Museum

Coin no. 83 is, of all the gilded coins of this type that we have come to know, by far the most notable, because from the star and M (the initial letter of Mete) expressed in type and, further down, G (the initial letter of Gnosis), expressed in sculpture, bear the greatest witness that these coins served as tokens, so that, instead of idols which they had in their baskets, or coffers, they could carry this compendious Mete about with them everywhere. Coin 84 (guilded) exhibits a figure of Mete who has on her head a most distinct triple crown (just like the Mete on our bowls). In one hand she holds a cross; in the other a lily-bearing scepter. In this version the breasts are heavily accented, while they are mostly neglected on other similar coins (incised in bronze). In order to indicate the form of worship for which this coin was held as a religious symbol, the entire coin, encircled with a crown of most precious stones, was guarded under crystal, so that the radiating crown should make reference to the sort of sacrifice to be [practiced].

6. Coins Borrowed from Tablets of the Dissertation by Maderus

The work of Maderus contains no less than 40 gilded coins of the Templars. Among these we find a distinct figure of Mete, her head ugly and fierce, and she carries in her hand a cross and a flag, or a scepter, or a sword, or two trees (of life, and of knowledge), and a star.

We are here taking interest only in four, which exhibit a certain peculiar character or inscription (to be incised in bronze). Coin 85 holds in hand a monster composed of a certain animal, a composite of an infant and a dog, and crowned, with an erect privy member, which certainly is nothing other than a guide to pederasty with a dog. Here it is coupled with an infant, which Mete, in our idols, holds in her arms. Compare with this coins nos. 31, 45, 50 of this table. Coin 86 presents Mete holding in her hands two trees: namely, the tree of life and the tree of knowledge. We discovered already in that ancient monument found at the church in Milan that this effigy is Gnostic (see tab. III, fig.4). In order to remove all doubt, [please note that] even the name Mete is written in the margin by the initial letters M E, as on our idol (tab. I, fig. 11). The third letter, T, seems to be present, although somewhat rubbed away in one spot. The same name, Mete, can be read in Greek letters on coin 36. We see MHTH, with M in the form of a W that must be inverted. H, though, is to be read twice. The principal converted letter in these secret inscriptions was M, and we have seen, on the Abraxas seals and other gilded coins, that this is the entire key to this mystery regarding transposed or changed letters. Through such an inversion and transposition, the inscription on coin 87 [can be also explained]. [Doing so takes the interpretation in a] direction far different than what Maderus reads, which is Herrius Del Gratia Marchio Orientalis Missniace. For, in the first place, the letter which he believes to be D is [acutally] N, and M, which in the Abraxas seals is to be pronounced for S, has the same meaning here. Thus out of the letters GSOSHN, transposed, the word ';?E/G is to be read for ((TF4H. Finally, coin 88 exhibits the same letters, H and T, placed in the center with M, which we have encountered numerous times already in the Bretfeldian coins, and which is to be read in no other way than MHTH, repeating The H twice.

7. From the Writings of the Bishop of Seeländ on the Germanic Coins of the Middle Ages

Just like Maderus, the Bishop of Seeländ published gilded coins, all of which are Baphometic Templar tokens, for which there should be no mistrust concerning what they signify given the discourse above. Such are the 24 coins published in the table on page 17 of this book. All of these [the Bishop] declares to be from Ascano-Brandenburg, and he sees nothing in this sword-bearing and crowned woman, other than an imperial advocate, which is plainly absurd. More reasonably, others have said that this woman (who on other coins sits on a serpentine throne, with a knight with drawn sword standing guard), is the Abbotess with the patron of the convent. But all of the inscriptions, proceeding with the same interpretation already explained, instill faith that these coins are Templar, and represent Mete, or the personified wisdom of the order of Templars, with whom the knight with the drawn sword is present as a defender and custodian of the temple. Out of these, we will especially scrutinize the twelve most noteworthy, incised in bronze.

On coin 89, a cross with a hand giving blessing is configured so that the hand conceals the upper part of the cross, and thus only T ([signifying] the tree of life and the tree of knowledge; that is, a phallus and the key of knowledge) appears. The most brilliant one to read epigraphically, Mete you he, needs no explanation, since it contains nothing other than Baphometical characters, as can be seen with one's own eyes. The absurd explanation by the Bishop of Seeländ, who interpreted these words as an invocation of the savior, is slightly improved when we consider that this inscription is to be read as referring to Mete.

On Coin 90, you see the same Mete sitting on a throne, and, on the other side, two hooded Baphometic heads with a cross and hand giving blessing. Coin 91 exhibits Mete with a cross and a lily-bearing scepter, head covered, whom a Templar with an unsheathed sword stands ready to serve. Read from right to left, the inscription is this: CSAQUNOVMIS. Here only, first of all, C is to be placed after SM, and is to be read as the Greek E, so that one hears it as Sacra Qunousis, that is, Gnosis. The same inscription, but this time wholly obliterated, can be read in Coin 92, where on one side the entire Jerusalem temple can be seen. On the other side there are two towers with two crosses, a hand giving blessing and the head of Mete.

The same inscription occurs in sequential coins with the epigraph of Marquis Otto, which in no way militates against our interpretation, since he declared that he alone was initiated into the secret temple, or Gnostic doctrine.[xlvii] Thus we read on coin 94 RSCSTAQUINOUM (for E): that is, Sacra Sancta Quinousis, or Gnosis. We get the same result from coin 95: SST (the T here represented by the cross) AQUENEOM (for E) IC: that is, Gnosis.

Coin 93 offers the same inscription on both parts, yet slightly altered. On one side we see an overseer or Templar with a curved staff standing between two towers, with one hand giving a blessing, and a star [in the sky]. [There are written letters to] be read from right to left: STA (the letter T formed again by the cross) QVINOM (for E) IS: that is, Sancta Quinosis, or Gnosis. On the other side is the same word, omitting only the syllable Aqui, (which is to be read after cross): Sacred NOSM (E), IS, or Gnosis.

On coin 96, where an eagle or a phoenix sits on an arch between two towers, the same inscription: RS STA. [This should be read as] Sacro Sancta, or, perhaps better, Regina Sanctissima COVINOM (for E) and IS (contracted into the form of a crescent-shaped Sigma), [resulting in] Couinosis, or Gnosis. Coin 97 is of the same type and inscription as Coin 98, exhibiting the sacred word Qunousis, or Gnosis. Coin 98 exhibits the same figures as the previous one, but the inscription, so often repeated already, is disfigured in another way; namely, SSTAQEVNR (which here seems to include an erroneously formed for E) S (in the style of a crescent-shaped Sigma) and S, that is, Sacrosancta Qeneosis, or, once again, Gnosis, and then again T (which in every way is superfluous). But way more notable is the inscription of the inner circle, to be read from right to left: ECOL (in the form of a Greek 7) EEL, which certainly is nothing other than that celebrated Hakolel, or “divine truth,” the mention of which also has been preserved among the Freemasons (see Pokeach Iwrim, page 44 and 244). We shouldn’t wonder about this Hebrew word thrown in here, since, as we learn from the [Church] Fathers, the Ophites interspersed into their doctrine various Hebrew words, and on another gilded Gnostic coin even now we discover the Hebrew word Roh, that is, “spirit.”

The bird, representing the spirit (whether that is an eagle, a phoenix, or a dove) is seen in Coin 99, a lion placed underfoot as if being trodden. It has the same inscription as the previous ones, but way more disfigured: SSAQVEIL (L wrongly for N) EVON (N wrongly figured forE) IS, that is, Sacrosancta Queileuosis (that is, again, Gnosis). On coin 100, a Templar is situated between two towers, with the inscription Otto (the name of the Templar or Ophite prince). This coin, which occurs twice in the Bishop of Seeländ’s work, is merely Gnostic. You see here a Templar between a lily-bearing scepter and a frond, which, on other coins, Mere holds in her hands, situated between two towers. Precious stones and two truncated crosses, here called Otto by numismatics, occur very frequently, and can be understood (not absurdly) as phalluses and chalices, or kenos [Greek, unknown] symbols. Finally, thrown in is a signed epistle [letter], by which we think their secret doctrine and arcane principles is signified.

VII On the Concord Between Accusations Against the Templars and the Similar Ophitic Doctrine

From the foregoing explanation of the Ophitic doctrine, which all Templar monuments, idols, bowls, buildings and coins profess, their faults are as clear as can be. Therefore, whatever accusations were brought against them by the Church and [contemporary] rulers appears to be only just and fair. Now, one by one, we will demonstrate that the peculiar symbols of their doctrine match up with their crimes and are documentation of their impiety and impurity. It is established from their monuments that [the charges of] three capital crimes brought against them by the Articles of Accusation--apostasy, idolatry and pederasty--are foundational teachings of the Ophitic doctrine, of which the Templars were followers. Articles 5 to 14 of the inquiry bring against the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia the charge that they did not acknowledge that "Christ is truly God," or that he was crucified. Also, "among their crimes, they professed that he was a false prophet, whose cross they spat upon and trampled underfoot," and this defilement they carried out on the very solemn Holy Friday.

All of these things agree fully with what the [Church] Fathers refer to concerning the Ophites. Already long ago Origen and Epiphanius made the assertion that we [should not] consider these [groups] to be Christians, but rather haters of Christ, and Beausobre also agrees, as we have already seen. But even if the most learned writer of Ophitic history, Mosheim, affirms that some of their sects were Christian, the Brothers of the Temple Militia, according to the inscriptions of their idols, were not to be numbered among them. If you are inclined to deny this, it has been proved. If, at reception, they spat upon the cross, or trampled it underfoot, which is clear from their very frequent confessions, in this they followed only the most impious rite of the Ophites among whom it was a law to tread down the God of the Christians and Jews, whom they declared to be “accursed.” That they would perpetrate this on the very day sacred to Venus is less a wonder when you realize that, in the solemn church ceremonies, on that day, adoration of the cross was celebrated, which they opposed through testimony of their great hatred and contempt by the spitting on the cross, in service of their own Venus (that is, Achamoth), whom Tertullian declares to be Christ trodden down.

After matters of idol worship, seen delineated in our first and second tablets, have been explained, and things similar to those had been dug up from the chapter house of the Waltersdorf Templars three years earlier, there is no remaining doubt at all. Everything, too, about this idol to or for Baphomet (whose name Mete we have recognized as inscribed on the idols, themselves, and on bowls, buildings and coins) seems to be confessed by many of our idols, differing only in the fact that the idols of general [Templar] chapters are very big and very much ornamented, being gilded either with silver or gold, whereas in our case, the material is stone, and the idols of comparatively smaller size, the Templars having kept in their coffers. In the same way, too, Theodoret[xlviii] teaches that the Marcionites carried the bronze serpent with them in their coffers. We, though, see many idols, most of which are girded with our serpent, or bearing about the serpent in their hands. Each of these idols is made to a greater or lesser size, with more or less ornamentation, according to the will and wealth status [of the maker/possessor], and though diverse in their ornamental details, they all conform to the principal of the masculine/feminine character.

The varied confessions of the parties agree with this masculine/feminine character, since some declared this idol to be masculine and bearded; others have declared it to be feminine and clean-shaven. Above we have indicated many times that all things which are said inclusively about the idol of the Templars agree optimally in regard to our idols. They venerated [this idol] as God and as Savior (Articles 49, 50), and the confession of Raymundus Rubei (Dupuy 216 and Nicolai II, 86), et le superieur baisant cette idol dit Jallah ["And the Superior called this idol Jallah"], in essence agrees. Jallah, that is, "O, God", is a common word of the Dervishes, with which they invoke God during celebration of their orgies. It was, however, substituted for Ja-o (which the Dervishes today pronounce Ya-hu). Even Horus of the Gnostics, upon encountering Sophia, or Achamoth while moving forward in the Pleroma, cried out using this word. Finally, from time to time one can see on our idols of Mete a collar gilded in gold, which they carry to Baphomet (see tab. 1, fig. 6).

Concerning the chain which Mete, in the bowls, holds by hand, and which, clearly, is nothing but the chain of aeons (of Gnostic Hermetica), and there is no mention of it in the accusations. But weightier and more obscure is the absence of the belt. This could have presented difficulties for our argument were it not for the fact that we see our idol girded not just with girdles, but with those that were also serpents. Defenders of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia, who assert that this belt is nothing but what was common to many orders, do not ponder the fact that, if nothing else had been in use, there could be absolutely no place for such an accusation in the future. For the most widely-known aspect of the Articles of Accusation (58-61) involves the question of some secret and mystical belt “by which they were girded below the collar, which they carried about day and night in veneration of the idol,” consecrating this belt through contact with the idol. This they did, carrying it as a sign of an inviolable covenant and of an obligation most strictly imposed upon them through their secret doctrine. Finally, this belt was preserved in their coffers, or boxes, where they kept their idols.

Out of all of these things, to us it seems most noteworthy that these belts—these secret ropelike sashes—were either in the form of serpents, or had been symbolically configured to express their likeness. Promoting especial confidence in this opinion is the bronze statue of an armed knight preserved in the Welzliana Collection, whose belt is actually in the form of serpents, and which stands upon a quadruped base, as does the two-headed idol in the Imperial-Royal treasury. Thus, the description by some confessors, who stated that they had four-footed idols, is confirmed. Finally, there is the serpent throne, where two serpents are seen rising directly from the buttocks in a bronze stela (see tab. II, fig. 16), upon which, one can see, sits Mete (or rather, that is to say, the Templar Order, figured as a knight), The position of the serpents corresponds with the passages of the [Church] Fathers (Saints Irenaeus, Epiphanius and Theodoret) already cited above, where the serpent, through its twistings, is said to represent intestinal contortions, thence a hidden generative power.

Moreover, since we have already noticed that most of the symbols found on our Templar monuments [resemble explicitly the description of] their idols in the Articles of Accusation, we presume that the serpent, who is everywhere present on the idols we found, was not absent in the secret Ophitic worship of the Templars. This [serpent], whose greed and wickedness they studied to equal, was the wasser gnoseos ophiticae ["water of Ophitic Gnosis"] and the primary pillar of Templar doctrine. As a person who covers his head and abandons the body, so the Ophites and the Templars kept secret the chief part of their doctrine, leaving in open view only the body; namely, the simple meeting together of the brotherhood, or the Book of Public Statutes. [Just as], by nature, serpents crawl on the earth, [so too] the entire body [of the Templar order] was polluted by the filthiest cravings (the Pedagogia of St. Clement of Alexandria, Book I, 89). They preferred this to [serpent] to Christ (Tertullian, I, 416), and took him for an angel (since both Michael and Samael are so called), adoring him as the Dominator of the World. [Greek characters, Phronimos, "wise"], [Greek characters, panourgos, "intelligent, crafty"], and [Greek characters, kosmokrator, "ruler of the world"]: all of these are things not denied to Satan, but whoso attributes these things to him is the author and high priest of their [the Ophites'] diabolical doctrine. He [the serpent] was, as we have already seen, Nous [Greek, "mind"], or son of Jaldabaoth, creator of the world who, rebelling against the Father, tried to lead Adam and Eve back to the true knowledge of Mother Achamoth (that is, of Sophia, or divine wisdom). It is even more likely that this [element] was not missing at the mystic orgies of the Templars since in the Eleusinian and Bacchic mysteries (the imitation of which we have already shown [to be present] in the Ophitic [rites]), the serpent presents itself everywhere, the contracting Proserpina, the image of God exhibited under this form of Nous [Greek, “mind”], concerning whom Themistius[xlix] says that he came out of darkness.[l] This comment, which the celebrated Meiners, in his commentary on the mysteries (see Scripta Philosophica, Volume III, 278)[li], hardly dared to translate, very well illustrates the doctrine of the Valentinians that Nous came forth out of Bythos [“depth”, the Abyss] and life. This son of darkness and life is represented by the serpent, and the serpent is represented by the belt.

It is clear from the passages cited above (where the subject concerns the serpent) that by each of these symbols (namely, serpent and belt), an abominable lust and a topsy-turvy covenant paiderastias [Greek, of pederasty] was to be understood. Also, it was conceded by multiple confessions (concerning the accusations of the crime of Sodomy), both upon reception (initiation) and during times of private instruction. Even if we in our own opinion hold this unrestrained lust and abuse to be among the greatest out of all the crimes of which we here convict the Templars, they will certainly be considered among the matters of least importance by those taking into account the thinking of those times and the nature of Oriental camps, Reasonably, then, we wonder at those who, notwithstanding the Articles of Accusation, confirmed by very frequent confessions, endeavor to defend the Temple Militia as guiltless in this regard, since the entire matter regarding the widespread acts of love [taking place] in Oriental camps has nothing truly strange-sounding about it, and in this regard, we have already totally subscribed to the opinion brought by Gürtler.[lii]

We [have] come upon such a society of masculine love already within the sacred fraternities of Thebes among the Greeks, whose establishment, as with many others from antiquity, appears to have been borrowed by the Templars. What's more, there are many statutes and common rights of public order that suggest this secret sense of a society joined together by a mutual link of masculine love. By this we mean such things as the establishment of a table with a reading couch for the precept [teacher] to communicate with brothers (see Moldenhauer, p. 284), [arranged so that] only two brothers could sit there (see Münter's Statutenbuch, p. 126). Finally, [there is] the seal of the two brothers, one behind the other, sitting upon one horse, all of which are indications of the ultimate state of unity and of intimacy by the two parties to a binary covenant. Many wrongly interpreted this seal image as a symbol of their original poverty, but the first [Templar charter] by St. Bernard (already mentioned) testifies [against this], as it states that to each individual knight should be ascribed not one, but three horses.

In the same rule, Articles [71][liii] and 72, he inveighs against [fraternizing with] Sisters [nuns] and kissing of women with these words: “It is even more dangerous to unite with Sisters, for the ancient enemy [Satan], together with a woman [Eve], expelled many from the right path to paradise. Therefore, dearest brothers, that the flower of integrity should always be apparent among you, we are not permitted to engage in this custom.” And again, “We believe (like all religions) that it is dangerous to pay too much attention to the face of women. Therefore, a brother may presume to kiss neither widow, nor mother, nor sister, nor aunt, nor any other woman. Hence, let Christ's militia flee feminine kisses, by which men frequently become endangered, so that a pure conscience and secure life in the sight of the Lord may successfully and continuously be preserved". (See Münters Statutenbuch, pages 143 and 148). It is very far afield for us to suspected that by these rules of his and statutes directed against women, St. Bernard favored the love of males. But, nonetheless, that this hatred of women was interpreted and converted by the Templars into the love of males is patently evident from their confessions. The Templars, faithful followers of the Ophites, who twisted the purest texts of Scripture into the vilest possible meaning, willfully interpreted their rule of life in [terms of a] secret doctrine. Nor was this the only article which, with arcane precepts, they dragged far off into a different meaning. Thus, for example, Article 48, as the lion ever slain, was understood by the Templars (as by the Gnostics) as being about the lion as a symbol of Jaldabaoth being immolated. That this belt, the wrong use of which they were accused, was a very secret symbol of paiderastia [Greek, pederasty] cannot be doubted anymore. According to the confessions, (see Moldenhauer here and there), this [belt] was whitened and, through contact with the idol, consecrated. Finally, it is most reasonable that even the cat, or dog, which is said to have appeared in their chapters also was a symbol of this abominable lust, since it is to be seen everywhere in the Gnostic sculptures of the Templar temples and sepulchers.

By the [word] "cat," of which there was mention during the trials Templars, we believe that “dog” should be understood, because everywhere dog is observed, but nowhere a cat. Such [a dog] you see in the sepulchers of the Templars, such in the bas-reliefs of the Schoengraberian church, where, from the first fall of Adam, and from the early infancy [initiation] of Templars all the way up to the ultimate triumph of Gnosis, (represented by the slaughtering of the lion), everywhere he [the dog] continues to help the Gnostic, or Templar; such a one you see on a coin [standing] in front of a Templar Knight (tab. V, fig. 76); such a one you see adhering to the followers of an armed knight (see table II, fig. 4), as if [it is the] Daduchum [high priest] of the infamous Sodomitic mysteries. Should anyone offer the view that the animal is rather a cat, we won’t put up a fight, but whether it be a dog or a cat, this alone we will take note of: that each of the two animals lived in the East and was employed there in the filthiest acts of pleasure, as can be seen in two chapters in that obscene pamphlet Deluburaderii[liv] which deal with the foul desire for encounters with cats and dogs. Everywhere this dog is shown as a guide to the heinous [act], but we do not need to prove the filth of [their] mystery doctrine when some of the monuments presented here give testimony of this truth to the very eyes (though we can touch upon them only lightly because of the heinousness of the crime. Thus, for example, that nude Baphometic idol, positioned on bended knee while behind and opposite him, depravity [occurs] with his rear end, [exhibiting the] very shameful secret of the high offices [of the Templar leadership in the] later [years] (see also tab. I, fig. 4).

These were, therefore, the mysteries of the chapters, celebrated during the silence of night, and shaped according to the image of a “baptism of fire,” for which, as Tertullian truthfully says of the Gnostic mysteries, they were most deserving of [hell]fire and darkness. These secrets were kept from profane ones by [oaths of] silence (in imitation of the institution of Pythagorean Silence), which were imposed upon initiates under the cruelest threats of burning. This is how, for nearly two centuries, so many horrors were being kept secret from the public, kings, and the church, which can most easily be explained by the nature of these institutions, restricted by the most powerful bonds of sworn oaths. For, as is clear from the repeated confessions of the Templars, [their members] were being received only by these abominable rites, which a person of greater intelligence and strength would refuse, since such a one would think that worship of a lesser idol is horrifying. Not all were immediately received in such a way]. Some were received as such after many years, and if at that time they had not matured into impiety, and wavered in their faith about carrying out the things required of them by the point of a sword, then the receiving teachers (of necessity being indulgent their religious minds) let them believe that all of these things were only vanities, and they permitted timid ones who were conflicted not to spit on the cross, but rather to spit wherever they wished. Once the candidates were received, either the strong, gathered together with the powerful, by their own mental disposition, covered up all mysteries of impiety and of impurity which had been revealed to them, and concealed them from profane ones; or, if weaker, they were warned that the accepted opinion about them was false. By the bonds and oaths of the order (so many and great), the revelation of the mystery of that shame which they had been forced to suffer was kept from [the profane]. Thus it happens that this impious doctrine which (as seems most reasonable) from the time of Gualterus Montisbarensis flowed down from the temple clergy to the knights, went unpunished for a century and a half, and by the cloak of religion openly spread through the entire order, and thence throughout the entire world. One may suspect that some of the weaker ones, long before institution of the trials, revealed to their confessors the mystery of iniquity, 30 years before the bulls which opened the door for the abolition of the Templars, and later stood firm in their confessions. The church at that time, remembering the great services which the order had performed as an armed force against the infidels, wished to veil rather than reveal the shameful aspects [of the order] (to the extent that was admissible, without major detriment to the Christian Republic), and as historical facts declare, sought to correct the vileness of this order by uniting them with the Knights of St. John. These things having been tried without success, evidence of these [charges] was brought publicly to the king, who rightly feared the increasing power of the order as pernicious to the rights of his Christian kingdom. The church, too, neither could nor would any longer protect the order publicly, which had expanded from its beginnings until it reached the limits of the area under the heavens, and because it was derelict through impiety in religion and impurity in morality, the Church permitted punishment by the secular arm. The principal cause of the heinous nature of this doctrine appears to have been that the Supreme Pontiff wished to bring the sentence of condemnation, not “de jure” [by right], but by means of apostolic provision, lest the scandals of impiety and impurity which the bull suggests become openly exposed.

These scandals, so dire, and the trials [that followed] were so deeply hidden, it was no wonder that the nature of the crimes committed was kept from public notice by the craftiest accomplices of this intimate secret. Others, whether compelled to silence by shame or by fear of being subjugated to force, their souls softened by flatteries and overpowered by threats, did not betray [the oaths of secrecy]. Persons offering resistance were compelled, by swords unsheathed, to give adoration to an idol. The deepest silence was imposed upon brothers by means of oaths, so that even among themselves it was not permitted to speak about the rites of reception. Finally, in order to resist betrayal, a rule was provided, lest the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia should confess their sins in a sacramental tribunal to persons other than priests or members of the Donatist order. If this secrecy became violated, besides the tribunal of confession, imprisonment and death were imminent. Finally, no one of the brothers dared to communicate with another his own thoughts about the abominable reception rites. Thus, it turns out these mysteries of darkness that up until this day lie hidden among the Jesuits, and perhaps also among the Druzes, were propagated with impunity for 180 years. But if, in the religious books of the Druzes, and in their spiritual system, which has the scent of emanating aeons and Gnostic doctrine, no vestige of such defilement can be found, by no means does this argue the innocence of those convent members who were celebrating by night with promiscuous lust (with extinguished lamps, and as rumor has it). In the same way also the public statutes of the Templars (edited by Münter in their defense) do not exclude the existence of a secret doctrine. Indeed, from the confessions of brothers under examination, the existence of an arcane doctrine and a double order of statutes comes forth. Thus, the first witness, Rudolph de Praille, openly spoke of an arcane discipline of the order (given to him by his instructor Gervais de Beauvais), and of a double book of statutes; one ostensible, the other most secret, to be exhibited to no one. Also the twenty-first witness, Garner de Veneisi, [testified that] since he was against the infamous secret rite of reception, the instructor excused him from it because of the rigor of the statutes. These secret statutes, though they were surely compendious, and in the hands of very few receivers who could have endangered the order, and were very easily deleted. They did not come down to us, but of the tenor of egregious precepts (which are inscribed on Baphometic idols and on bowls, and sculpted onto churches), it is impossible to think that they are anything other than Ophitic doctrine.

The strongest argument of the defenders of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia up till now revolves around the fact that nothing of those heads about whose adoration they are gravely and frequently accused, up to now has been found. But this has already been totally overthrown after our finding more than 20 such heads and idols. These idols exist with one or two heads, standing either on a solid or quadruped base, in treasure rooms and designated collections. Certain things of theirs have been dug up from beneath the locations of Templar churches, where coins, both solid and gilded, have been found, whose figures and inscriptions, up to the present, fit nicely with the obscure symbols and inscriptions on the idols. The same idol inscriptions are also sculpted on the bowls, in which Ophitic orgies are described, and the sculptures on those bowls agree with those preserved up to now on buildings of the Templars. In this cycle of monuments and arguments, where one supports and helps another, the existence of the secret doctrine, and the culpability of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia, is placed beyond any doubt.

In the course of our arguments we have wholly neglected historical facts, even if they most strongly support the arguments brought against the Templars, not because we consider that they are to be held as having no weight, but because the same facts that are rejected by some historians are allowed by others. Sometimes they would serve to incriminate the order, and sometimes they serve as an apology in its favor. Thus, the older historians, Matthiu de Paris[lv], Daniel du Puys[lvi], and Gürtler, using the same facts of history, have condemned the arrogant impiety and luxuriating of the Templars, while others (such as Stemler[lvii] and Anton among the German writers, or Jeune and Raynouard[lviii] of the French writers) composed historical apologetics and dissertations in favor of the order. From the erudite Danes, Münter and Moldenhauer, one published the public statutes, which previously had lain secret; the other published the secret testimony from the trials, in which the order (as a public institution) was indeed exhibited in a pleasant light.

However, after the facts are accumulated, these secrets and arcane elements of the detestable doctrine, come forth [into the open]. Finally, Nicolai and Grouvelle, inquiring into the historical facts in a philosophical and skeptical spirit (which should govern all impartial investigators of history), [argues that] once the apologetic arguments of Anton[lix] and Münter have been rendered invalid, [it becomes clear that] the culpability of the Brotherhood of the Temple Militia, as far as Gnostic impiety and obscene acts of love [are concerned], is as great as can be. We argued with these 12 writers as the 13th at a round table disputing about the Graal bowl, approaching it with an array of arguments drawn from symbols, cups, and other works of art involving, so that it was not us who did the speaking, but the stones, bronzes, buildings and bas-reliefs.

All of these monuments, in no way explained until this moment, are of the greatest important, with perhaps the exception of the coins, about which our many arguments have not convinced most people that they were actually struck by Templars. But, considering that the coins are sequential, another reading of those inscriptions may be proposed. Either way, there can be no objection brought against the symbols and bas-reliefs on the bowls and buildings, which are truly Ophitic and Templar, and these [depictions of] the crimes of apostasy, idolatry and impurity everywhere dazzle the eyes. Finally, here we cannot silence our judgment with regard to the very weak argument of Baylis[lx], which also Raynouard accepted, in apology for the Templars: S'ils e'toient assez impies, pour reconcer a la religion chretienne, qui etoit celle de leur naissance, comment auroient-ils pu se confier a utie idoie. [French, "If they were so impious as to separate from the Christian religion, which was that of their birth, how could they entrust themselves to an idol?”]

Let me not speak here about the general contradictions of the human character, which we know to be such that the strongest characters are often inclined to superstitious old wives’ tales, being atheists and at the same time subject to demon gods, and one who believes in or gives adoration to no god still fears and supplicates to ghosts. I will be silent about these things. Here it will suffice only to send the reader back to the history of diverse heresies, in which the same Ophites and other heretics deny Christ as God; they adore Achamoth (that is, Mete of the Templars) in place of such. In those innermost reaches of the human mind and heart is to be sought a far deeper explanation of the facts: that very often it can be said (concerning soldiers and concerning ministers) that men publicly defend a doctrine and live their lives by an oath which in secret they reject and oppose. Examples of this, in Christian and Saracen versions [respectively], is seen in the Templars and Assassins at the time of the Crusader expeditions, for [the members of] each order most vigorously devoted their lives to a doctrine of public faith which in secret they denied and abjured (which seems most absurd).

What wonder is it that, when most of their most powerful soldiers had been thrown into prison, and they saw destruction as impending not only upon themselves but also upon the order, they, having confessed nothing, showed the same constancy and fortitude as in a fight? Others, being weaker, professed the truth, after their patience was exhausted by torments in the hand of the torturer, but upon being returned to prison, or being brought back under judgment, recanted and declared [their confessions] to be false. [But then some], not fearing death, which so often seemed imminent, but having sustained torments after repeating again the assertion of innocence, and unable to bear the guilt after a confession seized by violence, wished to cleanse [it] by their own blood.

Thus, from the arguments brought forth [here regarding] the culpability of the Templars, it stands in clearer light that they were not innocent, but were [rightfully] accused and condemned as guilty by the Apostolic Seat of the church and by very many princes of the republic, so that the sentence of condemnation may be attributed to divine and human justice. The barbarous mode of execution—torment and burning alive--is to be attributed to the darkness of that age.

As a conclusion to our critical commentary, we will provide this note about the Middle Ages in which this order flourished: In that dark period, which very recently has encountered so many laudatory remarks, those limited by fanaticism, atheism, superstition and impiety have become confused. The little-known wisdom regarding that time is that it consisted of unbridled license of opinions and lusts, so that we may conclude that this period, which the writer of the same panegyric likened to a serene starlit night, was actually nothing more than a gloomy blackness, distinguished by the sparks of shameful deeds ignited, and the conflagrations of superstitions.

[x] The Latin word cestus in the second declination means "belt." The Farsi word that Hammer-Purgstall compares it to (Costi) most likely refers to a ceremonial belt.

[xii] Pherecydes of Syros, a sixth-century Greek thinker, is credited with coming up with his own cosmology and theory of creation. It involves a cloth that is wrapped around the Earth by Chronos (Time), which may have been what Hammer-Purgstall saw as analogous to the Gnostic veil.

[xiii] This Gnostic, Hermetic, and Neoplatonic "chain" appears to be the chain of causality, and of the interconnected hierarchies of creation. Since in Gnosticism, each aeon corresponds to an archontic entity, and each Archon corresponds to one of the seven "classical planets" (the Sun, the Moon, Mercury, Mars, Venus, Jupiter, Saturn), and each planet was, in antiquity, believed to rule over one of the seven heavens (viewed as being spherical and concentrically stacked inside each other like a Russian doll, with the Earth in the middle), one can imagine this as a chain running from the center of the Earth, through the sky, then up through each of the seven heavens and all the way up to the Pleroma on the outside, where the real "Father" resides.

Hammer-Purgstall's reference to "the gods' chain in Homer" points to The Iliad, where Zeus posits a challenge to the other gods to assert his superiority over them. He says:

Try me and find out for yourselves. Hang me a golden chain from heaven, and lay hold of it all of you, gods and goddesses together—tug as you will, you will not drag

Zeus the supreme counselor from heaven to earth; but were I to pull at it myself I should draw you up with earth and sea into the bargain, then would I bind the chain about some pinnacle of Olympus and leave you all dangling in the mid firmament. So far am I above all others either of gods or men.

[xv] Nicolaus of Antioch was founder of the Christian Gnostic heresy of Nicolaism. The book in question is once again Abraxas seu Apistopistus by Joannes Macarius and Jean Chifflet, which appears to contain a lot of the same images of Gnostic coins that are reproduced here in this book.

[xvi] Ibid. Daduch and Epibom are the titles of officiants in the Eleusian mysteries. We will discuss them more later on.

[xvii] Written by J.W. Schmidt, the title means The Highest Grade of Freemasonry.

[xviii] See the final chapter of Clock Shavings by Tracy R. Twyman for more information on the creation myth told in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, in which the First Woman, Eve, must support the columns that uphold creation, and these collapse when she stoops down to take fruit from the Tree of Knowledge upon which she is standing.

[xix] Although the translator has chosen the word “distinguished” here (as in “set apart”), a purer rendering of the Latin word signata used here by Hammer-Purgstall is “sealed” or “marked, signed.” The implication is that Mete’s “love” or “charity” is peculiar to her, marked by the signature of what Mete represents.

[xx] Again, he claims that this represents the three Abrahamic religions.

[xxi] This is the Fatimid Imam-Caliph Al-Hakim bi-Am Allah, who established the Dar al-Hikmah (or “House of Wisdom”) in Cairo in 1004 A.D.

[xxiii] Sir Francis Bacon wrote in The New Atlantis about a fictional “philosophic empire” centered around a college of wise men he called “Solomon’s House.”

[xxiv] Hammer-Purgstall is indeed the author of the quintessential book on the subject.

[xxv] This was the name of an ancient Phoenician writer.

[xxvi] Manetho was an Egyptian historian from the third century B.C.

[xxvii] Athenagoras of Athens was a second-century Church Father and Christian apologist.

[xxviii] This and several other Greek words in this paragraph are the titles of officers in the Orphic and Eleusian mysteries. This person’s role was to prepare the sacrificial pyre on the altar.

[xxx] Meaning “sacred piper,” this officer’s job was to play the Aulos, an ancient Greek reed pipe.

[xxxi] This word simply means “he who carries the libations.”

[xxxii] Translating to “the adorner,” this title was given to the person charged with setting up the altar and the idols for the ritual.

[xxxiii] The word used here by Hammer-Purgstall, stolam, was originally translated as “robe” by our translator, but it is connected to the Latin root of the English word “stole,” which the time of his writing still meant “the long scarf-like garment worn by clergymen” (according to the Online Etymology Dictionary). That matches up with what we see in the image in question.

[xxxv] The Eleatics were a fifth-century pre-Socratic philosophy school. They believed in seeking truth through contemplation rather than using the evidence of the senses.

[xxxvi] In other words, he sees these Oriental philosophies as subdividing the attributes of the one true God into multiple gods, as the pagans did.

[xxxvii] Epicurus promoted the pursuit of personal happiness as the highest good, although without the emphasis on sexual pursuits that Hammer-Purgstall implies here. Horace once referred to one of his followers as “A pig from the sty of Epicurus,” perhaps because they tried to be fat and happy like hogs.

[xxxviii] The notion that semen contains spiritual “light” is common in the presently-discussed mystical traditions.

[xxxix] This is the title of a Grail romance written by Wolfram von Eschenbach in the thirteenth century, and is considered a prequel to the better-known Parzival.

Perhaps he would have interpreted all images of Melusine as Templar-inspired depictions of Mete. The story of the Melusine (inspired by a supernatural folk tale stating that the wife of Fulk III, Count of Anjou, was a half-demonic creature spawned by Satan), was first heard shortly before or contemporary with the foundation of the Templar order, and the house of Anjou was intimately connected with the families of the founding knights.

This book deals with a particularly painful subject, it contains shocking information that can be very disturbing for everyone. Its sometimes very brutal content, especially in the testimonies, aims to reveal a harsh reality masked by a syndrome of massive societal denial. Some content can also potentially trigger negative reactions in survivors of ritual abuse and mind control, but also in anyone who has been the victim of incest or childhood abuse and neglect. It is therefore necessary to be careful and to stop the reading if it triggers emotions or inappropriate reactions. It is a book that is intended exclusively for an adult readership.

This book is strictly informative, in no case can it be a substitute for therapeutic treatment.

It is aimed at believers as well as non-believers, however some passages with biblical or eschatological content may disturb the atheist reader. A relative prior knowledge of the theology and spiritual struggle that takes place here below can help to fully grasp the content of this book. Believing readers are advised to prepare through prayer before such a reading.

foreword

When one looks at paedocriminal cases, at one time or another, one discovers testimonies of gang rape, occult rituals, mental slavery and even human sacrifices where the terror and suffering of the victims are brought to a climax. One solution may be to look the other way, to reject these testimonies because of their too shocking character and shaking up our paradigm too much; or to take them into consideration and accept them as possibly a reality of the world in which we live... A possibility that will gradually turn into a certainty in view of the very many testimonies that relate the same practices.

From there, it is possible to dig into the subject and then realize that it is a kind of Pandora's box. Is the innocence of childhood a fountain of youth for certain circles? Is the immaculate consciousness of childhood a blank page on which some grant themselves the right to engrave what they want to serve their own interests? Does elitist Satanism, also called paedo-satanism, really exist?

Channeling consciences is a key to domination here on earth. Mind control takes different forms, from the simplest to the most complex. The learning methods that shape the brain, the school and university programs that format beliefs and critical thinking, are a first form of modeling the future adult that aims to make it compatible and useful to the current social system. "Journalistic" information and media entertainment are other factors that will influence your consciousness according to a certain model. The social pressure that makes the individual submit to what is called the "single thought", is also a form of mind control. The various food and environmental pollutions alter your brain and consequently your capacity for reasoning and analysis...

At this point, the population still retains a semblance of free will. Every individual has the opportunity to question everything they have been taught since childhood. He can reform himself by choosing other sources, get rid of his television, change his way of feeding, lighten himself from the material world to turn to the spiritual world, etc. We could also cite the subliminal or psychotronics as tools that can influence and control the human consciousness.

The "nameless religion" (which will be defined in chapter 2) loves robots and automatons, it needs them. It needs to create a planet of illusions where your thoughts, ideas and creativity are under its control. His world is a permanent war to manipulate your subconscious in every possible way. From misinformation to hidden symbols to invisible technological weapons, the modus operandi of "nameless religion" is MIND CONTROL.

What will be studied in this book is a tool of slavery where the free will of the victim no longer exists at all, or almost no longer. It is about mental control based on trauma and the manipulation of the psychic world, a process initiated from early childhood. Mind control or Mind-Kontrol (MK programming) can be defined as systematic torture blocking the victim's ability to become aware of the treatment inflicted. Suggestions and conditioning are used to implant thoughts and directives in the subconscious, usually in new identities (dissociated or "alter" personalities) artificially created by extreme and repetitive traumas, forcing the victim by a natural mechanism of brain protection, to act, feel, think or perceive things as the programmer wishes. The aim is to have the victim execute instructions without his or her being aware of them. The installation of these MK programs relies on the victim's ability to dissociate himself deeply. Very young children who already have serious dissociative disorders are therefore "first choice candidates" for programming.

The child is like a piece of shapeable clay. During his first 6 years, his brain is in full development, his neurons are organized according to his experience, he is in "recording" mode and he is not able to criticize the information he receives. He therefore stores the data and thus builds the foundations of his subconscious who will direct his adult life. This is why the internal structures of a programming by personality splitting are installed during early childhood, before the age of 6. We are talking about a real psychic surgery. The child will very quickly be encouraged to dissociate himself during traumatic sessions, to pass through the mirror, to cross the rainbow, to access an alternative reality, to other dimensions. In a child, the profound altered states of consciousness during a traumatic experience create a kind of psychic and energetic "unlocking".

The culture of dissociative states is as old as the world and is an integral part of the practices of the "nameless religion" which systematically uses it on its descendants. This psycho-spiritual process is therefore a kind of door opening onto other dimensions and giving enlightenment to the one who lives the dissociative experience. The most direct way to access this altered state of consciousness is the pure and hard trauma caused by terror and extreme pain; can even go, as we will see, to near-death experiences. These techniques are systematically used by satanic/Luciferian fraternities as a process of inversion of sanctification: counter-initiation. They are used as tools to control society. As the famous hacker Kevin Mitnick says: "The weak link in any security system lies in the human factor." In order to be able to secure a system of domination on a global scale, it is therefore imperative to set up a hacking of the minds of human pawns placed in strategic positions behind democratic facades. The MK is the focal point of the various occult organizations of this planet. The main axis on which this control tool is based is dissociative identity disorder, i.e. multiple personality syndrome, a consequence of traumatic ritual initiations practiced from early childhood.

This book is just like a memory divided into a thousand pieces that would have been reconstructed in the manner of a puzzle. Indeed, the subjects of ritual abuse and mind control are difficult to understand when one accesses only fragments of testimonies or rare articles on paedocriminal networks, Satanism and mental control. All the more so because at the French-speaking level information remains very limited.

To begin to identify this heavy subject, this puzzle required gathering pieces concerning anthropology, psychotraumatology, government programs such as MK-Ultra, transgenerational Satanism, the "soul fragments" of shamanic traditions, demonology, but also the societal aspect of the thing: that is to say, all the MK symbolism infused before our eyes in popular culture via the entertainment industry. Once all these pieces are connected to each other in a coherent way, part of the mysteries of this world eventually become accessible to the layman... the eye of the cyclone, an essential key to understanding the satanic paedo systemand more generally of what is now called the New World Order.

This book therefore tries to reconstitute the MK puzzle as best as possible, it should help you to grasp one of the most obscure aspects of our world, and perhaps also enlighten you on our current situation, both material and spiritual.

Canadian sociologist Herbert Marshall McLuhan said: "Only the smallest secrets need to be protected. The biggest ones are guarded by public disbelief.''

We call fools those who are not affected by the common madness...

Chapter 1

Mind Control: from simple to complex

Interindividual influence or social influence fascinates and frightens. (...) the terrible various facts attributed to him (collective suicides, ritual crimes.) as well as disturbing scientific studies (works on hypnosis, experimental studies on conformism or submission to authority.) affirm the existence of an almost irresistible force that could push us to do or think things that we would not want, a force that could even lead us to our loss. There is, with the influence, the idea of an intrusion, of a real rape of conscience, of will. which seems to be able to pass under the control or will of another. It is no longer oneself who wants or who acts, it is the will of another that has entered into oneself and it is another who acts through oneself (feeling of possession) - Stéphane Laurens, "The dangers of mental manipulation".

There are different types of mind control. There is large-scale control, mass control, and individual control that focuses on a single subject. It can be direct and violent or indirect and non-violent (this is called silent or invisible war). In mass mind control, individuals generally retain their free will while the most complex individual mind control will completely suppress it. Through biology, neurology and applied psychology, sorcerers-controllers have achieved an advanced knowledge of the human being, both biologically and psychologically. This system has come to know the human better than the human knows himself, which means that he holds a great power of control over individuals because the most effective way to conquer a man is to capture his mind. Control a man's mind and you will control his body, not all men have the same thoughts,but all think with the same mechanism: the brain. Mass or individual mind control can also be called hard or gentle mind control, direct or indirect, active or passive. Military-type brainwashing is the active and direct method, while television-type brainwashing is the passive and indirect method, certainly the most effective due to the fact that the victims are unaware of what is happening to them and tirelessly and voluntarily continue their brainwashing.

1 - The mental control of the masses

It is not only the victims of the MK-Ultra (American program on individual mind control, chapter 3) who are programmed, but the whole world, subjected to a form of mind control. For example, we have been programmed to believe that our political leaders are men of honour and loyalty with great respectability because of the social status they hold... While our current governing elites are only corrupt, psychopathic child rapists and cocaine addicts, individuals who bathe in the darkest occultism. The death of a child or the use of a human slave reduced to the state of a robot does not make them hot or cold. Does this deliberately affirmative and provocative statement shock you? Does this erode your paradigm?... Perhaps you will close this book here to protect the image you have of the world in which you live. This would be a completely natural defensive reaction: the instinctive preservation of your paradigm.

The now famous parable of the "Matrix" in which we are immersed is very accurate, people are permanently connected to a current keeping them in a safe and infantilizing waking dream. The functioning of our brain, our mind, our emotions and even our spiritual world is perfectly known by the "architects of control", who only have to press this or that button to trigger this or that reaction.

An important principle of mind control is distraction. Distraction makes it possible to focus consciousness on one or more of the five senses (sight, touch, hearing, smell, taste) in order to program in parallel the subconscious. This principle applies as much in magic tricks as in state propaganda, marketing and advertising. The second principle of mind control that accompanies the first is repetition. The combination of distraction and repetition is highly effective in programming the human subconscious. Television, radio, various and varied circuses (entertainment and variety), are all directed to your subconscious, the art of propaganda is to address your subconscious directly. And this art has now become a real science applied on a large scale. Human beings need entertainment, indeed, but we see today that what is offered to us all the time on television, with reality television for example, is more of a sabotage of consciences than an innocent game of belote...

Men submit to mind control because they are born in it. The science of social engineering (the analysis and automation of a society) that works on mass control sets up manipulation, domination and oppression in a progressive way so that people can never be able to see it coming. This is the famous allegory of the frog in a pot of water that heats up. If you immerse a frog in very hot water, it will react very quickly to escape from it. Whereas if we immerse it in cold water and gradually heat this water until it boils, the frog will get used to the temperature, it will numb and will no longer have the strength to save itself, it will end up being scalded. This is a good illustration of the phenomenon of habituation that leads to not reacting to a serious situation and our modern society is totally numb in this "Matrix" whose boiling point does not seem very far away...

a/ Television

''Media stupidity is not an epiphenomenon. It is leading a war of annihilation against culture. There are a lot of battles to be fought. But, if the media industry wins its war against the spirit, all will be lost.'

Pierre Jourde

One of the sources plunging the masses into this "Matrix" is directly in your living room, it is the television, which has replaced the fireplace as the "heart of the fireplace". This device is a first-class mind control tool, perhaps even the most important when it comes to global control. Imagine for a few minutes a society without television, needless to say that consciences would have a completely different way of functioning, desires and needs would have nothing to do with those of today. Imagine a society without the infantilization, the stupidization, the polemics, the division, the fear, the advertising packaging, the deculturation, the standardization and the conformism that this device spreads all the time. Imagine the "available brain time" (term used by Patrick Le Lay, CEO of TF1) that could be made available for other family, social, creative, truly educational and pedagogical activities, knowing that on average 75% of our free time (INSEE) is monopolized by television programs! No household appliance had managed to break into homes so quickly and massively. The family organizes its furniture around the television set, the meal and bedtime times are organized according to the schedule of programs (and vice versa), she has in a way become the mistress of the house programming family planning and the minds of the most assiduous members to this grid ...

We are dealing with a real mind control technology, television has a powerful hypnotic effect. In "Life and Health" (1992) Liliane Lurçat writes: "Children and adults undergo a real fascination through image andspeech. When the viewer is in front of the station, he can no longer detach himself from it. This behaviour is particularly impressive in children, since television is the only thing capable of immobilising a small child, usually very a,ctif in other circumstances."

In 1997, the philosopher Jean-Jacques Wunenberg wrote in a Télérama: "First agent of the globalization of mores, television arouses an almost ritual set of uniform behaviors, whatever the environments and visual messages: arrangement of furniture, assembly of spectators oriented towards the light source, schedules constrained by a show generally programmed at fixed times, etc.[1]."

Several studies have been conducted on the effects of television on the brain. The overall finding is that this device weakens attention span and critical ability. Television generates a state of hypnosis under the guise of relaxation. The most popular pastime in the world also leads to a form of addiction whose criteria are: "Spend a large part of one's time using the substance, use it more often than one would like, think about reducing its use or make repeated but unsuccessful efforts to reduce it, drop important social, family or professional activities to use it , and show withdrawal symptoms when they are stopped." All these criteria can be applied to large television consumers.

In 1986, Byron Reeves of Stanford University, Esther Thorson of the University of Missouri and their colleagues began to study whether the formal features of television content, i.e. cuts, montages, zooms, pans, sudden noises, etc., activated an orientation response in the individual and therefore kept his attention centered on the screen. The orientation response is the mobilization of attention following a change in the subject's environment, it is accompanied by a complex set of changes at the sensory, somatic and autonomous level that aim to prepare the subject to react to a possible unforeseen event. Looking at how brain waves were affected by formal television traits, the researchers concluded that video montages could actually trigger involuntary responses in the individual... It is form, not content, that makes television unique. This orientation response may in part explain remarks such as: "If a TV is on, I can't help but watch it" or "I feel mesmerized when I watch TV"." The makers of educational programmes for children have found that these formal traits can promote learning, but that the increase in the number of cuts and shots ends up overloading the brain. Clips and commercials that use quick cuts with unrelated scenes are designed to capture the viewer's attention more than to deliver information. People can remember the name of the product or the name of the brand, but the details of the advertisement are entered by one ear and then come out by the other; or should we say entered by one eye and come out by the other. This is the consequence of an overloaded orientation response[2].

In 1964, the philosopher Marshall McLuhan published "To Understand the Media", a book in which he explains that television is the preferred tool of advertisers because it is able to break down the feeling of externality with the scenes watched, just as if it were an extension of the brain. This phenomenon is confirmed by an experiment conducted by Marshall and his son Eric McLuhan, reproduced twenty years later at the University of Toronto by his son in the documentary "The Tube" by Peter Entell. The experiment consists in demonstrating that a film watched on television or in the cinema will not be perceived in the same way at all. In this experiment, two groups of individuals watch the same film on either side of a suspended screen, one receiving the light reflected on the screen (similar to the cinema), the other (on the other side of the screen) receives the light coming directly from the source (similar to television). Then each participant of both groups is asked to write a page of comments on their impressions and what they thought was significant during this screening. Experience shows that "reflected light" and "direct light" do not have the same effects on body and mind. In the "reflected light" (cinema) group, people were aware of something external to them and they were relatively objective about the content of the film. On the other hand, in the "direct light" group (television), people spoke more about themselves, their feelings and their thoughts. Their comments were much more subjective than those of the other group. In front of a direct light like that of television, the viewer is no more and no less than the screen on which the light is projected and he lives the content of the programs with a much stronger emotional impregnation, with a loss of the feeling of externality of the scenes watched. There is no longer any distance: you are the screen and the projection of the image is printed on you like a tattoo. This direct light gives television images the power to invade the mind as in a dream by neutralizing the critical mind. As demonstrated in the previous experiment on the orientation response, it is more the media (the tool) than the content that acts on the brain.

The American neurologist Thomas Mulholland has demonstrated grace to an electroencephalogram (EEG) that the television creates a state of deep relaxation, or even drowsiness in the subject. He found that the EEG displayed Alpha-type brain waves when the subject was watching television. This type of brain wave is the one that is observed when the human is inactive, the less the brain works, the more alpha waves it produces. This hypnotic relaxation largely explains the addiction caused by television, especially after a day's work. Hypnotic relaxation therefore effectively promotes the impregnation of advertising content and other propaganda messages. Television, thanks to this hypnotic effect and its role of entertainment, makes it possible to keep the citizen in an illusory distraction and thus to detach him from the real stakes in order to better govern him. Frederick Emery, one of the brightest social scientists of his generation and a member of the Tavistock Institute, said: "Television may be conceptualized as the technological analogue of hypnosis.''

What Herbert Krugman said about television is also very interesting. Krugman is a former advertising agency director, when he was a consultant for the Bureau of Intelligence Research at the U.S. State Department, his work focused on the infiltration of communism into American society, as well as brainwashing during the Korean War and resistance to propaganda. In the documentary "The Tube", Herbert Krugman says that advertisers were passionate about brainwashing techniques, he says he himself knew some first-choice "brain washers" that he then recruited for his services... He does not hesitate to compare television with certain techniques used by the military such as sensory deprivation boxes, also used in the MK-Ultra project. According to him, such techniques rely on a phase of desensitization very similar to the mental state caused by television. The television image is indeed poor in sensory data, leading to the viewer losing the sensation of his body. In the case of individual brainwashing, the loss of sensory cues by which the person recognizes himself is the preparatory phase of the change imposed on his mental world. In the case of television, the images plunge the viewer into an awake sleep, his brain then functions in alpha waves, his identity dissolves and the "image box" provides him with the dreams programmed at fixed times for him[3].

Television is the ideal tool for the application of the principle of "tension and liberation". It helps to create tension in a controlled environment, thus increasing the level of stress, and then it provides a series of possibilities for the release of tension and stress. As long as the victim thinks that the choices proposed are the only possible solutions, even if at first glance they seem unacceptable, he or she will end up making one of those unacceptable choices. In such a situation, man is conditioned to respond to the tension like an animal seeking the pressure relief valve. The key to the success of this mind control process is the balanced management between tension and the choices to relieve this tension. As long as these two things are controlled, the victim may be led to choose and accept things that are increasingly unacceptable. This is social engineering, cultural psychiatry, and television is the essential vehicle for infusing the tension in each household and the valve to release that tension in every household. Television infuses images creating tension and then serves on a flat the solutions[4].

Television with its world of semi-reality, illusion and escape, broadcast 24H24, 7 days a week, is a real box with mental programming, its truly cultural and educational role remains very secondary.

Anton Szandor Lavey, the founder of the Church of Satan and the author of the Satanic Bible, has a very clear idea of the role of television in our modern society... he writes in his book "The Devil's Notebook": "The birth of television is a magical event with satanic meaning (...) What started modestly in families with small boxes has gradually turned into large satellite dishes and antennas that dominate the horizon and replace the crosses at the top of the churches. Television, or the satanic altar, has developed rapidly since the 50s from a small blurry screen to a huge material that covers entire walls. What began as innocent entertainment in the daily lives of families ended up replacing real life for millions of people, it became a major religion for the masses.

The clergy of the television religion are the artists, the presenters, especially those who propagate the darkness through the rays of the cathode ray tube. The presenters of the network are the high priests and high priestesses of the consumer market. The local presenters are the parish priests, making their fat cabbages on the latest local tragedy. Celebrities, whether local, national or international, are all part of the hierarchy of the church, of the canvas.

Comedies, drama series and sitcoms are broadcast night and day, seven days a week, to activate and support the way of life of parishioners, previously only the most fanatical practiced devotion on a daily basis. With satanic stratification intensifying (aided by this evil machine), one of our tasks is to gradually develop a system so that people fit perfectly with their televisionlifestyle."

It is also interesting to note about television that its centerpiece, the cathode ray tube, was invented by a British occultist named William Crookes. The physicist Crookes was a member of the Golden Dawn secret society and president of the psychic research society, it was he who inspired Oliver Lodge's research on the ether and the spirit world. This physicist invented several devices whose purpose was to interact with tiny elementary particles such as electrons. Crookes who was a lover of spiritualism believed that spirits were able to interact with particles such as electrons and protons to manipulate them. In his autobiography, Crookes says that it must have been possible for minds to influence these tiny particles; while working on this issue, he invented the "Crookes Tube". A device for projecting electrons in a beam: this was the birth of cathode rays. The Crookes crt version would become the fundamental element for the development of television invented forty years later by the Scottish John Logie Baird. Television, an invention that would ultimately subjugate and hypnotize the entire world, was inspired in part by research on the spirit world...

b/ The subliminal

Subliminal means "below the threshold" of consciousness, it is an unconscious perception penetrating the area of the brain called "subconscious". The subliminal message can be of formal type with one or more words, or of visual type with an image, a photo, a symbol. But it can also be sound waves.

Subliminal images are undetectable to the naked eye, but the brain perceives and processes them at a subconscious level. The brain processes a lot of information but seems to have different levels of perception and some information can then influence our actions and emotions without the cognitive brain having access to it. In 1997, an experiment by Ahmed Channouf demonstrated that electrodermal reactions (R.E.D.) occur when subjects are exposed to famous or unknown faces in a subliminal way (faces are presented for 50 miliseconds). The subjects' electrodermal reactions were longer when the face was known. They concluded that even when the subject is not aware of seeing these faces, there are physiological clues that demonstrate that there is nevertheless an implicit perception and recognition[6].

Subliminal images can therefore be used as a means of manipulating crowds. There are many cases of subliminal images broadcast on television. In 1958, subliminal messages were banned in the United States, England and Australia. In 1992, France published a decree (No. 92-280) prohibiting the directive which states: "Advertising must not use subliminal techniques understood as aimed at reaching the viewer's subconscious through the very brief exposure of images." Despite this law and the supervision of the CSA, several cases of inlay of subliminal images have been observed in television programs, in films or in commercials. In France, the best-known case took place during an electoral campaign in 1988: the portrait of François Mitterrand was inserted subliminally into the antenne 2 logo during the credits of the television news. This subliminal photo was released from September 1987 to May 1988, or 2949 times. François Mitterrand was elected on May 8, 1988. The credits of the television news will finally be replaced discreetly on May 28, 1988 at the request of the CNCL (National Commission of Communication and Freedom, predecessor of the CSA). This case was tried in court but the trial was lost because the image lasted more than 60 ms (miliseconds), which excludes the qualifier of subliminal, the law considering that an image is subliminal when it lasts less than 50 ms.

In 2000, during an American election, it was discovered by chance a subliminal image embedded in a commercial for George W. Bush. It was a formal subliminal message. The insult "rats" (garbage) appeared at the time when the spot referred to the competitor Al Gore.

In 2008, also in the United States, the FOX 5 News channel introduced in its credits a very stealthy image of the Republican candidate John McCain and his wife. The French television channel M6 was also pinned twice for broadcasting subliminal advertising images during the show "Popstars" and "Caméra café".

In the military newspaper Orienteer of February 1997, Commander Chemishev of the Russian army drew up a list of weapons "psy" where he cites "the effect of the 25th image". It is a technique where each 25th frame of a film reel or feature film contains a message captured by the unconscious. This technique, if effective, could be used to limit alcohol and tobacco abuse, but could also be applied to other areas of greater concern if it is used on viewers or computer system operators. Chemishev also claims that the Japanese have developed the ability to insert sequences of voices at sub-low frequencies onto music, voices that are detected only at the subconscious level. The Russians claim to use similar "subliminal bombings" associated with computer programs to treat alcoholism or smoking[7].

Some Japanese merchants even broadcast CDs in their shops with subliminal messages to combat shoplifting. These mind control CDs broadcast music or sounds of nature but are encoded with a message in seven languages warning that anyone caught shoplifting will be reported to the police[8].

In 1993 and 1994, several articles in the American press^ will report on the information that Igor Smirnov, a Russian expert on non-lethal weapons, experimented for the American secret services and the FBI with a technology capable of subliminally inserting thoughts into the minds of individuals in order to control their actions. In particular, the FBI considered the use of Smirnov's device against David Koresh of David's sect during the siege of Waco. Smirnov said:

"I suggested that the voices of children and families inviting suicidal people to go home could be mixed with the sounds of police motor vehicles (the building was surrounded by it)." It was also about sending messages to Koresh to make him believe that he heard God's voice directly in his head. The FBI would not have chosen the option for the (official) reason that Smirnov guaranteed only a 70% chance of success. The Russian press will also publish articles on Igor Smirnov. Pravda wrote on March 6, 1994: "Village Voice has published the 'scandalous news' that Russians are able to control human behavior[10]''. Two weeks later the Moscow News published a long article, which explained how the scientist, for medical purposes, used the "psychocorrection". "Noises" containing questions, which are not audible but which are perceived by the brain, are sent into the patient's ears. The brain answers these questions, and these answers are recorded on the electroencephalograph and analyzed by computer, which allows Smirnov to perform a very fast psychoanalysis. After which "noises" containing messages of a therapeutic nature are again sent into the patient's brain, which will integrate them at a subconscious level. Smirnov denies using this technology for purposes other than medical, or unethical[11].

c/ Peer pressure

"Habit is therefore a huge driver of society, it is its most valuable conservative factor. It alone is what keeps us all within decreed limits, and what saves the children of the rich from the envious uprisings of the poor.'' - William James - "The Principles of Psychology''

Television is undoubtedly a first-class mind control tool. Because of the conformism and the standardization of the masses that it entails, it is an important vector of what is called "peer pressure" or pressure of the social group, another tool of control or could we say of self-control or mental self-regulation of the people.

Everyone once had the experience of arriving at work the morning after the television broadcast of an "important" football match. You will find that you are somehow marginalized if you have not watched the game because you will not be able to participate in the lively exchanges between colleagues on the subject... And if you don't even have a television, then you will very quickly be labeled as "out of the lot", a marginal individual or even "sectarian". Not following the football championship can still move to the social level, but as soon as you display an opinion contrary to the mainstream in health for example, such as the question of vaccines or diet, you very quickly come up against the "Single Thought" that shapes and directs the masses. In 2015, a glaring example was the "I Am Charlie" movement, stigmatizing individuals who refused to adopt this slogan. This single thought leads the individual to conform to the group for fear of rejection. Reactions can indeed be very violent when a person feels destabilized by the achievements that have shaped his reality. It can then play a role of guardian of the single thought by attacking the black sheep. Peer pressure, of varying intensity depending on the country, culture, religion, political regime, is exerted on each of us by family, neighbors, colleagues, friends. It is a natural human function that makes that "sheep keep sheep", the individual unconsciously self-discipline to follow the imposed social model, so the people limit themselves and self-censor themselves through social pressure. This pressure allows the establishment of rules underlying the entire community and thus compartmentalizing thought within a well-defined framework. This is another important factor in mental control of the masses.

dominant in terms of health for example, such as the question of vaccines or the mode of diet, you very quickly come up against the "Single Thought" that shapes and directs the masses. In 2015, a glaring example was the "I Am Charlie" movement, stigmatizing individuals who refused to adopt this slogan. This single thought leads the individual to conform to the group for fear of rejection. Reactions can indeed be very violent when a person feels destabilized by the achievements that have shaped his reality. It can then play a role of guardian of the single thought by attacking the black sheep. Peer pressure, of varying intensity depending on the country, culture, religion, political regime, is exerted on each of us by family, neighbors, colleagues, friends. It is a natural human function that makes that "sheep keep sheep", the individual unconsciously self-discipline to follow the imposed social model, so the people limit themselves and self-censor themselves through social pressure. This pressure allows the establishment of rules underlying the entire community and thus compartmentalizing thought within a well-defined framework. This is another important factor in mental control of the masses.

"I would say that in 50 years, if a large number of people do not consciously become resistant to the mental control that is exercised over society, we will see more and more people who will look like androids. People induce this themselves by looking at the world and saying to themselves: It's too dangerous for me to tell the truth, to actually say what I believe or to express what I feel. It's much simpler if I make myself a false personality that will keep me passive. That's how it works..'' John Rappoport - State of Mind (Infowar)

It is fear that is at the root of this self-control of the people, the fear of rejection, exclusion, failure and sometimes even the fear of physical violence and imprisonment. Social pressure works very well to stop people from talking about certain things around them. Especially when it comes to sensitive topics such as network paedo-crime, this is an unusual topic for most people because it is completely absent from the official media sphere. Their defense will often be to close to the subject because it will quickly scratch their paradigm. Some will use irony and derision as a diversion and as a kind of self-protection in the face of the unimaginable, to very quickly change the subject of conversation. the denial is massive. People who are interested in it are somehow marginalized, the social pressure exacerbated by the propaganda (or silence) of the media has passed through.

You will note that we are talking about television programmes and school programmes. All this is just large-scale mental programming, but at that level, it does not yet take away your free will.

This pressure from the social group also plays an important role in the school and education system. For an average of 17 years[12],the individual will work most of his time within a class, a group, in which he will receive programs to integrate perfectly if he wants to access the higher levels. If the individual is not in line with the group or unable to integrate and agree with the content of the programmes or the methods of learning, then he will be excluded from this machine that builds and formats future workers. The formatting and indoctrination of young people is, of course, the basis for being able to control a society, and the school and university system plays its role in the same way as television, film and music. The line between education and propaganda is very thin or non-existent, and propaganda cannot function effectively without educational programmes and information control. The shaping of the minds of children, adolescents and young adults who will build the society of tomorrow is the breeding ground in which the single thought that leads to this permanent social pressure takes root. It is a cement that is difficult to erode in an adult who refuses to question his achievements and his paradigm.

d/ Food, water and vaccines

General de Gaulle said that the French are calves, the whole of France is a country of calves. Would the daily consumption of cow's milk have any connection with our condition as human beings reduced to the status of a 'cash cow'? A simple reflection that may give rise to a smile, but which when we are interested in the effects of what we inginge on our brain, suggests that the psychological and emotional state of a society depends largely on what it consumes in the morning at noon and Evening...

Food has a great influence on humans. His nervous system, mind and emotions are partly influenced by the type of food he eats. The control of masses involves a whole range of chemicals introduced into our bodies through food, water, vaccinations and the atmosphere. This chemistry acts through a weakening of the nervous system and mental capacities, not to mention endocrine disruption and damage to the genetic heritage. We will not enter here into the (polemical) question of alternative diets whose followers extoll the benefits of their different schools. Instead, we're going to focus on the chemicals that interact with our brains through what we ingurgitate, but also through what we're injected from birth or sprayed above our heads.

In the documentary "Sweet Remedy" (2006), neurologist Russell Blaylock stated that there really was a "chemical dumbing of society":

"Because of these different toxins that affect brain functions in a notorious way, we see a society that produces, not only the growth of a population with lower and lower IQ, but also a decrease in the population with high IQ. In other words: A chemical dumbing down of society. Thus everyone becomes mediocre, which reduces the population to becoming dependent on the government because it can no longer be intellectually efficient. There are these people with the lowest IQ who are completely dependent, we have this massive population that is going to believe everything they're told because they can't really think clearly. Then there is a minority of people with high IQ, with good brain functions, able to understand all this, and that's what they want! You can thus understand the reasons that drive them to insistently spend hundreds of billions of dollars on advertising: the goal is to de-abrate the population. "

Let's start with fluoride, recommended by experts three times a day in tooth brushing, lozenges for children and massive dilution in drinking water for everyone! Fluoridation of drinking water supplies is something common, but what is much less known is that fluoride has some impact on people's brains. Fluoride is a major repressive of intellectual functions. Independent studies show that fluoride causes various mental disorders, it makes people stupid, docile and servile, in addition to decreasing longevity and damaging bone structure. The first use of fluoride in drinking water dates back to the Nazi concentration camps. The pharmaceutical company I.G. Farben supplied the fluorine at the time. The Nazis obviously did not use this product to improve the dental health of their prisoners, of course not, this massive medication of fluorine water reserves was used to sterilize prisoners and to abrunt them to ensure their docility. The chemist Charles Perkins was one of the first to denounce the harmful effects of fluoridation of drinking water in an essay he published in 1952. He states that repeated doses of fluoride, even in infinitesimal quantities, reduce an individual's ability to resist domination, by slowly poisoning, by narcotry, a specific part of his brain. This thus subjects him to the will of those who want to govern him... Nothing less! He even states that fluoride is a "light and convenient lobotomy" and that the real reason behind water fluoridation has nothing to do with children's dental health[13]. The fluoride issue does indeed seem to be a big issue, but it is not the only one.

Drinking water intended for the population receives several additives during its treatment process, in addition to fluoride, we can also mention aluminum, involved in serious neurological disorders, such as Alzheimer's. See about it
Sophie Le Gall's excellent investigation entitled ''Du poison dans l'eau du robinet'' (France 3, 2013) explicitly showing the immobility of elected officials and organizations such as AFSSA (French Agency for Health and Food Safety) in the face of so-called ''potable'' water which is in fact totally poisoned in certain regions of France. We also find this aluminum in vaccinations as well as mercury which is also a poison for the nervous system. Mercury causes autism in young children, although the pharmaceutical industry is struggling to prove that there is no connection because of the huge financial stakes. Some vaccines also contain an adjuvant called polysorbate 80, a product that is used in pharmacology to allow certain drugs to pass through the blood-brain barrier. What is the exact role of such a chemical in the vaccination process? Do neurotoxic heavy metals such as aluminum and mercury in vaccines cross this blood-brain barrier?

All this accumulation of heavy metals in the body (introduced by water, vaccines, dental amalgam, food ...) will lead to the blocking of enzymes intended for the degradation of dietary proteins such as gluten or casein, resulting in chronic poisoning of the body. Indeed, when the proteins of cereals and milk are not completely degraded, they pass through the intestinal wall and end up in the blood system. These "opiate peptides" will behave in the body like certain morphine and attach to the biochemical receptors specific to these substances. In her book entitled "Gluten-free food or dairy products", Marion Kaplan explains that by occupying and saturating opiate receptors, peptides from gluten (contained in cereals such as wheat, oats, rye and barley) and casein (contained in cow's milk) will lead to disorders of behavior and promote the development of certain "diseases". These behavioural disorders caused by the partial degradation of gluten and casein have been highlighted in several medical publications, notably by Professor Reichelt and the Paediatric Research Institute of the University of Oslo. Reichelt is a pioneer in the search for opioid peptides that he discovered in 1981 in the urine of hyperactive children, autistics and schizophrenics. Between 1986 and 1991, he noticed very clear improvements and even cures following the elimination of gluten and casein from the diet of his patients. Gluten and casein poisoning is the cause of a range of behavioural disorders, from hyperactivity to autism, personality disorders and epilepsy. Opioid substances that saturate the brain have the effect of inhibiting social ties. Indifference, withdrawal and lack of language are major consequences. At the same time, these harmful peptides that clutter the body disrupt the management of serotonin. Sometimes there is too much serotonin, and sometimes too little. This leads to excessive information transmitted by the senses, insomnia, impulsive reactions,etc.[14].

Today, you only have to read the labels on the packaging of industrial food to see that gluten and casein are systematically added to prepared dishes, desserts, sauces, soups, etc. This with the constant increase in the presence of chemical additives of all kinds in industrial food that is already denatured, polluted, or even genetically modified. So let us not be surprised to see more and more children developing behavioural disorders, known as hyperactivity, minimal brain dysfunction or psycho-organic syndrome. These disorders have repercussions on academic performance and create a certain ill-being that prepares for various addictions. Other additives, such as citric acid, certain preservatives and synthetic dyes can trigger intolerances in predisposed subjects with a significant impact on the neurological systems that regulate gestures, movements and concentration[15].

In Australia, a study entitled "The Role of diet and children's behaviour" was conducted by J. Breakey and published in 1997 in the Journal of Pediatrics & Child Health. Research has shown that diets can affect the behaviour of some children. It has been reported that symptoms such as attention deficit, hyperactivity syndrome, sleep problems and especially mood changes can be corrected by a diet. Another Australian study, conducted by the Institute for Child Health Research, observed the electrical activity of the brain of fifteen children suffering from hyperkinetic syndrome with attention deficit induced by certain foods. During the intake of the offending foods, there was a significant increase in beta brain activity in the frontotemporal region of the brain. This 1997 investigation, which was the first of its kind, clearly demonstrated an association between brain electrical activity and the ingestion of certain foods in children with ADHD (attention deficit hyperactivity disorder). These scientific data validate the hypothesis that in some children, food can not only influence clinical symptoms but also alter the electrical activity of the brain[16].

In an article entitled "Phosphates in food: Children pushed to the brink of madness", pediatrician Frédérique Caudal reports what he observed. After two years of office experience, he found that a diet without phostotic additives catches up in four days the condition of hyperactive children and thus avoids them the infamous "drug" named Ritalin. Phosphates are almost present in all foods containing additives. Their use is such that, for 10 years, their presence has increased by 300%! Our manufacturers do not go there with the back of the spoon when it comes to neurotoxic additives!

The issue of phosphates was raised in Germany as early as 1976 by Mrs Hafer, a pharmacist specialising in the acid-base balance of the human organism. This woman had observed and studied the behavioral abnormalities of her adopted son and had come to the conclusion that the trigger was foods rich in natural phosphates (milk, eggs, etc.) or added phosphates (phosphoric acid from colas, diphosphates from processed cheeses, cooked hams and lifting powders from lecithin cakes). Mrs Hafer's work has had a great echo in German-speaking countries[17].

Now let's move on to sodium glutamate or E621. It is a particularly vicious and widespread flavor enhancer in industrial food. It is present in all kinds of additives such as sodium caseinate, yeast extract or the famous "natural aroma"... Glutamate is an excitotoxin, i.e. a toxic product for the consumer's nervous system. This food additive creates mood disorders, mental confusion, anxiety attacks and behavioral disorders, especially in children.

In 1991, the American television program 60 Minutes broadcast a report on the dangers of sodium glutamate. In this documentary, Dr. John Olney, a professor of neuropathology and psychiatry, says he is convinced that people are at risk by consuming this additive that damages the nervous system, especially babies and children. It was

Dr. Olney's research pointing to the likely danger to infants that removed glutamate from baby food in the 70s. But today Olney is still worried about the millions of children who are exposed to this product present in their favorite foods: fast food and snacks, foods that are completely uncontrolled. The report shows us the case of a ten-year-old child, Jeremy Larrows, who was diagnosed with hyperactive, which led to his failure at school. Everything was tried to help him, from chemical treatments to specialized educational programs, but nothing could help the child to cope. Everyone thought he had attention deficit disorder. For five years, Jeremy had angry and aggressive states towards his comrades, but also towards his family, so much so that he had become unhappy. He could no longer manage his own behaviour. His family took him to Dr. Schwartz who immediately ordered the total removal of glutamate from his diet. Very quickly there were radical changes, his hyperactivity disappeared, his grades improved considerably, as well as his relationships with his friends and family. His mother told reporters: "We had lost him for five years, now we find him, and he is a beautiful and brilliant child. It has been a long and difficult search..."

In the same family of excitotoxins, just as vicious and widespread as sodium glutamate, is aspartame (E951), a neurotoxic sweetener found in more than 6,000 foods! This neurotoxic has the sad ability to destroy neurons. In 1971 Dr. John Olney, who had already demonstrated the dangerousness of sodium glutamate, managed to prove that aspartic acid (which makes up 40% aspartame) literally causes holes in the brains of young mice. Despite this, aspartame is still authorised as a food additive and is even used in some pharmaceutical products. Aspartic acid accumulates in our organism, affects our brain, it also crosses the placenta to reach the brain of the fetus[18].

Despite the evidence regarding the toxicity of this product, it remains present in your supermarkets. especially at the level of the crates, in pretty little boxes of all colors attracting your children. Regularly, "expert opinions" (such as the European Food Safety Authority) confirm in headlines in our media that aspartame does not present any danger to us, even highlighting its usefulness! Why does such an information war with great "expertise" attempts to systematically confirm the safety of these neurotoxic additives? It's up to you to answer them...

e/ Social engineering: "Shock Strategy", Tavistock Institute

''If terror can be induced on a basis widely dispersed in a society, then society returns to a 'tabula rasa', a white slate, a situation where control can easily be established.'' - Kurt Lewin, German psychiatrist, director of the Tavistock Institute in the 30s.

Lewin argued that by creating controlled chaos, the population could be brought to a point where they would voluntarily submit to greater control.

The "strategy of shock", a term popularized by Naomi Klein with her book entitled "The Strategy of Shock: the rise of a capitalism of disaster" (2007) is inspired by brainwashing techniques that aim to destroy the memory of the subject, to break his capacity for resistance in order to obtain a blank page on which a new personality can be printed. These techniques can be applied on the scale of an entire population by causing a 'tabula rasa' (clean slate, white slate), i.e. by destroying a country's heritage as well as its social and economic structures in order to be able to build a new society, a new order after the planned and controlled chaos. Once the people are deprived of their landmarks, put in a state of shock and infantilized, they find themselves defenceless and easily manipulated and despoilable. This process can be applied following a serious economic or political crisis, an environmental disaster or an attack or a war. But it can also be applied gradually, over the long term.

The Tavistock Institute is a key point in terms of founding projects of global mind control, social engineering or more precisely here of "organized social chaos". This complex organization has managed to totally change the paradigm of our modern society... According to its official website, the Tavistock Institute is a non-profit organisation formed in England in 1947. The institute describes itself as focused on the application of social sciences in several professional fields, at the governmental, industrial and commercial levels, but also in the field of health and education. This organization writes and publishes the monthly newspaper "Human Relations". Its clients range from large multinational companies to small community groups, both nationally and internationally. The Tavistock Institute is one of the most mysterious and influential groups of the last fifty years, but it is very little known. Several elements make it an extraordinary institute, even making it unique: it is independent because it is entirely self-financed, it has no government subsidy; his field of activity places him straddling the academic world and the world of consulting; and his areas of research include anthropology, economics, behaviorism (behaviorism), political science, psychoanalysis, psychology and sociology.

This institute began its activities with the creation of the "Tavistock Clinic" which was founded in London in 1920. It was a psychiatric institute at the time. It was Herbrand Arthur Russel, Duke of Bedford and Marquess of Tavistock, who decided to assign a building in downtown London to a group of doctors composed mainly of psychologists so that they could develop their research. The institute began with the study of traumatic psychoses and the "threshold of rupture" on survivors of the First World War. We call "threshold of rupture" the moment when the psyche of the soldier breaks under the effect of trauma, it is a kind of psychic tipping in the face of intolerable stress. The aim of this research was to apply the results of these studies on survivors of war directly to civilian populations. The project was overseen by the British Army's Office for Psychological Warfare under the direction of psychiatrist John Rawling Rees, who later became co-founder of the World Federation of Mental Health. In 1940, Rees defined the objectives of this psychological war as follows: "Since the last World War, we have worked hard to infiltrate the various social organizations throughout the country (...) We have launched a particularly effective offensive in many professions. The two easiest were teaching and the Church while the two most difficult were law and medicine. Anyone whose memory goes back even a dozen years will realize how important change is in the minds of professionals (...) If we want to infiltrate other social and professional activities, I think we must imitate totalitarian regimes and set up a fifth-column type of activity (...) Parliament, the press and other publications are the surest means of disseminating our propaganda (...) We must aim to infiltrate every educational activity of national life[19]."

In 1932, the direction of the Institute was handed over to the German psychiatrist Kurt Lewin, founder of the National Training Laboratories (NTL, Harvard's clinical psychology research center, established in 1947) specializing in the study of human behavior and behavioral psychology. Lewin is known for his work on manipulating mass behavior, i.e. large-scale brainwashing. Much of his research for the Tavistock consisted of developing the brainwashing of the masses by implementing the traumatic processes of repeated torture for individual mind control over society as a whole. It is Lewin who is at the origin of the theory "tabula rasa" according to which the terror induced on a large scale in a society will lead to a kind of state of daze in that same society, a situation where "control can easily be obtained from an external point[20]."

For Lewin, society must be "infantilized", according to him it is necessary to develop an immature state of mind in the population in order to control it as well as possible. He called this controlled social chaos "fluidity." In 1963, the head of the directors of the Tavistock Institute, Eric Trist, said exactly the same thing about the control of the company: "The administration of a series of successive traumatic shocks on a company has the effect of destabilizing it and creating permanent conditions of social turbulence...". which will serve to generate a new society, a new paradigm of society, an opportunity to shape a new face to this planet. For this to happen, "social psychiatry" had to be developed and applied on a large scale[21]. [22]

Dr. William Sargant, another Tavistock researcher, wrote in his 1957 book "Battle for the Mind: A Physiology of Conversion and Brain-Washing": "Various types of belief can be implanted after brain function has been sufficiently disturbed by the deliberate induction of fear, anger, or excitement."

Traumatizing to reprogram is the standard modus operandi of Tavistock. Here we find the protocol of individual mental programming based on trauma. It is a question of erasing the original personality of the subject by a succession of traumas, to then install a new programmed personality, a new Order. Ordo Ab Chao, order is born of chaos, the motto of Freemasonry. Or "Dissolve" the elements and then "Coagulate", the great mystery of the alchemists... formulas that seem to apply well in the field of mind control, both individually and collectively.

The Tavistock Institute became the center of psychiatric research par excellence and changed its name in 1947 to the "Tavistock Institute for Human Relations". He then continued his work on strategy and psychological warfare for the OSS and then for his successor, the CIA. This organization has a powerful network of influence helping it to infiltrate and permeate the various sectors of the materialistic society in which we live. This network includes generous patrons who allow the institute to endure and act effectively. Patrons such as the British Home Office, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Ford Foundation, the Carnegie Institute, etc. Tavistock is also closely linked to many think tanks (sorts of think tanks) and other globalist organizations such as the WHO (World Health Organization), the World Federation of Mental Health, UNESCO and the Rand Corporation^.

The Rockefeller family has always had an important role in the advancement of the Tavistock. In his book "Mind Control, world Control", Jim Keith reports the statements of an official columnist of the Tavistock group: "The Rockefeller Foundation, before subsidizing us, needed to be reassured, not only about our policy... but also with the people who work there. "

In a financing document of the group, it is indicated some objectives of the Tavistock[24]:

a/ The invention of 'psychiatric control' as a medico-social role leading to the recognition and recognition of problems in the field of human relations and their management."

b/ The invention of 'social psychiatry' as a political science for intervening in the prevention of problems on a large scale.

c/ The establishment of a series of military institutions that will concretely implement the recommended policies.

d/ The invention of new types of therapeutic communities.

e/ The invention of 'cultural psychiatry'.

The Tavistock Institute was the first of its kind and it has seen the birth of hundreds of other similar centers such as SRI, Cornell ILR, Hudson Institute, National Training Laboratories, Walden Research, Stanford Research Institute and many others that have been created around the world according to the Tavistock model. Ten major institutions are directly under its control, with four hundred subsidiaries and no less than three thousand diverse groups and think tanks specializing in behavioral organization, political science, psychoanalysis, psychology and sociology. According to John Coleman, the author of ''Conspirator's Hierarchy: the Story of The Committe of 300'', Tavistock has a veritable ''invisible army'' made up of actors placed in the courts, in the police, in universities, in the media, etc. Tavistock chooses the artists we watch, trains and introduces into society the experts we listen to and the politicians we elect...

Tavistock would have trained world leaders to be able to use them from strategic positions all around the globe. This was the case for Henry Kissinger, a German refugee and former student of John R. Reese, he is one of the most important leaders who has passed through the Tavistock. Following his training, Kissinger was quickly propelled to high positions of political and strategic power and he is still today a man of great influence. Another example is Jimmy Carter.

In the 70s, the future president of the United States was suspected of being a "zombie who had been brainwashed like a Clockwork Orange". In July 1976, Lyndon Larouche's newspaper New Solidarity International Press Service (No. 27) published an article entitled ''Did Jimmy Carter undergo brainwashing?'' - ''There are many indications that Carter's ''Tavistockian'' smile and his pseudo-religion are the direct result of a behavioral modification program carried out by his ''close friend'', psychiatrist Peter Bourne, and by his sister Ruth Carter Stapleton... Carter has a history marked by psychological instability making him a subject highly likely to be programmed to make him completely submissive during a presidential election. In 1966, shortly after his defeat in an election in Georgia, Carter fell into depression and said, "Life has no purpose. the slightest failure is an insurmountable disaster for me." This is not evidence of mental programming, but Carter was under the control of Dr. Peter Bourne, a psychiatrist from the Tavistock. Bourne accompanied him throughout his political rise to the point of becoming his campaign manager at the time of the presidential elections. Bourne saw in Carter the opportunity to create a Manchu Candidate (a term used in the MK-Ultra to refer to an assassin unaware of his programming). According to Bourne's own father, a Special Forces Major in the British Army who regularly conducted studies on gorillas and baboons at the Yerkes Research Centre, his son "has always been interested in how to get a President elected from a sociological and behavioural point of view. In Carter's team, he is the one who leads a real scientific presidential campaign.''

Tavistock is also behind some large-scale social movements. Let's take the example of the "counterculture" of the 60s where the Tavistock network clearly managed the dissemination and consumption of drugs, especially LSD. The discontent and protests of the youth were an open door to infuse certain ideologies with the help of drugs. This social destabilization was therefore going to be a breach to test new methods of control such as the giant festivities where LSD would be provided on a large scale. Thus young guinea pigs would eventually become agents of the new culture also known as the New-Age (spiritual project of Luciferian occultists such as Alice Bailey and Helena Blavatsky). One of those first giant festivals was held in 1967, the international Monterey Pop held in California, with over 100,000 attendees. A three-day concert that would become the model for mass festivals such as woodstock, organized two years later with the full complicity of the FBI. The Woodstock Festival was a gigantic open-air mind control operation based on LSD. Time magazine called the Woodstock gathering the "Aquarius Festival" in reference to the end of the Pisces Age and the beginning of the Aquararius Age: the New Age, or New Order (we will come back to this), which was to be put in place following the social destabilization of the 60s.

The huge media promotion of the Beatles in the United States (a group we will return to in Chapter 9) was also organized as part of this large-scale social experiment. It was not a spontaneous revolt of youth against the social system, it was the great "rock music" groups of the time that served among other things to introduce a new vocabulary and new expressions to form a new culture. Drugs, sex, rock 'n roll, protests all over the country... the new and the old world then collided head-on and all these hippies had no idea that this was part of a social plan decided and organized behind prestigious philanthropic foundations, corporations and research centers dependent on the Rockefeller Foundation among others. These puppeteers of finance and politics used pop culture to manipulate social development.

In the same way, we can also mention the rap that served to establish a liberal ideology in the United States and subsequently in Europe. The 'Tavistockian' technique was the same as for the hippie movements, i.e. Cointelpro operations (Counter Intelligence Program) consisting of a direct infiltration of the original movement to destabilize it, distort it in order to discredit it or divert it for specific purposes as was the case for example for the "Black Panther" (American revolutionary political movement). Rappers and hippies are two movements that seem totally in opposition... however, it is interesting to note that the Zulu Nation (the flagship organization of rap) adopted as its motto in 1974 "Peace, Unity, Love and Having Fun". It is a few words away from the same formula that the hippie movement proclaimed ten years earlier, "Peace and Love!" (peace and love), i.e. a libertarian philosophy chanting "make love not war". A doctrine that consists in making the revolution by the sublimation of pleasures, this by the apology of drugs and sex, no more and no less. Today, we see that industrial rap, which brews millions of dollars, continues in an increasingly virulent way to make the propaganda of an exacerbated and decadent materialism, productions propagated all the time on the major media networks. Indeed, this process of social engineering started in the 50s has not stopped and we are now seeing the consequences. John Coleman (author and former spy of MI6) wrote: "The moral, spiritual, racial, economic, cultural and intellectual bankruptcy in which we are today is not a social phenomenon that occurred by chance. Rather, it is the result of a carefully organized Tavistock program[25].

These social engineering programs aimed particularly at young people continue nowadays by the propulsion on the front of the stage of hypersexualized and globally idolized "starlets" like Lady Gaga, Beyoncé, Miley Cirus, etc., the list is long. Stars whose song lyrics and behaviors on stage become more and more deviant, if not completely dismembered. We will come back to this in Chapter 9 on the entertainment industry.

In terms of social engineering, cinema is also an essential tool in the same way as television and music broadcast in a loop on radio waves and specialized TV channels. Cinema, television and music have an effect of "alienation" by depersonalizing us. Our external as well as interior image tends to be the reflection or copy of models made by stars, actors, idols and other sex symbols... These "life" scenarios that are exposed to us all the time, from Hollywood cinema todaily "reality TV", addictive TV series and music videos, significantly influence our look, our style, our thoughts, our attitudes, our behaviors, up to our emotions and feelings. The omnipotence of the image aims to keep us in an infantilizing state and therefore more docile and manipulable.

There would also be a lot to say about some video games that are ultra violent or bathed in a deep occultism. Some productions are real alternative worlds that unlike a film that lasts an hour or two, here, the scenarios can be spread over dozens and dozens of hours during which the player is an actor of his own programming, the effect on the subconscious is therefore multiplied tenfold.

It is much easier to run a society through mind control than through physical compulsion, and there is no shortage of methods of programming the masses. The basis for controlling the population is, on the one hand, to keep it in the ignorance of the fundamental principles of the system in which it is immersed and, on the other hand, to keep it in confusion, disorganization and permanent distraction.

Professor Noam Chomsky, an American linguist and philosopher, described some strategies for manipulating the masses:

- The strategy of diversion

It is about diverting the public's attention from important issues through a continual deluge of distractions and insignificant information. This strategy prevents the mass from taking an interest in knowledge in the fields of science, economics, psychology, neurobiology, etc., essential information. The diversion of mental activities also involves low-quality curricula and learning methods that sabotage critical thinking and creativity. The school therefore keeps young people in a certain ignorance about real mathematics, real laws, real history, etc. For their part, the media carefully distance the public from real social problems.

- The arsonist's strategy or "problem-reaction-solution"

It is about creating problems to offer solutions. First of all, a situation is created in order to provoke a certain reaction from the public so that the public itself becomes a requester for the measures that we wish it to accept. For example, allowing violence to develop, organising bloody attacks and attacks, in order to ensure that the public itself is demanding laws that destroy freedom and security. In the same vein, to organise an economic crisis in order to make the reduction of social rights and the dismantling of public services accepted as a necessary evil.

- The strategy of degraded and delayed

It consists of getting an unacceptable measure, law or socio-economic conditions accepted. For this it is enough to apply it gradually, in "degraded", over ten years. The strategy of the delay is to get an unpopular decision accepted "painful but necessary", obtaining the public's agreement for an application in the future. The masses always tend to naively hope that "everything will be better tomorrow" and that the sacrifice requested can be avoided. This gives the public time to get used to the idea of change and accept it with resignation when the time comes.

- The strategy of infantilization

It consists of addressing the public as well as young children. Most advertisements aimed at the general public, particularly radio, use a speech, arguments, characters and a tone that is particularly infantilizing, even debilitating, as if the viewer were a toddler or a mentally handicapped person. The more we try to deceive the public, the more we will use an infantilizing tone. The propaganda of the "subculture" or "crass ignorance" that encourages the public to indulge in mediocrity, to find "cool" the fact of being vulgar, stupid and uneducated is particularly present in reality tv programs, programs that target a very impressionable youth. These television productions act as a program on individuals previously uprooted and without real spiritual reference points that can allow them to question what they watch and integrate every day.

Control of most of the media is obviously required for all this to work. The mental programming of individuals in key/strategic positions is necessary for the proper functioning and security of the system, weak meshes are not possible. Invisible warfare with its silent weapons does not fire missiles, it does not make noise, but undoubtedly causes physical and mental damage. As a whole, the public will find it hard to believe that they can be subjected to such a weapon, they will instinctively feel that something is wrong but they will not be able to express this feeling in a coherent and rational way. Therefore, the call for help and the collective organization of a defense against such an invisible weapon becomes very difficult.

- Electromagnetic waves / psychotronics

All our actions, thoughts and physical sensations work thanks to the bioelectricity produced by our neurons and transmitted through complex neural circuits inside our skull. An external electromagnetic wave can therefore interfere in this brain bioelectricity.

Psychotronic mind control can be applied to large populations as well as to a single individual. The development of anti-personnel electromagnetic weapons began in the mid-40s, perhaps even earlier. The first known reference is part of the American Study on Strategic Bombing (Pacific Study, Division of Military Analysis, Volume 63) which mentioned Japanese research aimed at developing a "mortal ray". The development of these technologies is linked to the research on mind control and behavior modification carried out by the American and Soviet army and intelligence services, from the beginning of the Cold War. The aim was to develop technical means capable of manipulating, modifying or controlling the consciousness and behaviour of individuals or groups of individuals. Since these experimental programmes were of military interest, they were very quickly covered by defence secrecy, both in the United States and in the USSR.

"Behavioral research" studies the fields of bioelectricity, electrical or radio stimulation of the brain, electronic destruction of memory, but also psychosurgery, hypnosis, parapsychology, telepathy, telekinesis, subliminal, remote viewing, irradiations, microwaves, ultrasound...

In 1940, scientist Walter Hess received a Nobel Prize for being able to influence the behavior of cats (suddenly making them ferocious) through electrodes implanted in their hypothalamus. As early as the early 50s, Dr. Lilly had mapped the body functions related to various areas of the brain. Thanks to electrodes, he was able to activate nerve centers related to fear, anxiety, anger or sexual functions. His research was done on monkeys. During the 50s and 60s, Dr. Jose Delgado proved that human behavior and nervous system could be totally controlled by electrical signals transmitted to the brain through tiny electrodes[26].

Influencing the human brain from a distance through electromagnetic energy was obviously the next step in this area of research. At that time, a CIA document stated: "The feasibility of remote control of the activities of several species of animals has been demonstrated (...) Specific research and evaluations will be carried out for the application of some of these techniques to humans[27].

As early as 1959, a CIA document (obtained by Harlan Girard, President of the International Commission on Electroma,General Offensive Weapons, by a request under the Freedom of Information Act in the United States.), sub-project 119 of the MK-Ultra program, already proposed "to establish a critical examination of the literature and scientific developments related to the recording, analysis and interpretation of bioelectric signals of the human organism and the a,ctivation of human behavior at a distance (...) Techniques for activating the human organism by remote electronic means. Progress has been made and the list of laboratories, researchers and resources in the Bioelectronics study is being prepared. "

In 1985, journalist Kathleen McAuliffe met José Delgado in his laboratory in Spain, where he was experimenting with electromagnetic stimulation of the brain. In an article for omni magazine, she wrote that José Delgado had shown her how he could put a monkey to sleep or make it hyperactive, or how he could calm nervous fish by using appropriately modulated microwave radiation[28].

Delgado's work was fundamental in the field of psychotronics, his experiments on humans and animals proved that the electronic stimulation of certain areas of the brain could trigger intense emotions, including rage, desire or fatigue. In his paper entitled "Intracerebral Stimulation and Observation of Tracings on Patients", Delgado observed that the "ra.dio stimulation of different points of the amygdala and hippocampus in his four patients caused various effects, including pleasant sensations, exaltation, deep concentration, intense relaxation (an essential precursor of deep hypnosis), colorful visions (hallucinations), etc.[29]."

As early as 1966, Delgado stated: "My research confirms the unpleasant conclusion that movement, emotion and behavior can be directed by electrical forces and that human beings can be controlled like robots at the push of buttons." In 1974, Delgado intervened in the U.S. Congress to declare that "we need a psychosurgery program for the control of our society. The goal is the physical control of the mind[30]. The vast majority of Delgado's work on the influence of remote perceptions and behavior by means of electromagnetic waves has remained classified and inaccessible to the public.

"Offensive Control of Behavior - USSR" is a report of the US Army (1972) presenting 500 studies on the Soviet experiment relating to electronic mind control, more precisely on the use of Super-High Frequency Electromagnetic Oscillations. Russia's directed energy weapons programme has focused on individuals, not groups. Some Soviet dissidents were the target of microwave anti-personnel weapons, but also of mental modification techniques aimed at the total submission of individual will to an external force.

In March 1967, a coordinating group for psychotronics research was set up in Prague under the chairmanship of Professor Jaroslav Stuchlik. In 1970, this group became the psychotronic research section of the Czechoslovak Scientific and Technical Society under the direction of Dr. Zdenek Rejdak. It was the latter who organized in Prague in June 1973 the first Russian symposium on psychotronic research, at the end of which an International Association for Psychotronic Research was formed, the second congress of which met in Monte Carlo in July 1975.

The programme of the Prague Symposium consisted of the following five topics:

- Erasure of the subconscious
- Development of P.E.S. (extra-sensory perceptions)
- Induction of paranormal effects in dreams
- The mechanical equivalent of neuro-psychic energy
- "Mental hygiene"'

In 2001, U.S. Congressman Dennis J. Kucinich introduced a space preservation bill in the House of Representatives (Space Preservation Act - 107th Congress 1st Session H.R. 2977 - A Bill). In section 7 of this bill, technologies that provide access to the human brain, alter health or kill were defined as "systems based on the ground, sea or space that use radiation, electromagnetic, psychotronic, sonic, laser or other energies, directed against targeted individuals or populations, for the purpose of performing information warfare, controlling the mood or mind of those people or populations."

Psychotronics mentioned in the list of Kucinich's bill is described in a book by Russian scientists Vladimir Tsygankov and Vladimir Lopatin ("Psychotronic weapons and the security of Russia"), as a weapon using radiation from "torsional fields" (scalar waves).

There are international human rights agreements that prohibit the non-consensual manipulation of human beings. On the initiative of US Senator John Glenn, discussions were opened in Congress in January 1997 (Human Reasearch Protection Act) concerning the risks of irradiation of civilian populations. Today, pulsed microwaves are present in our environment on a massive scale. Few people wonder about the functioning of this technology and they do not necessarily realize the impact and especially the potential for control and manipulation that generates this systematic establishment of a global network called "communication".

Nerve impulses from the brain are carried out through electrical signals that trigger brain chemical variations. The human brain operates in a relatively narrow band of dominant frequencies, these frequencies indicate the type of activity that takes place in the brain. There are four main groups of brain wave frequencies, which are associated with most mental activities. The first group includes beta waves (from 13 to 35 Hertz), they correspond to a normal awake state, any value greater than this frequency will be associated with stress, with states of agitation that can alter our thinking and weaken our reasoning abilities. The second group of frequencies includes alpha waves (from 7 to 13 Hertz), they correspond to a state of relaxation that allows to concentrate mentally, these waves facilitate learning. The third group, the Theta waves (from 4 to 7 Hertz) corresponds to mental imagery (imagination and waking dream), access to memory and internal mental concentration. The last group includes Delta waves (0.5 to 3 Hertz), they are ultra-slow waves that correspond to deep sleep. In general, the frequency of brain waves will be at its lowest when the individual is in a state of deep relaxation and at its highest when the person is very active or agitated[31].

Any signal external to the brain, with identical electromagnetic signals can therefore interfere with the brain's waves by influencing its frequency band. In other words, an external signal can impose its own rhythm on a person's brain: normal frequencies are then artificially altered and brain waves adapt to the new frequency band, triggering a change in brain chemistry and thus altering thoughts, emotions and physical condition. Knowing that most human brain activity takes place in frequencies between 1 and 100 Hertz and that electromagnetic waves of this type of frequency have wavelengths of hundreds or even thousands of kilometers preventing them from targeting the human brain, scientists began to experiment with pulsed microwaves. This is the type of microwave that is used in mobile telephony. There are pulsed microwave frequencies that penetrate deep enough into brain tissue to trigger neuronal activity.

Dr. Ross Adey, one of the pioneers in the study of mind control by electromagnetic waves, demonstrated that behavior and emotional states could be influenced at a distance by placing the subject in an electromagnetic field. Adey and colleagues have proven that microwaves modulated in different ways can impose one type of brain activity on different areas of the brain. Working with cats, they found that the frequency of certain brain waves that appeared during conditioned behaviors could be selectively increased. For this, it is necessary to modify the shape of the microwaves with rhythmic variations in amplitude, equivalent to EEG frequencies (electroencephalogram). For example, a modulation of 3 Hertz has reduced the number of Alpha waves by 10 Hertz in one place of the animal's brain and to strengthen the Beta waves of 14 Hertz in another[32]. By directing a frequency to stimulate the brain and using amplitude modulation so that the waveform mimics a desired EEG frequency, Adey was able to impose a Theta wave rate of 4.5 cps (cycle per second) on his subjects[33].

From 1965 to 1970, the Defense Advanced Projects Research Agency (DARPA), with more than 70 to 80% military funding, launched Operation Pandora to study the effects on health and psyche of low-intensity microwaves. This project conducted studies that demonstrated how to cause heart attacks, leaks in the brain barrierorauditory hallucinations. Despite attempts to cover up the Pandora project, the FOIA (Freedom of Information Act) archives revealed a note from Richard Cesaro, then darpa's director, confirming that the program's original goal was to "discover whether a precisely controlled microwave signal could control the mind." Cesaro encouraged the carrying out of these studies "in order to develop potential applications in the field of armaments[34]." Although a large number of projects revolved around the use of narcotics and hallucinogens, the Artichoke, Pandora and Chatter projects clearly demonstrated that 'psycho-electronic' devices were of the highest priority. From 1963 onwards, research on the control of behaviour therefore focused on electronics.

In September 1977, the director of the MK-Ultra project, Dr. Sydney Gottlieb, testified before the U.S. Senate. When Asked by Senator Richard Schweicker about sub-projects of the MK-Ultra that could be related to hypnosis, or more precisely to intracerebral radio-hypnotic control (a combination between wave transmission and hypnosis), Gottlieb replied to the Senator: "There was a lot of interest in the effects observed on subjects that are in a wavefield and it is likely that among the countless sub-projects, someone tried to verify that it was possible to hypnotize a person when he is in a wave beam[35]."

In 1974, J. F. Schapitz conducted a study to demonstrate that "the words spoken by a hypnotist can be transmitted thanks to electromagnetic energy modulated directly into the subconscious parts of the human brain, that is to say without using any technical device to receive them, without having to transcode the messages and without the person exposed to such influence being able to consciously control the input of information[36]." The study was unveiled as part of the Freedom of Information Act, but the results of Schapitz, funded by the Pentagon, were never made public.

In 1986, the U.S. Air Force published "Low-Intensity Conflict and Modern Technology." The document has a chapter entitled "The Electromagnetic Spectrum in Low Intensity Conflict" which was written by Captain Paul Tyler. Tyler was the director of the U.S. Navy's Electromagnetic Radiation Project from 1970 to 1977. At the beginning of this chapter, Tyler quotes from a 1982 Air Force report, entitled:
"Final report on the needs for biotechnological research for aeronautical structures for the year 2000" which states: "The data currently available make it possible to anticipate that radiation fields may present a serious and even revolutionary threat to individuals... 100 milliamps crossing the myocardium can trigger cardiac arrest and death... A radiation system could cause dizziness or death over a large area. The effectiveness of this device will depend on the shape of the wave, the intensity of the field, the amplitude of the pulsation, the repetition of the radio frequency and the frequency of the carrier."

In a less intensive way, the use of microwaves could be adapted to simply influence emotions and human behavior. Tyler also writes: "Because of the many parameters involved and the specificity of each parameter, each can be adapted for a specific effect. Having this type of flexibility provides a wide range of options for the user. This opens the door to appropriate responses for war, whether conventional or non-conventional. "

To the objection that the frequency range in which a human nervous system operates is too narrow to provide such a wide choice of reaction, Tyler writes: "There are unconfirmed reports that a change of 0.01 Hertz can make thedifference^." However, the frequencies used in public scientific experiments do not have such a degree of accuracy. Tyler mentions here military research which, if not confirmed, is covered by defense secrecy.

In 1960, Drs. Joseph Sharp and Allen Frey sought to transmit uttered words directly into the auditory cortex using pulsed microwaves similar to the sound vibrations that a speaker can send. This research gave rise to the ''Frey effect'', more commonly known as the ''microwave hearing system''. As early as 1962, Frey's device made it possible, with appropriate modulation, to induce sounds in both deaf and non-hearing people, whether they were a few centimeters or several thousand kilometers from the transmitter. In the early 70s, Sharp, who was working as part of the Pandora military project, deepened his colleague Frey's studies on the transmission of sounds directly into the brain. During his experiments at Walter Reed's Military Institute, he found a way to reproduce and transmit not only sounds in the brain, but quite understandable words. This experiment, covered by the secret-defense, was finally made public in 1975 in an article by Don R. Justesen entitled "Microwaves and Behavior" (Microwaves andBehavior[38]).

In July 1968, the United States Patent Office registered Patent No. 3,393,279 for an invention by Patrick Flanagan described as "an excitation device of the nervous system", which was no more and no less than the "Neurophone": a device for remotely transmitting sounds directly to the brain, with a natural rendering and without any brain device to implant. The invention seemed so incredible that the Patent Office did not patent it until six years later, thinking it was not serious. As soon as the patent was filed, the Defense Intelligence Agency classified this invention on the grounds of "National Security". Flanagan was banned from continuing his research.

According to the Department of Psychic Correction of the Moscow Medical Academy, acoustic psycho-correction involves the transmission of specific commands via white noise bands introduced into the human subconscious without disrupting other intellectual functions. This Department of the Moscow Medical Academy has clearly recognized the potential danger of this technology. Russian experts, including George Kotov, a former KGB general who served in a senior ministerial position, presented a report containing a list of software and hardware associated with the psychic correction program, which could be provided for the modest sum of $80,000. According to General Kotov: "Once it has become possible to probe and correct the psychological content of humans, against their will and by material means, the results can escape our control and be used in a malicious and inhumane way in order to manipulate the collective psyche."

Some Russian authors note that world opinion is not prepared to deal adequately with the problems caused by the possibility of direct access to the human psyche. Therefore, these Russian authors proposed a two-sided center for these psycho-electronic technologies through which Americans and Russians could monitor and restrict these emerging technologies. Dr. Igor Smirnov, a Russian expert on non-lethal weapons, was invited to the United States in 1993 for a series of meetings on the subject of psycho-electronics. At these meetings, representatives of the CIA, DIA, FBI and DARPA were present, but also civilians including representatives of the National Institute of Mental Health as well as officials of biomedical research. As we have seen above, Igor Smirnov is at the origin of a technology capable of subliminally inserting thoughts into the minds of individuals. A firm called Psychotechnologies Incorporated (Psi-Tech), based in Richmond, Virginia, has obtained an agreement with the Russians to share and develop this technology for use in America. Dr. Smirnov died of a heart attack in 2005 and his patent is now held exclusively by Psi-Tech. Note that Psi-Tech is controlled by Colonel John B. Alexander, NASA General Michael Aquino (member of the Church of Satan and founder of the Temple of Set) and Lieutenant Colonel Albert Stubblebine, among others...

Perhaps the declassified document that best describes the capabilities of psycho-electronic weaponry is undoubtedly the article by American Colonel Timothy L. Thomas entitled "The mind has no anti-intrusion software" (1998), from which here are some excerpts:

"An entirely new arsenal of weapons, based on devices designed to project subliminal messages or to change psychological abilities and the ability to process data, could be used to neutralize individuals. These weapons aim to control or modify the psyche, or to attack the different sensory systems and data analysis systems of the human organism. In both cases, the goal is to distort or destroy the signals that normally keep the body in balance (...) The body can not only be deceived, manipulated, or misinformed but it can also be paralyzed or even destroyed – just like any other data processing system. The 'data' that the body receives from external sources - such as electromagnetic, vortex, or acoustic energy waves - or that it creates through its own chemical or electrical stimuli can be manipulated or changed exactly as the data (information) of any electronic system can be modified (...) In reality, the rules of the game (of information warfare) include the protection and access to signals, waves and pulses capable of influencing the data processing elements of systems, computers and people (...) Dr. Janet Morris, co-author of "The Warrior's Edge'', visited the Moscow Institute of Psycho-Correction several times in 1991. He was introduced to a technology that allows researchers to electronically analyze the human mind in order to influence it. They bring in subliminal commands using keywords transmitted on "white noise" or on music. By the use of infrasound, a transmission at very low frequencies, the acoustic psycho-corrective message is transmitted by bone conduction[39].''

In 1996, the Scientific Advisory Board of the US Air Force announced in a document made public: "In the first half of the 21st century, there will be an explosion of knowledge in the field of neuroscience. We will come to a clear understanding about how the human brain works, how it actually controls the various functions of the body, and how it can be manipulated (both positively and negatively). One can envisage the development of a source of electromagnetic energy that could be pulsed and concentrated to act on the human body in such a way that it would prevent voluntary muscular movements, that it would allow emotions (and therefore actions), to cause sleep, to transmit suggestions, to interfere with both short-term and long-term memory, etc. This will open the door to the development of new capabilities that can be used in armed conflicts, in situations of terrorism or hostage-taking, and in training situations[40]."

Luc Maempey of the Groupe de Recherche et d'Information sur la Paix et la Sécurité (GRIP) said ofelectronic psycho: "The abundance of available publications, and Security (GRIP) said ofelectronic psycho: "The abundance of available publications, articles in the specialized press, websites maintained by the various institutions of the Department of Defense, could give us Villusion that transparency is perfect, that the information is complete and objective. However, this is not the case Unclassified information remains very superficial and concerns only certain political aspects, doctrines, or basic technical information, while the bulk of the programmes relating to non-lethal weapons are in fact still covered by the secrecy of the "black programs" which benefit from large budgetary envelopes that are completely out of control (...) The deceptions and cover-ups used by the Department of Defense and its contractors to conceal the true nature of certain programmes have grown to such an extent that they are sometimes beyond the control of themilitary authorities themselves.[41]

What is presented in this sub-chapter are archives available on the internet, in particular in a French-language file entitled "Les Technologies Offensives de Contrôle Politique". Given the exponential evolution of technology, needless to say, research in the field of electronic psycho dating back to the70s, 80s or even 90s is largely outdated at the moment... Moreover, any declassified technology or information that leaves the army at least fifty years old, and academic research, especially in Europe, is at least one or two generations behind military advances. Already in 1952, the CIA's Moonstruck project aimed to implant electronic devices on people in order to be able to trace them remotely. A program that is now declassified. What are the technologies and objectives of the programs underway today in 2016? The lack of information and the absence of public debate on this onerous subject is on the one hand very dangerous, because a number of states have developed and are still developing weapons of this type. On the other hand, it leaves an impressive margin of manoeuvre for the use of this technology that can be used by private individuals, and one of the advantages of which is precisely discretion.

In December 2012, Jesse Ventura devoted a documentary to the issue of electromagnetic weapons and artificially induced "voices in the head". This documentary entitled "Brain Invaders" gives voice to many victims, but also to people closely linked to research on mind control. At the end of his investigation, Jesse Ventura meets Dr. Robert Duncan, a scientist who worked for the CIA. Duncan admits that he helped develop systems that allowed the government to "get into people's heads." It is a combination of several technologies aimed at obtaining a tool that allows to insert ideas and voices in the heads of Americans, he himself calls this tool 'Voice of God'. Here is the transcript of their conversation:

- Jesse Ventura: What's the negative side to what you've done?

- Robert Duncan: I've empowered the dark side with some of my work.

- JV: What do you mean by that?

- RD: Technology is neutral, it can be used as much to do good as it is to do evil. I have worked on projects for the CIA, the Department of Defense and the Department of Justice.

- JV: When you worked in these programs for the CIA and the government, what exactly did you do? And where did you work?

- RD: It's confidential information, I can't tell you about it.

- JV: It was on "voices in the head", that kind of stuff?

- RD: Yes

- JV: We met people who say they hear voices in their heads and have to sleep in Faraday cages. They do crazy things, but when they talk to us they look quite normal, they look as sane as you and I. Are they really crazy? Or is it the government that is subjecting them to certain things?

- RD: It's the government that does that to them. This is called "Voice of God".

- JV: So you know that the weapons on which you have are worked today on civilians?

- RD: Absolutely. You have to remember that the CIA has a long history when it comes to experimenting on our civilians, LSD, etc.

- JV: Sure. We are told about the MK-Ultra program of the 60s and 70s and we are told that all this has stopped, is it true?

- RD: That's wrong! The programme continued under a new name and with a new budget. It is the ultimate weapon.

- JV: Do you recognize today that there are people, citizens of this country who are being harassed by this technology?

- RD: It's worse than being harassed, the word is light... They are truly tortured.

- JV: How do they get into your head? I have heard about these GWEN towers, they would have been in operation in the past and they claim that today they are no longer useful.

- RD: With this tool, they have the ability to easily convey messages across the country in people's heads or cause them severe pain. This is part of the strategy for domination of the whole world, controlling the population from the conscious to the subconscious.

- JV: Who are the controllers? Is it the President? The Federal Reserve?

- RD : Non.

- JV: So these people are at a certain level in our government, they make the decisions without being officially elected.

- RD: That's exactly it.

- JV: It makes things more difficult because they can't be removed from their jobs.

- RD: They can't be impeached and they're also hard to find. They are hiding in the dark meanders of the government.

- JV: You worked for these people, you helped them develop this technology.

- RD: I was naïve, I didn't know how these technologies were going to be assembled to create the ultimate weapon.

- JV: You don't work for them anymore?

- RD : Non...

- JV: You look me straight in the eye and you tell me that you no longer have any connection with this research, and that you are here to denounce it...

- RD: Exactly...

- JV: Are you afraid for your life?

- RD : Non.

- JV: Why?

- RD: I'm not afraid to die (...)

In his book "Project: Soûl Catcher - Secrets of Cyber and Cybemetic Warfare Revealed", Dr. Robert Duncan makes it clear that in this field, there is a 60-year gap between military technologies and civilian equipment. He writes: "The mind has no firewalls and no anti-virus software, which makes the public very vulnerable to this kind of psychotronic attacks. In a direct intrusion into the mind, the manipulation is done with synthetic telepathy, it is a bio-communication technology. Sounds and voices can be pulsed towards a target. Through religious beliefs, "the voice of God" (which is the name given to this technology) becomes a reality for those who have never heard of this technology before. Others will believe that they are aliens because once again, this is a technology that seems too advanced to come from this earth... "

In 1994, the first tests began in Alaska on the most powerful radar equipment in the world, the HAARP system. This equipment has the characteristic of being able to warm the ionosphere and thus make it change altitude. By manipulating this layer of our atmosphere, it is possible to use it to send electromagnetic waves to a region of the planet that we want to target. Applications of this technology range from climate change to earthquakes and influence on wireless communications. Officially, the HAARP system is designed for scientific research, but it is highly likely that it was developed for military purposes. What is the relationship between the manipulation of the ionosphere and the mental and behavioral manipulation of humans, you may ask? Nick Begich and Jeane Manning, the authors of the book "Angels Don't Play This HAARP" who have been investigating this device for more than seven years report that John Heckscher, the director of the HAARP program, said in an interview that the frequencies and energies used in this system are adjustable and that, in some applications, they would be pulsed in the band from 1 to 20 Hertz. The frequency bands are narrow and the energy levels are low but they differ from the pulsations of the Earth! [42]). Heckscher gives further details about this when he says: "The ELF and ULF waves that will be produced with HAARP in interaction with the polar electroproject, will have such low power levels compared to the surrounding noise, that it will take very sensitive integrating receivers to record them][43]!." The most important point is that of the controlled coherent signals which, as said above, are l/50th of the energy level of the Earth's natural fields but which, however, can have profound effects on brain activity. The HAARP system creates a huge coherent and adjustable electromagnetic field, which could be compared to José Delgado's EMF (electromagnetic field), except that that of HAARP does not extend to a single piece. It has the potential to cover a region the size of a large Western state, or even a hemisphere. Patrick Flanagan, the inventor of the Neurophone, said of this technology: "The HAARP project could be not only the largest 'ionospheric radiator' in the world, but also the largest brain control instrument ever designed! [44]!."

Finally, let's take a look at mobile telephony and its societal tidal wave similar to that of television... In France, the number of SMS sent rose from 1.5 billion in 2000 to more than 100 billion in 2010 (figures from the French Telecoms Federation). Never before has a technology emerged so quickly, telecommunications satellites and relay antennas have covered territories in an invasive and systematic way. Urban areas are overloaded with relay antennas that sometimes multiply in an anarchic way without the residents having their say. This means of telecommunication combines radar, radio and telephone technologies, it works thanks to pulsed microwaves at low frequencies. We are therefore financing, by purchasing telephones and subscriptions, the establishment of a gigantic network of pulsed microwave transceivers covering every square inch of the territory. Due to the nature of the waves it uses, this telecommunications network has a huge potential to influence the brain waves of populations.

A GSM transmits microwaves permanently even when it is turned off (to locate the nearest relay antenna). Most people never part with their phone and even sleep a few inches from it (addiction problem). Dr. Richard Gautier, the author of "Your mobile phone, your health: We lie to you - 100 pages to restore the truth" has listed no less than thirty-two experiments published between 1995 and 2003 showing a significant change in the EEG (electroencephalogram) of human subjects exposed for a short time (from a few minutes to a night) to-pulsed microwaves at low frequencies. This only confirms once again all the research that has been done in this area for more than fifty years. According to Dr. Richard Gautier: "A long-term experiment is currently underway on a global scale, of which we are all guinea pigs! 45]."

Mobile telephony or the art of introducing a silent weapon into every citizen's pocket? One thing is certain, and that is that we have very little perspective on this technology and yet it requires special attention, both in terms of its impact on our cells and on our brain waves. However, we note a deafening silence on the part of the French health authorities on the subject. The situation is different in Russia, where the State Commission for Protection against Non-Ionizing Radiation has drawn up a list of recommendations concerning mobile telephony:

- Children under the age of 16 should not use a mobile phone.

- Pregnant women should not use mobile phones.

- Persons suffering from the following diseases and disorders should not use a mobile phone: Troubles neurological such as neurasthenia, psychopathy, psychostenia, as well as all neuroses with asthenic, obsessive or hysterical disorders reducing mental and physical activity, memory loss(s), sleep disorders, epilepsy and epileptic syndrome, predisposition to epilepsy.

- The duration of calls should be limited to a maximum of three minutes, and after each call, the user should wait fifteen minutes before making another call. The use of earbuds and hands-free kits is strongly encouraged.

- Manufacturers and resellers of mobile phones should include in the technical specifications the following information: all the above recommendations concerning the use, all the adequate health and epidemiological data concerning mobile phones, as well as the radiation levels associated with the telephone and the name of the measurement laboratory! 45].

2 - Individual mind control

Brainwashing is about "indoctrinating so intensely and meticulously until it creates a radical transformation of psychological characteristics and beliefs." - Webster's New World Dictionary

Individual mind control is a common practice found in political, military, criminal, mafia and sectarian circles. But mind control can also be present within companies or the family structure when a narcissistic pervert harasses and manipulates an employee, spouse or child.

Some groups have always relied on coercive interrogation techniques, known as "robust", as well as on different methods of brainwashing to force the victim to submit, to extract information or to indoctrinate him. These intrusive and violent techniques are now used by certain political and military organizations, by the intelligence services and by the criminal community (pornography, prostitution networks, trafficking in human beings, arms and drugs). Brainwashing is a process of indoctrination that was used, for example, on some American prisoners during the Korean War (1950-1953). In 1951, journalist Edward Hunter reported these methods as "reform of thought". A technique developed and applied by the Communists after their takeover of China in 1949. The Chinese Communists also tried to manipulate some of their own citizens, in the same way as prisoners of war, to get them to change their beliefs and convictions. The aim is to gain acceptance and integration of a "truth" that was previously rejected and considered false. These methods use food deprivation, sleep deprivation, isolation and confinement of victims in a small space over a long period of time. The victim who is totally weakened physically and psychologically comes to believe that he or she will actually die or go crazy. The end result is that his political, religious and social convictions conform to those of the executioners who hold his life in their hands. Any group that needs to subjugate and dominate individuals uses these methods of "reform of thought". Intimidation, threats, social isolation, spiritual indoctrination, torture, deprivation of basic needs such as sleep or food, etc., are the techniques used for the submission and indoctrination of a human being.

The conditioning of the subject is an important step in individual mind control. Ivan Pavlov and Frédéric Skinner (father of radical behaviorism) are the forerunners in this field. Pavlov is known for his work on dogs; his experiments included first triggering a signal with a bell to awaken the dog's attention (the conditioning stimulus), then five seconds later, he gave him food (the unpackaged stimulus). After a while, the simple sound of the bell produced a conditioned reflex of the dog who began to salivate without there being any food in front of him. This type of conditioned reaction is called Pavlov reflex. Pavlov describes two types of reflexes: the innate reflexes that are present from birth, and the conditioned reflexes, those that one acquires through learning.

One thing that is less known is that l van Pavlov studied the effect of extreme stress for the conditioning of dogs. For this he used electroshocks! [47]). This form of extreme conditioning is the basis of mind control relying on the fear and pain of the victim to program codes and signals that trigger automatic reactions.

During the flood of Leningrad in 1924, water invaded Pavlov's laboratory, and the dogs were almost submerged, they were swimming with just their heads protruding from the water at the top of the cages, they were totally terrorized. Many of them then lost their previous conditioning. Pavlov reported that the dogs had undergone some kind of brain dissociation and were in a hypnotic state similar to some human "mental disorders". Pavlov then deduced that during a serious trauma, "the brain can undergo an erasure, at least temporarily, of all the conditioned behaviors previously implanted in it[48]."

After several months, Pavlov, who had re-conditioned most of the dogs, voluntarily let water flow into the laboratory to see their reaction. The dogs then all panicked and were re-traumatized by losing again all the conditioning that had just been "reprogrammed".

Pavlov's work and observations on dogs can be compared with the survivors' testimonies of "tabula-rasa" way mental control methods, where all previous achievements are lost, like an erased slate, and where a conditioning trigger/stimulus can reactivate the state of trauma![49]!.

To effectively subdue and manipulate an individual, one method is to apply the three Ds or DDDs, letters that mean "Debility, Dependency, Dread" Terror). Psychiatrists Farber, Harlow and Jolyon West described this protocol in their book "Brainwashing, Conditioning and DDD". According to these psychiatrists, it would therefore be necessary to debilitate the victim, make her dependent and frightened in order to break her in order to be able to dominate her...

You will notice that this protocol of individual mind control "DDD" is today applied on a large scale in social engineering programs that aim to condition society. Who could deny today that our modern world does not infantilize us, does not debilitating us all the time, does not make us dependent on everything and anything by taking away a maximum of autonomy, and does not induce a constant fear?

There is also the "PDH" method, which stands for Pain, Drug and Hypnosis, i.e. the use of pain, drugs and hypnosis to subdue and program an individual. A combination "PDH" that we find in the mental control of type Monarch (developed in chapter 7).

In the book (report) for the CIA entitled "Communist Control Technics" (1956), psychiatrists Laurence Hinkle and Harold Wolff wrote: "The man with whom the interrogator deals can be considered as a patient who has been created intentionally. The interrogator has all the advantages and opportunities that a therapist can enjoy in the face of a patient in desperate need of help."

It is a question here of creating chaos in order to bring order to it. Creating a "patient" intentionally is therefore to take a healthy subject to weaken and terrorize him, in order to "help" him as a "therapist".

This troubling correspondence between coercive interrogation and psychotherapy shows the interchangeable role that psychiatrists can have with executioners and vice versa. Psychiatric science is the nerve of mind control.

The list below contains different forms of mind control that can be applied to an individual. It combines the methods of brainwashing reported by prisoners of war with the methods used in destructive sects and government programs such as the MK-Ultra. This ranges from the 'simple' mental manipulation of the victim who is perfectly aware of it and who keeps the memory of it, to the most complex forms where the victim has no memory of the traumas and has no awareness of his mental programming. The "formula" of brainwashing is always the same: destructuring and erasing identity to replace it with a new "program". Each of these techniques can be used in isolation but they will usually be combined together in a kind of process of "death" and "rebirth". By analyzing these specific techniques of individual mind control, it is possible to detect power strategies applied in a more global and diffuse way, on a larger scale.

- The individual finds himself alone among a group or community that will not cease to profess particular beliefs and doctrines, while at the same time the individual is gradually isolated from his family and his external activities.

- The shrinking of the world. The victim is confiscated all his personal belongings, as it symbolizes his past life and can be a source of moral strength. It is about cutting the victim off from what connects him to the world and to others in order to sabotage his abilities of resistance and perseverance. The feeling of this separation must be intensified by all means, so that the victim convinces himself that he is cut off from any relationship that can help him. It is also created a dummy and miniature world around the victim, serving as a formwork to work on his psyche. It is a question of substituting the world of interrogation for the outside world, the world of the outside then fades to the standards of a micro-world, a closed door in head to head between four walls. In this small-scale world built by the executioners, the victim quickly convinces himself of their omnipotence.

- The destructuring of identity. The victim is told that he is what he is not and that he is not what he really is. This in order to make her lose her bearings and that she begins to question her own identity. The victim is forced to challenge beliefs that she has never questioned before. His certainties are shaken.

- Disorientation and confusion. The goal is to upset the natural expectations and conditioned reactions of the person. The individual is accustomed to a logical world, a world that has meaning and is naturally predictable, he will cling to it to preserve his identity and his capacity for resistance. Destabilization first involves the systematic disruption of time markers: doctored clocks, which advance and then delay, irregular schedules and nights with variable geometry. The executioners become masters of space and time, they unravel the natural rhythms in order to plunge the subject into a state of total disorientation. In addition to the strategy of temporal disorientation, the victim will be attacked on his logical and semantic reference points by an avalanche of absurd and incoherent questions, contradictory and far-fetched assertions, tones of voice totally inadequate with the words spoken, etc. This disorientation also involves the saturation of his interpretative capacity. Faced with the avalanche of nonsense that is flooded, the individual will stray into a kind of spiral of interpretative hypotheses as vain as they are infinite... to the point of madness. Letting the victim seek to understand something where there is nothing to understand is one of these sadistic methods.

- Guilt. Make repeated accusations against the victim to imregnate him with guilt. The individual will end up feeling that he or she has actually done something wrong and will end up being persuaded that he or she is guilty and that his or her sentence is therefore deserved. The executioners can also force the victim to commit reprehensible acts so that he finds himself in the position of guilty and therefore guilty. The victim's behaviour is shaped by the use of rewards and punishments, accompanied by other conditioning processes.

- Self-predation. Turn the individual against himself until finally making him the agent of his own defeat. It is a question of turning the subject in on itself by depriving it of the outside world and of others, by radicalizing its subjectivity in order to make it responsible for its own torments. He can then be asked as a question: "But why are you being subjected to this?". Guilt and self-predation go hand in hand.

- Betrayal and self-betrayal. Force the victim to report his friends, colleagues, entourage, family. This reinforces the feeling of guilt and shame but also the feeling of betraying one's own life. The victim is led to believe that no one in his or her family or community cares about what has become of the victim.

- Voluntary submission. The victim voluntarily submits to the executioner in exchange for compensation, which may be material goods, drugs, sex but also "affection" and "freedom". The victim may have the opportunity to choose his master.

- Submission through terror. The executioner gets a form of respect by terrorizing the victim, this can be done even if the victim still retains his own beliefs and his personality is preserved.

- The breaking point. The combined effects of strong guilt and shame cause the victim to feel alienated from himself. She begins to fear madness and total annihilation. The victim also suffered violence, degradation and public humiliation aimed at destroying his self-esteem. In addition, the deliberate unpredictability of the executioners' behaviour makes it impossible to detect their expectations and thoughts, which reinforces the victim's feeling that he really has no control.

- Brainwashing through deprivation of basic needs such as sleep, food, water, etc., combined with social isolation.

- Associate orders with pain. Directives and orders are given at the same time as torture. This is to convince the individual that this violence will recur if orders and directives are not followed. The injunctions: "You will forget", "Don't talk about it", etc., are verbalized and printed in the psyche at the same time as the pain is injected into the nervous system. It is a question of maintaining repetitive physical and psychological torture in order to install these commands deeply in the victim through the belief (usually subconscious) that there will be extremely painful consequences if she ever violates the directives. The re-experimentation of these initial tortures often involves somatic manifestations, such as slight bruising or swelling at the level of the initial lesions.

- Clemency. The inevitable annihilation is suddenly reversed by unexpected mercy from the executioners. A brief stop to the interrogations, a brief moment of appeasement where the victim will be treated as a respectable human being. Suddenly annihilation is no longer the only way out. For an individual in such a situation, this sudden psychological decompression will serve to coax him and bring him into the camp of the executioners. The individual then becomes almost grateful for the process of "reform" that is underway, he will have to participate in his own indoctrination by writing for example instructions or organizing activities.

- Stockholm syndrome. Situations of intense stress gradually lead to dependence and a certain loyalty of the victim towards his aggressor. The term "Stokholm syndrome" dates back to August 1973 when hostages were taken in a bank in Stockholm, Sweden. A 32-year-old prison escape named Jan-Erik Olsson took four bank employees hostage for five and a half days. A few days after their release, although the captives were not in a position to explain this reaction, they testified that they had shown a strange rapprochement with their kidnapper, they sought to identify with him and even came to fear the police. In some cases, victims testified outright on behalf of the hostage-taker or raised funds for his legal defence.

- Confession. The victim eventually agrees to make "confessions" in order to relieve himself of the overwhelming guilt that is made to him. Confiding, "confessing" even if there is nothing to confess, becomes an irresistible act for the individual who wants to put an end to the horrors of mental confusion, guilt and loss of identity.

- "Harmony". When the reform of the victim is well under way, his emotional needs have been respected due to his good performance, the victim can then find a certain relational life in a group, he is allowed to participate in common activities. This then causes relief, the pressure goes down and the alienation can disappear to make way for a better relationship with one's environment. The need for human relations leads the victim to inevitably get closer to his executioners.
- Rebirth and rehabilitation. In this new "harmonious" state of mind, the victim is ready to condemn and reject everything he has been in the past. Through confession, she must condemn all aspects of her previous life, see them as a long series of shameful acts in order to rebuild something on a new basis. It is a form of rebirth.
- Spiritual indoctrination. The psychologically weak or dependent victim is subjected to a charismatic leader who claims to be connected to a kind of god. He claims to have been chosen for a spiritual mission and he becomes a compass for the disoriented victim.
- Spiritual pollution. These are witchcraft rituals aimed at "tying up" evil entities to traumatized and dissociated victims (see Chapter 5). These entities will harass and participate in mind control. Pacts, spells, curses, alliances, etc., are used to pollute and make the victim bad and unhealthy, physically or psychologically ill, socially isolated, devalued and enslaved.
- 'Psychic driving'. A method comprising recorded messages that loop for hours while the victim is in a state of altered consciousness as a result of electroshock, sensory deprivation, deprivation of food, water, sleep, oxygen, confinement and other acts of torture.
- Hypnosis and trance: A trance state is a hypnotic dissociative state where memory and perceptions are impaired. Dissociation being a separation, a split between psychic/mental elements, which usually are brought together and communicate with each other (this subject will be developed in chapter 5). The effects of a trance state can be caused by certain conditions such as: mental or physical exhaustion, terror, repetitive songs, rituals or drugs. Sensitivity to trance or dissociation varies from one individual to another. Research has shown that people with a strong suggestibility for hypnosis apparently have genetic predispositions, but trauma, including childhood sexual abuse, also predisposes to a high suggestivity to hypnosis. Some trance states appear to be self-induced and function as a defense mechanism against massive pain and a violent environment. In some cases, the self-induction of a trance and a state of dissociation in the face of severe abuse may result in the creation of a multiple personality. Trance can also be induced by another person, a hypnotist. The hypnotist can make post-hypnotic suggestion to the person to perform certain specific actions or experience certain emotions or physical sensations following the hypnotic trance. These actions or emotions are usually triggered by certain discreet 'codes' that were dictated to the subject when he or she was in a trance. The mental control suffered by many victims of ritual abuse is partly due to having been put in trance states on several occasions and having received a complex series of post-hypnotic suggestions. However, hypnosis and trance also have an important role to play in the treatment of victims of ritual abuse. The use of trance in a therapeutic context often allows the victim to recover memories dissociated from consciousness. This process is a very important aspect for the recovery of victims of ritual abuse.

- Perverse manipulation of the psychic world of the victim (here usually a child). Among other things, it is a question of removing any notion of envy from the child and any inner desire. The child must systematically turn to the adult to receive authorizations in all areas of his life including his inner world. This has the consequence of destroying all the safe places that the child has been able to create inwardly in order to escape the horrors that he has suffered. This creates in him the feeling that there is no real place (internal or external) where he can be safe and that his executioners are omnipresent and know everything he thinks. At this point begins to be set up an internal system with alter (fractional personality) by which the sect will manipulate and control him throughout his life.

- Trauma-based mind control. It is a protocol based on the phenomenon of dissociation, or "fragmentation" of the personality in response to extreme and repetitive trauma. An individual's personality may be fragmented into several different identities that can take over the body in turn. An "amnesic wall" isolates each alter personality, thus preventing the victim from becoming aware of the activities of his alter. This method of mind control called Monarch programming has for symbolism the monarch butterfly which represents among other things the (sad) rebirth of the victim-caterpillar in butterfly-slave, the chrysalis representing the process of "reform" or "programming! 50! "! 5 ^. ! 52!! 53!

In an article entitled "Behind the Democracy Facades: Mind-Control and the Satanic Cuit of National Security", Dr. Hans Ulrish Gresch divided this trauma-based mind control process into three phases:

1st phase: Prepare the mind and nervous system of the victim for programming. The victim is placed in a condition of extreme vulnerability, disorientation and terror, and then is confronted with extreme physical and psychological stress. The victim's sense of self-preservation is threatened, his identity is weakened or destroyed and it regresses to the emotional and cognitive state of a child, his mind is dissociated.

2nd phase: Programming the victim as a robot or a computer, with new attitudes, behavior patterns and new frame of reference in which these attitudes and behaviors will make sense. At least two personalities are created:

- A robotic personality who is consciously in contact with the controllers and who receives the programming.
- A new artificial personality that is totally unconscious of being programmed and that is also unaware of the existence of the robot personality.

The robotic personality is a kind of automaton, while the artificial personality defines itself as a human. The robot will be programmed with repetitive indoctrination and by various means of conditioning (punishments and rewards). The robot is called "slave". The slave is the interface between the controller and the artificial personality(s).

3rd phase: Selectively erase the victim's memory. It is not really an erasure of memory in the sense of destruction, but rather it is a question of removing in the victim the ability to remember certain experiences. This amnesia concerns all experiences directly or indirectly related to the process of mind control, as well as all biographical elements that do not fit into the logic of the artificial personality, which is in fact the façade personality.

The overall goal of this process is to program the victim to become totally powerless, it is the controllers who then become all-powerful, they are like "gods! [54]!".

It is this type of complex mind control that will be deepened in the next few chapters.

The roots of traumatic ritual abuse and mind control

> ''The methods of religious initiations are often so close to modern political techniques of brainwashing and thought control that one sheds light on the mechanisms of the other.''

> ''When we look at the historical and anthropological literature, we find content related to religions, cults, fraternal organizations apparently referring to rituals traumatic with the aim of creating altered states of consciousness.

These states of consciousness have sometimes been seen as something sacred, as a magical catalyst for deep visions or possessions by gods. in in other cases, these methods would have been used to establish a kind of powerful psychological control, in an underground and secretive way, unknown by mental health professionals.''

''The mind-control techniques of these groups (according to police officers and survivors deemed credible) have been recognized as building a bridge between applied science and shamanism.

Occultism as an expression of the religious has existed for thousands of years. It is only in the last 150 years that science has aggressively searched for truths about manipulations.

these hidden belief systems contain psychological ones. The Random House Dictionnary says of occultism that it ''is the use of pseudo-sciences claiming to know supernatural intermediaries who escape knowledge develop in detail what satanic ritual abuses are in the chapter 4, but here is a dennmon that will allow a better understanding the content of this chapter: "Severe and systematic abuse of one or more children, adolescents or adults, generally perpetrated by multiple aggressors of both sexes and on one period of several years. Ritual abuse is associated with a system of belief involving the worship of Satan and involving sexual, physical, psychological, emotional, and spiritual abuse, usually of young children, often in ceremonies involving rituals, symbols, and the like "Magic" practices. The essential goal is indoctrination and mind control, which are achieved through dissociation, drug use, hypnosis, torture, humiliation, etc. In the case of Satanism transgenerational, most of these things happen "at home", with family members[55].

Ritual abuse and mind control techniques based on trauma and personality splitting are used by Many organizations around the world, These practices date back to the time of Babylon, ancient Egypt and religions in Mysteries. one calls "religions to Mysteries" cults with revelations and rites whose knowledge and practice are reserved for the few of insiders. The Egyptian Book of the Dead is one of the earliest writings referring to the use of occultism for mind manipulation. Tortures, drugs, magic, hypnosis, demonology, aimed to put the individual in a deep state of dissociation and mind control. Demonology being a branch of theology that studies demons just as angelology studies angels.

Passing initiatories are the ancient Mysteries of ''death'' and the

''rebirth'' or ''resurrection'', a secret and sacred procedure that involved powerful alterations of consciousness. These cults were particularly present in the Mediterranean basin, we can mention for example the Babylonian ceremonies of Inanna and Tammuz, The Egyptian Mysteries of Isis and Osiris, the cult of Orphic, the cult of Bacchus, the Mysteries of Eleusis, Mithras, the Corybantic rituals or the Mysteries of Attis and Adonis. The rituals of the Mysteries took place without interruption for a very long time, the unveiling of the initiatory secrets of these cults was punished by death.

Éliphas Lévi (French ecclesiastic and occultist born Alphonse-Louis Constant) describes certain initiatory rituals allowing access to the Mysteries: "The great trials of Memphis and Eleusis were intended to form kings and priests, entrusting science to brave and strong men. In order to be admitted to these trials, it was necessary to surrender body and soul to the priesthood and to abandon one's life. We then descended into dark underground where it had to cross in turn lit pyres, currents of deep and fast water, mobile bridges thrown on abysses, and this without leaving turn off and escape a lamp that was held in one's hand. He who staggered or was afraid should never see the light again; the one who crossed with fearlessness all the obstacles was received among the mysts, that is to say, he was introduced to the little mysteries. But it remained to test his fidelity and silence, and it was only after several years that he became epopte, title that corresponds to that of adept (...) It is not in the books of philosophers, it is in the religious symbolism of the ancients that we must look for the traces of science and find its mysteries (...) All true initiates have recognized the immense usefulness of work and pain. The pain, said a German poet, is the dog of this unknown shepherd who leads the herd of men. Learning to suffer, learning to to die is the gymnastics of Eternity, it is the immortal novitiate[56].

Initiation rituals of traumatic type aim to transcend the conscience. In her book entitled "A Course of Severe and Arduous Trials" Lynn Brunet explains that the trials of the ancient mysterian cults were aimed at producing altered states of consciousness, a mystical experience with a state of ecstasy and union with the divine. The methods involved the exploitation of pain, fear, humiliation and exhaustion.

These techniques seem to have emerged in war cultures, where when exposed to extreme violence and fear of imminent death, a warrior could experience this state of bliss with a feeling of immortality (...) This relationship between the feeling of terror and the feeling of living a "sublime" experience has become one of the key themes of philosophical enlightenment (...) Immanuel Kant and Edmund Burke are two Freemasons who studied this subject. Kant stated that the experience of the Sublime, induced through the feeling of being overwhelmed by terror, is a situation in which the individual can no longer grasp what is happening. In a similar way, Burke stated that terror has the ability to provoke reactions that put the individual in a particular state, "that state of mind in which everything is suspended", thus producing "the effect of the Sublime at its highest level" (...) "to make things terrifying", he says, "darkness usually seems to be necessary" (...) In druidic initiation, candidates are locked in caves, they have to crawl in long ones tunnels or are enclosed in chests or coffins hanging several days to come out "born again". These practices initiatory were known as the ''mystical fire'', and the output of these torture trials were sometimes expressed with the term "flamboying of light" (...) As Ross Nichols notes, the Druid magicians "plunged or cooked the child in the mystical fire", a euphemism meaning that in-pre-Christian times, the child was sometimes subjected to these initiation tests[57].''

In 1756, Edmund Burke spoke of the "Sublime": "Whatever may cause the feeling of pain or danger in the mind, it produces the strongest emotion that the human mind is able to feel. When the danger and pain become too intense, it becomes totally terrifying and therefore a priori incapable of causing pleasure, however, with some hindsight, we observe that such things are delicious[58].''

Immanuel Kant described the "Sublime" as the encounter between the "Me" and what has the possibility of annihilating it totally, that is to say the trauma that can destroy the will and disarticulate the personality. Here is for example how Glenn Gray describes the altered states of consciousness of soldiers on the battlefields: "In danger of death, many soldiers enter a dazed state where clarity of mind has completely disappeared. In this state, they can be caught in the fire of collective ecstasy to the point of forgetting its death due to their loss of individuality, they can also function as the military organization to do all that is expected of them because they then become automatons[59]."

This modified state of consciousness in the face of terror and/or extreme pain, which some called the "Sublime" in the 18th century, this "flamboyance of light" or this "enlightenment", is what is called today dissociation, an essential point to which we will return throughout the book. Unbundling being the foundation on which is implanted the programming of the MK-Monarch slaves.

In his book Religion: An Anthropological View,

Anthony Wallace describes a learning process ritual that essentially works with what he calls the "law of dissociation". He writes that these practices aimed at inducing an ecstatic spiritual state by directly manipulating and crudely the physiological functioning of humans are found in all religious systems (ancient and primitive). Wallace classifies these manipulations into four broad categories:

- 1) Drugs
- 2) Sensory deprivation and mortification of the flesh by pain
- 3) Sleep deprivation leading to fatigue - 4) Deprivation of food, water or oxygen In his 1966 book, Wallace indirectly describes, on an anthropological basis, the origins of satanic ritual abuse and mind control. It describes how the neophyte is put in a a state in which he finds himself radically dissociated from all his past knowledge in order to receive new information. Indeed, cognitive and affective restructuring (programming) is facilitated during these dissociative states where the suggestibility of the subject is multiplied. Wallace writes: "The effectiveness of these procedures in inducing physiological changes has even been demonstrated in a non-religious setting, notably in clinical experiments on the effects of sensory deprivation and the various techniques of 'brainwashing' or 'reform of the thought''... These include the MK-Ultra program that will be featured in the next chapter.

Anthony Wallace speaks of an "ecstatic spiritual state" driven by certain rituals, an ecstasy caused by a deep dissociative state. The word "ecstasy" which comes from the Greek "ekstasis" means "exit from the body", this dissociative "illumination" during traumas is indeed considered by some as ecstatic, that is to say a state of consciousness where past, present and future are transcended and unified. Some extreme traumatic rituals go so far as to provoke what is called an NDE (Near Death Experience), a near-death experience in which our space-time is transcended. Rape victims often report this phenomenon of extreme dissociation where they feel out of their body physical during the drama, we will return to it in chapter 6.

In the book ''The Ancient Greek World'', the historian and archaeologist Marie-Claire Amouretti writes: ''The Mysteries of Eleusis bring to the initiate a communication with the great goddesses of the earth

Demean and Korah, and with their parhedron Pluto. Most likely, we also receive a viatic for the afterlife. Initiation takes place in three stages:

the little mysteries of Agraï, in spring, the great Mysteries in September-October, where the final stage is reached only in the second year; from the 13th to the 20th Boedromion the preparations take place, from the 20th to the 23rd, the initiation. The previous ceremonies are somewhat known to us: procession, sacrifices, consumption of products of the earth, manipulation of objects perhaps sexual, mystical drama evoking hierogamy (editor's note: sexual alliance between the divine and human). But the obligation of secrecy was so well respected that we ignore the final phase or "epooptia": it seems to have caused a kind of contemplative ecstasy. The initiate has personally entered into a relationship with divinity; he received a promise of bliss. In Phaedrus, Plato evokes the "supreme bliss" achieved by the myste (initiate). We have the impression that these ceremonies prompted the participant to overcome the anguish of death by the conviction of being integrated into a chain of life, just like wheat dies and is reborn through the seed[60].

In the publication of the A.M.O.R.C. (Rose-Cross) ''Rosicrucian Digest'', we can read: ''The path that leads to knowledge is an esoteric way, as opposed to that which is exoteric, the religion of devotion. This knowledge, which is the goal of true philosophy, has a double purpose. First of all, there is the teaching of techniques and techniques.

practices to overcome human limitations, such as the trauma of death. Secondly there is the study of the cosmic order and the work in sound breast. When these two aspects meet, we get a form hermeticism[61]. ''

The ancient Greeks were well aware of the effects of a deep physiological stress to modify in an individual the perceptions of the world.

Priests of ancient Greece used traumatic rituals for "cure"' some sick people. For this they made them go down in the cave of Trophonios... The person was prepared for this rite by fasting, lustration (water purification ceremony) and sleep deprivation. Then she was taken down into the underground to leave her alone in complete darkness. The intoxicating gases that exhaled in this cave, or possibly the lack of oxygen, were not long in coming.

act on the person by provoking terrible dreams as well as visions.

It was then that we came to rescue her just in time and take her out of the cave to bring her back to the light and the great outdoors. These kinds of hardships caused a real trauma that was supposed to heal the patient. Psychiatrist William Sargant does not hesitate to use the term "brainwashing" to describe the rituals of the oracle of Trophonios, during which the subject therefore experienced sensory deprivation, the visual and auditory confusion techniques as well as taking Psychotropic. Just as we will see a psychiatrist today when we need advice or treatment, the ancient Greeks consulted the oracles for the same purpose. Before going to see the oracle, the first person had to experience sleep deprivation, singing repetitive, taking drugs and finally venturing alone into deep and dark caverns. This long and exhausting struggle, which could last several days, put her in a state of extreme physiological stress.

Then, when the oracle revealed certain things to him, the person could understand their meaning thanks to this altered state of consciousness that gave him another vision of the world. We find the same kind of initiation in the

Amerindians, with sleep and food deprivation, isolation and extreme conditions aimed at attaining a state of consciousness modified causing visions and revelations related to the spirit world.

The Mysteries cult of Eleusis used in its rituals a sacred potion called Kykeon which contained ergot from rye and was very close to the current LSD (powerful hallucinogen). In Orations XII, Dio Chrysostom writes about initiation rites employing psychotropics: "It's like there's a hand above man, Greek or barbarian, initiated in a sanctuary of a exceptional beauty and grandeur. He will have many mystical visions and he will hear many mystical voices. Darkness and light him will appear alternately and thousands of other things will happen to him[62].

Hypnosis also participates in these initiatory processes. The Ebers Papyrus, more than three thousand years old, is one of the oldest medical treatises that clearly describes the use of hypnotic processes by Egyptian soothsayers. In the Temple of Isis, the

Egyptologists have found many engravings depicting characters with obvious characteristics of hypnotic trance. the hierophants (priests) of the mysteries schools of ancient Egypt practiced a form of very advanced hypnosis in which the initiate entered into a deep trance that could go so far as to trigger what we call today an NDE (Near Death Experience), an "exit out of the body" (As we will see later in this book, some modern Luciferian groups practice traumatic rituals called "Resurrection", which plunge the victim into an experience on the borders of death). Nowadays, some hypnotists recognize that they owe much to the Asklepiade priests of ancient Greece who practiced hypnosis as a form of medicine based on the behavior modification. They called these hypnosis techniques the ''healing by dream''. A Greek engraving dating from 928 BC.C. watch Chiron put his pupil Aesculapius in a state of hypnotic trance. The oracles of Delphi among others used hypnosis, drugs and the inhalation of vapors to obtain profound alterations of conscience.

Magic, psychotropics and demonology have always been combined in religious rites. Drugs, but also deep trauma can remove the natural barrier that usually protects humans from demonic spirits, they are considered powerful tools for interact with other dimensions.

The MK-Ultra project has not invented anything about brainwashing, except to have created a scientific framework using human guinea pigs for political and military purposes. The initiation ceremonies of religions at Mysteries involved rites of passage that could be to describe real and elaborate mental conditioning programs. those Mind control protocols are still present in our modern age, it is a process to induce a profound altered state of consciousness in order to implant a new paradigm. All these things have been experimented and perfected tirelessly in order to achieve the mental control of an individual then becoming an automaton, a golem. Order through chaos... rebirth through symbolic death. These states of trance and dissociation of the mind engendered during traumatic rituals go back as far as humanity. They are found all over the world, including Haitian voodoo, African juju but also in shamanism in North and South America, from Asia, Polynesia and Europe with druidic culture. When extreme trauma alters brain chemistry, perceptions of reality are changing and the ancient occultists believed that the reaction of the victim was of a mystical or magical nature. Today, we let's call it dissociation and its Diocmmic mechanism is beginning to be well understood by traumatologists, on the other hand the energetic and spiritual mechanism is much less so... at least in the secular spheres. Paganism and Satanism have always appealed to this psycho-spiritual process called "personality dissociation" to access other dimensions of being, but this is also used as a tool of mind control and enslavement. For Dr. James Randall Noblitt, trauma-based mental programming began when men found that accidental traumas as well as certain traumatic rituals could produce altered consciousness and even create personalities totally dissociated from the original personality of the individual. In his book "Blood Secret", the Nigerian shaman Isaiah Oke calls these dissociated alters the Iko-Awo, personalities serving as slaves to the sorcerers.

This knowledge of the functions of the brain, which consist in causing the dissociation of the personality, the occultation of memories and an opening to other worlds during traumatic experiences, may have been encoded in certain mythological narratives, certain rituals or symbols, totally hermetic to the layman. This is how this knowledge initiatory have been able to cross the ages. These Mysteries of the Human Mind were and still are much studied by some secret societies.

This occult knowledge gives access to psychic powers and the spirit world. The dissociation of the psyche can therefore be considered as a kind of illumination, but it allows especially to master the techniques of mind control over others and thus to obtain a certain power. Black magic combined with mental programming based on Trauma is an initiatory knowledge that has today become a powerful tool of political and social control.

2 - "Nameless religion"

The legacy of ancient Babylon, the Sumero-Akkadian mysteries religion with its blood sacrifices and the enslavement of human beings has been transmitted through generations. Jay Parker, a survivor of satanic ritual abuse revealed that his grandparents, descendants of Luciferian lineages, had once confided to him about the Statue of Liberty that it was in fact Semiramis, the queen of Babylon, the wife of Nimrod. It was Nimrod who was the builder of the Tower of Babel, he was the first man to have wanted to establish a World Government with a Universal Religion in opposition to God. Nimrod obviously seems to be a model to follow for the elites of International Freemasonry. In "History of Freemasonry", published by the "Masonic History Company", it is written that Nimrod was honored as "Grand Mason" and that his attempt to build a "New World Order" earned him the distinction of "First Grand Master". The Freemason Albert Mackey wrote that "Legend attributes to Nimrod the creation of the Masons in the form of an organized body and he was the first to have given them a constitution or laws for a government. Masonry, according to legend, was founded in Babylon, from where it was transmitted throughout the world[63].

The tradition of ritual abuse to create slaves would come from an ancient doctrine, the ancient tradition of the Babylonian period with its cult of demons, this devotion to fallen angels, which we will call "nameless religion". In these ancient religions, evil gods were feared and had to be constantly appeased. The polytheism of the Mesopotamians, Sumerians, Assyrians, Persians and Babylonians was completely related to demonic entities. Demonism is the dynamic that hides behind the magic and spiritual powers of these primitive religions and Ancient. The many Canaatan, Egyptian, Greek and Roman gods are of the same ilk as the Babylonian gods. All the practices of magic, the quests for immortality, the sacrifices of animals and humans, etc., derive from these ancient cults to demons. In ''Mackey's Revised Encyclopedia of Freemasonry'', Albert Mackey informs us that: ''According to Warburton, every pagan god receives apart from what appears publicly and openly, a secret cult in which no one is not admitted except those which have been selected by preparatory preparations which constitute initiation. This secret cult has been called the Mysteries[64].

Today, these cults no longer have their altar in the public square, and for the laymen they exist only in books history, and again... But have they completely disappeared? The worship of demons, sacrificial blood rituals and traumatic practices

Initiatory creating deep dissociative states are they from history

Old?

There is still today a cult perpetuating this tradition, such as a "nameless religion" transmitting the Mysteries from generation to generation. Why a "religion without a name"? Because that it does not exist officially. This cult, or rather this doctrine, is not supposed to exist for the ordinary mortals of our time. One could just as well call it the "religion of a thousand faces", its multiple forms being nothing but manifestations a background strain that adapts to human times and civilizations.

A strain that externalizes itself in this or that way according to the circumstances that are available to it and that adapts to material hazards, but which remains one in what it aims at at the spiritual level.

It is a clandestine doctrine, a Transhistorical Gnosis which therefore has no precise name but which nevertheless shapes our modern society by infiltration for centuries. she marks its imprint by a symbolism that initiates like to display in the secular world, but also by an influence resulting in a decadence of more and more marked. It is a subculture that is gradually emerging and is trying to permeate the layman to become a hegemonic culture.

World. This "nameless religion" is divided into a multitude of sects and groups that do not at first glance have the same interests, but which all have in common to work more or less ardently to put in place place of a world government, a New World Order, cradle of the Antichrist.

The "nameless religion" is the cult in Lucifer, it is divided into several branches, Kabbalists, Martinists, Rosicrucians, Theosophists, Luciferians, Gnostics and Neo-Gnostics, etc. (all these schools overlapping each other)... Its true followers (i.e. those who are aware of the real issues they defend and of the war waged here on earth) are descended from transgenerational Luciferian families or are initiated and corrupted in the high lodges of secreted companies structured in a pyramidal way. All work to establish the reign of their Prince, the fallen angel Lucifer, the "civilizing" god, while the God of the Bible would be for them a "destroyer" God who must be overthrown. One of their methods is the infiltration and subversion of religions, governments and important organizations to patiently infuse it, and methodically their Luciferian doctrine.

This is accompanied by a formidable discretion thanks to the principle of the "Massa Duma", the law of silence, guaranteed by dissociative states in which many followers are "stuck". The aim is to destroy the social order (the nation, the family, religion...) and to reverse morality and traditional values to impose a new order through destruction: Ordo ab Chao, order through chaos. In our modern societies, we can now see the results of this destructive doctrine of obtaining the ''redemption through sin'' or ''holiness through evil''. These are:

a particularly unhealthy philosophy aimed at a systematic inversion of moral values where evil becomes good and good becomes evil. In his book entitled "The Militant Messiah", Arthur Mandel defines this notion of "redemption through sin" as follows: "It is nothing but the old Paulino-Gnostic idea of the felix culpa, the holy sin of the road to God through sin, the perverse desire to fight evil with evil, to get rid of sin in sinning[65].''

This scourge seems to have its roots in ancient Babylonian practices and mysteries cults. A doctrine revived by Frankism and Sabbataism, a satanic degeneration of Judaism and Kabbalah, founded by the false messiahs Sabbatai Tsevi (XVH century) and Jacob Frank (XVinth century). Sabbatao-Frankism can be considered a close ancestor of the Bavarian Enlightened (sect of the illuminati), Zionism, communism, as well as fascism. Strictly speaking, there is no Frankist or Sabbataist cult since it is a doctrine and philosophy spread by the infiltration of religions but also of Freemasonry and other secret societies working behind the scenes of governments and working behind democratic facades.

In his book Jacob Frank, the False Messiah, Charles Novak writes: "Thus, if Judaism preaches virginity, fidelity, and love, Sabbatai and his successors like Jacob Frank preach, for the young girls, sex from an early age, sexual orgies for young boys and the exchange of women during Shabbat. To the point that some Frankist children do not know their real biological father. Jacob and his followers will be surprised in the middle of Shabbat orgiastic, in January 1756, in the Town of Landskron and will be, at the request of the rabbis, expelled from the city for. A woman stood in the middle, naked, while the followers men sang the Jewish shabbtic prayer: Lekhu doidi likrass kalo (Prayer that is sung every Friday evening, to celebrate the coming of the Sabbath. Instituted by Rabbi Alkabets in the sixteenth century).

Then, they rushed to her, turning the ritual into a collective. Frankist sexual rites, thereafter, consisted of songs, ecstatic dances, mixing men and women. Frank knelt down and stared at two lit candles to a wooden bench, pushed a nail between them, and brandished the cross in all directions, exclaiming:

Forsa damus para vert, seibuml grandi asserverti (Judeo-Spanish), Give us the strength to see you, the great happiness to serve you. The lights were then extinguished, the men and women undressed and the collective began, nudity to recall Adam and Eve before the fall. Frank, on the other hand, did not participate. He remained in the middle, in contemplation mystical (...) Frankists were known for their sexual orgies collective sometimes violent. By these nihilistic behaviors, where the 9th av became a party of joy, we exchanged women, wherever we wanted became a party of joy, we exchanged women, wherever we wanted destroy all dogma: "So that the true Good God may appear", according to his own terms[66]."

Here we find the sacred orgies practiced in the ancient religions called "mysteries", such as the cult of Dionysus (Bacchus among the Romans), a phallic cult related to fertility, just like the Shivaic cult in India or Osiris in ancient Egypt with its obelisks symbolizing the phallus.

This "nameless religion", Luciferian and elitist, therefore has its roots rooted in the ancient religions in The Mysteries of Babylon and of Egypt, but also of Celtic Druidism. It has incorporated into its doctrine what it considers to be the "best" of each of these traditions, their fundamental practices. Deities like ''El'', Isis'', ''Osiris'' or ''Baal'' therefore continue today to receive a secret cult.

This "religion" has an almost undetectable tool of domination, it is the mental control based on trauma. The world's ruling elite militarily applies this science of mind related to trauma and dissociation. This phenomenon of fractionation of the personality was discovered by ancient andpre-industrial cultures, but nowadays it is an occult knowledge that serves an elite Luciferian to control not only its own members, its own progeny, but above all to dominate the whole of humanity and establish absolute rule. In a testimony broadcast on the internet in April 1999, Kim Campbell (Philippe-Eugène de Rothschild), one of the many children adulterers of Édouard Philippe de Rothschild, said:

"When I look at CNN, I can't believe seeing so many familiar faces take the spotlight in the fields of politics, arts, finance, fashion and business. I grew up with these people. I met them during rituals, as well as in the officines of power. Financiers, artists, crowned heads, and even heads of state, all are people with dissociated personalities, who work today to introduce humanity into a New World Order, where the human being occupies the highest place and where God is no more than a secondary abstraction. All these people, like me, had suffered satanic ritual abuse that had dissociated their personalities."

What are these initiations? What are these ancient Mysteries? Does their symbolism contain initiatory keys crossing the centuries? By what modern organizations do these Mysteries continue to be passed down from generation to generation?

2 - From ancient cults in Mysteries to modern secret societies

The question of the involvement of Masonic-type fraternal organizations in ritual abuse, mind control and practices

Unhealthy occults has long been something that has been controversial.

Some Freemasons authors suggest that the Masonic Order relies on an ancestry containing not only the rituals of cathedral builders, but also initiatory rites that come from various ancient cults like mysteries religions involving traumatic rituals. others Freemasons claim that there is a Black Masonry that dishonours the Masonry called "pure and authentic". some charges are regularly laid against Freemasons who are believed to be involved in mistreatment and sexual abuse of minors, the term "Masonic ritual abuse" is then used. Here are some books about testimonies that overwhelm members of the Franc-maçonnerie : “The brotherhood : The secret world of the freemasons” par Stephen Knight - “Larson’s new book of cult” par Bob Larson - “The deadly deception” par Shaw & McKenney - “Inside the brotherhood : Further secrets of the freemasons” par Martin Short

- “Ritual Abuse, what it is, why it happens, how to help” par Margaret Smith - “Terror, Trauma and The Eye In The Triangle'' by Lynn Brunet. Unfortunately, there are few or no sources in French.

In her book on ritual abuse, survivor Margaret Smith makes accusations against Freemasonry. She was the victim of a group of people who sometimes had fun with the stupidity of those who made them label as "Satanists". In its view, their point of view they are Luciferians and they see Satan as a Judeo-Christian myth or a simple metaphor. Some survivors also report that they were encouraged to attend masses

Christian christians to develop part of their personality on the "side of the light'', while another part of themselves suffered and participates in unhealthy and traumatic practices. This is Gnostic theology where this concept of "light" versus "darkness" is something essential[67]. Is this one of the reasons why our Masonry elites are pushing to founding powerful philanthropic foundations? This notion of 'light versus darkness' is commonly used by survivors of ritual abuse and mind control to describe their own inner world. The distorted Christian doctrine will often serve as a backdrop for manipulating the child. Margaret Smith and many others survivors have spoken of a certain Gnostic philosophy in the abuses they lived and they also reported the presence of Freemasons during these abuse, Masonic insignia or Masonic-type ceremonies. It is not question here to accuse globally all Freemasonry of perpetrating sadistic and violent rituals, it is likely that some masons operate without the consent of the majority of the members of the lodge. However, some things about Freemasonry can question: let's take the example of the symbol of the Order of the Eastern Star (a female Masonic organization) which is an inverted pentagram, a symbol generally used to represent the Baphomet or more generally Satanism[68].

In 2011, at a conference at the annual meetings of the group S.M.A.R.T. (Stop Mind Control and Ritual Abuse Today),

Kristin Constance testified that she had been the victim of ritual abuse and control mental practiced by his grandparents, founders and members of a lodge of the Order of the Eastern Star in Australia. She reports that the Masonic emblem of the Eastern Star was used as a support for her mental programming. (His testimony is transcribed in full in the chapter on Monarch programming)

Neil Brick, survivor of ritual abuse and founder of the group S.M.A.R.T. Said: "I think Freemasonry is one of the most large organizations responsible for satanic ritual abuses in the world. his connection goes back to the government (federal and local), as well that even some economic institutions of the country... I was born among the Freemasons[69]. "

the

sociologist Stephen Kent, who investigated the deviances of religious cults, especially on Scientology, met many people who testified that they had been subjected to Masonic-style ritual abuse, including children of Freemasons: "From the beginning of my research, people arrived with testimonies, some of which were linked with Masonic drifts. Some people claimed that their father had been

Freemason and that the abuses were related to a lodge and its members. sometimes the violence appeared to have taken place inside the lodges themselves

Masonic, but I can't say for sure. These appearances of the Freemasonry in a fairly large number of testimonials left me really perplexed[70]."

Canadian Lynn Moss-Sharman, survivor and founder of 'The Stone Angels' newspaper and spokesperson for ACHES-MC Canada (Advocacy Committee for Human Experimentation Survivors & Mind-Control), stated in an interview with Wayne Morris in 1998, that Freemasonry is a common denominator in testimonies of ritual abuse and mind control. There were conversations about it that took place at the meetings, the fear concerned this Masonic connection. I put some classified ads in the ''Globe & Mail'' on this subject as well as to announce the conferences at come. Those few words that talked about the Masonic connection generated phone calls and letters from victims from across Canada.

People who described themselves as survivors of ritual abuse

Masonic, still living in terror. They were always daughters of Freemasons of the Scottish Rite or daughters of Shriners (Masonic branch).

From across Canada, these people began to testify about memories of what could be described as experimentation on mind control. This began to manifest itself in November 1994[7i].''

in a book published in 2007, entitled "Terror, Trauma and The Eye In The Triangle"'

Lynn Brunet reveals that her father, Freemason and Rosicrucian, abused of her sexually when she was a little girl. He also confessed to the existence of of certain Masonic factions that practice traumatic ritual abuse on children. Here are some excerpts from his testimony: "As the years had passed, I made myself remembered the sexual abuse of my father when I was a child (...) I also discovered that sexual abuse and incest were woven through the history of the family over at least three generations (...) From the outside, my family seemed all that is normal, but the accumulated weight of this family history, charged with trauma and tension, was a heavy burden to bear for each generation (...) In recent years, as the puzzles of my own experience were solved, I have tried to tell them about what I remembered. Luckily for me, my mother was able to remember the night my father raped me at the age of four and therefore to validate the statements of his daughter. However, ritual abuse was going to beyond their understanding, which is understandable in many ways. In the middle in 2004, my father began to develop Alzheimer's disease. during the initial period of the troubles, in an altered state of consciousness, he began to talk to me about the dark side of his Masonic involvement. He then confessed to me that he was aware of the existence of certain groups that used Masonic rituals in contexts of violence to initiate children. He said to me: ''He there are many of these groups, there are many people who are aware, but they don't talk about it because it's embarrassing.'' He had with me alternations of coherent conversations in which he told me about his involvement with other men in these groups. Sometimes in the evening it managed to get out of the retirement home and he then started climbing to trees in the manner of a soldier on a mission to, he believed, observe the activities of worship in order to "get the children out of the sect". this ''strategic mission'' lasted for two weeks until he believed have recovered each of the children. After which he seemed to be very satisfied of what he had accomplished and all the signs of his inner agitation were are calmed (...) The memoirs concerning irregular Masonic activities were clearly to be attributed to a certain part of his psyche which normally is not accessible to the consciousness and they may have been intertwined at that time with his wartime experiences.

It is possible that in raising this question, I had plunged my father into an inner conflict, his memory loss having begun just after my confrontation with him. However, his brief period of honesty towards me has undoubtedly contributed to a process of mutual healing. this confession, combined with the knowledge of the Masonic Order that I was able to acquire, redirected my attention so that it no longer rests on anger to the man himself. Today I am led to understand the principles that there are behind these centuries-old "magical" practices, which divide the psyche of these men in two: on the one hand citizens and men devoted, and on the other, the most childish, absurd and cruel of creatures human[72]."

in

France, Maude Julien gave a disturbing testimony in her book entitled "Behind the Grid" released in 2014. His father, who was a wealthy entrepreneur, introduced to Freemasonry, subjected him to conditioning.

extreme aiming to make her a "goddess", but especially a robot obeying her finger and eye. Maude Julien suffered total social isolation for fifteen years, she was locked up in a mental straitjacket (just like his mother) with a formation of the mind and body to make her a "superior being", an "Elected One". Extreme and traumatic physical and mental exercises defied understanding. Maude Julien said: "This book is a manual of silent disobedience. I wanted to show how the grip is put in place. It is a perfect crime whose victim is so ashamed that she does not denounce anything. Today, I am well in my personal and professional life, my daughters are great.

I wanted to write my story. For him, only his mental world counts. the others are instruments or obstacles. He locked us in this mental straitjacket, my mother and I. The Ogre shows you that he is Love, with a big A. Everything he does is for your good. It installs a timed life of which he holds the remote control. Then, it instills fear. The outside world is the danger[73]."

In a television interview[74] with Thierry Ardisson, Maude Julien confided that she had traumatic amnesia concerning scars on his thighs and chest. She ignores what is the origin of it and doctors say that these are not accidents.

In this interview, Maude Julien says: "The goal of my father was actually to make me an 'over-being', he had for me a capital mission. And for that I had to have a training physical and psychic so that the mind is stronger than matter (...)

- Thierry Ardisson: And then there is the cellar, so there it is quite violent, that is to say that it wakes you up in the middle of the night and it puts you sitting on a chair in a cellar.

- Maude Julien: Always so as not to move. But the purpose of this crucial mission to which he dedicated me was that I had to be able to circulate between universes, learn to communicate with the dead

(•••)

- T.A: There's the electricity test too, it's incredible. It asks you to hold an electric wire and take discharges for ten minutes.

- M.J: When there are discharges you should not react (...) - T.A: (...) at eight o'clock you will wake up your father, and there you must hold his room pot while he urinates (...) the most disturbing anyway, it is these scars on the thighs and on the chest whose origin you do not know. These are initiation rites you think?

- M.J: What is certain for doctors is that they were not made by health professionals, which excludes the thesis of the accident (...) and I am afraid I never know.

Is it the occult teachings of the Masonic lodges that inspire such projects to create "beings superiors", enslaved and traumatized to become connected mediums to other dimensions? As we will see later in this book, extreme trauma causes deep dissociative states that spiritually "unlock" the child, allowing connection to other dimensions. Are there any abuses?

Masonic rituals whose purpose would be in a way to initiate the child, i.e. to create at home an "enlightenment" during the dissociation?

But now let's return to the mysteries related to Gnosticism, the Gnosis of which some literatures attribute a major role in the history of Satanism and ritual abuse. The Gnostics were sometimes referred to as Borborites or libertines because of the deviant practices to which they surrendered in their "mysteries". Based on Kurt Rudoph, the author of ''Gnosis: The Nature and History of Gnosticism'', the secret of some Gnostics includes a ritual handshake similar to the Masonic handle, a specific handshake to which some survivors of ritual abuse often react with a change in the state of consciousness without knowing why it happens to them. These reactions may signify that there has been mental programming and that the handshake particular acts as a trigger that alters the state of consciousness of the individual. We will return to this in more detail in Chapter 7 on the Monarch-type mind control.

In the Gnostic text entitled ''Gospel of Phillip'', it is mentioned that ''God is a eater of man. It is for this reason that men are (sacrificed) to him.'' several sources reported that some Gnostic groups practiced ceremonies involving cannibalism and sexual orgies. According to their description, some of these ceremonies are clearly to be classified in the category of black masses and satanic ritual abuses. The most shocking of the Gnostic practices reported is certainly that of Epiphanius. A monk would have witnessed the orgiastic rituals practiced by a Gnostic group named the Phibionites (or Barbotians). The Bishop

Epiphany of Salamis wrote in his Panarion (Adversus Haereses: Against heresies) than the ophite sect of the Phibionites performed abortion and that the fetus, dismembered, coated with honey and spices, was devoured by the group as a kind of Eucharist. These ceremonies

Orgiaques are related with the vision that the Phibionites have of the cosmos and the way to free one one from it. In addition to meeting the requirements of archones

(demons), these "manners" respond to the need to gather the divine seed implanted in the world and which is currently dispersed in the seed men and female menstruation. In his book entitled "The Gnostics", Jacques Lacarrière asserts that the violation of sexual morality and other blasphemous horrors demonstrate the clearly "Luciferian" conviction of certain practitioners

Coin. WX1V1V/UUX1 V/XUXX VXXXVXXL XUV/XXVX XVyXXXXVy U.VO J7X UUV| UU. XX L.VJ. VV/X LU. XXXU
Gnostics

associate Lucifer with Promotheus, the Titan of Greek mythology[75].

Satanist Aleister Crowley practiced with his followers a version

'Thechemic' of the black Mass which he called the "Gnostic Mass". Freemasonry sports a "G" in the middle of the compass and the square, a letter that refers to its primary source:

Gnosis. In his speech of initiating him to the rank of Scottish knight, Adam Weishaupt (founder of the "Enlightened of Bavaria") said: "the enlightened alone, are in possession of the secrets of the true Freemason. It remains even to the enlightened a large part of its secrets to discover. The new chevalier must devote his research to it. He is especially warned that it is through the study of the ancient Gnostics and the Manichaeans that he will be able to make great discoveries on this real Masonry[76]."

In his book entitled "Fils de la Veuve", Professor Jean Claude Lozac'hmeur analyses the links that exist between the Contemporary Gnostic Masonic tradition and mythology. He concludes that the myth of the "Son of the Widow" dear to the Freemasons contains a real parable transmitting in a veiled way a secret tradition to which was originally associated with an initiatory cult. According to him, once decrypted, this symbolic narrative reveals a dualistic religion opposing an "evil god", author of the Flood, to a "good god", of promethean (luciférien) type. ''In other words, the religion of the Son of the Widow rests on the same background of tradition as the Bible, with this fundamental difference that the values are reversed and that the Judeo-Christian God appears under the traits of a jealous and ruthlesstyrant^^.''

the

''good god'' of the various and varied Gnostics would therefore be Lucifer hidden under his more beautiful pageantry, illuminating the initiates with the light of knowledge... A ''civilizing god'' putting man at the centre of all things. His research on origins

occultec of the Franc.Masonry also bring Jean Claude

Lozac'hmeur to conclude: "There has existed in all civilizations a primitive religion diametrically opposed to the biblical tradition, and of which we find remains in mythologies and folklores. In this mystery cult, which corresponds to the "Primordial Tradition" of modern Gnostics, Satan was represented as the ''Civilizing God Bearer of Light[78]''.

In the book "The Ancient Greek World", Marie-Claire Amouretti writes about the cult at Mysteries of Bacchus: "Dionysus appears as the liberating god. The myth makes him an exile, connects him to the Near East to make him return triumphantly to Greek soil, accompanied by a procession satyrs and menades, musicians and dancers. God of wine and unbridled desire, Dionysus offers himself to his followers in the form of a powerful animal that they strip and eat raw to appropriate his strength. Women in particular participate in this cult. It is the whole civic and family setting that cracks at the occasion of these festivals of which Euripides will make an extraordinary evocation in "Les Bacchantes": physical or spiritual drunkenness, joy, race disheveled in unculitated lands, singing and dancing, sexual freedom and female domination, all this expresses a deep need to free oneself a civic, moral and family system that is being organized with great rigidity. Necessary but dangerous outlet[79]."

All this is clearly linked to what we are experiencing today in our consumer society in which man is put to the center of all things thanks to the liberating god of the "brothers" of light". Unbridled "consumers" devoid of any spirituality and whose morality continues to fall from year to year, this being the result of the global Plan of Luciferian, based precisely on this transhistorical gnosis whose goal is to carry out the reign of the "civilizing and liberating god".

According to l’historien Romain Titus Livy, l’auteur de “Rome and the Mediterranean'', the Romans who had investigated the cult at Mysteries of Bacchus had discovered that its rituals included sexual transgressions and blood sacrifices. One of the prophesies of the cult had organized with its followers a vast scam that resulted in several assassinations, this is the "scandal of the bacchanals", historically well referenced. This cult did not admit in its ceremonies initiatory than young people under the age of twenty, more docile during the orgies... ''While her son was recovering, she had to introduce him to the Bachic rites (editor's note: cult in Bacchus) (...) Then her mistress Hispala told her that when she was a slave, she entered this sanctuary as a subordinate to her mistress, but that when she was free she had none never approached. She knew it was a workshop for all kinds of corruptions, and it was well known that for two years, no one having more than twenty years had only been initiated here. They drove him to a place that resonated with screams, songs, music with cymbal strikes and drums, so that the voice of the initiate cannot be heard then that shameful practices were perpetrated on him with violence[80]..."

in his book "The Generating Deities", Jacques-Antoine Dulaure (at the time Freemason of the Lodge Osiris de Sèvres) teaches us that the cult of Mysteries of Bacchus comes from Egypt and that it is related to the phallic cult (the worship of the penis).

Dulaure writes in his book: "Herodotus and Diodorus of Sicily agrees that the cult of Bacchus was introduced in Greece by a man called Melampus, instructed by the Egyptians of a large number of Ceremonies. Melampus, son of Amythaon, had, says Herodotus, a great knowledge of the sacred ceremony of the Phallus. It is he who has instructs the Greeks of the name of Bacchus, ceremonies of his worship, and who introduced among them the procession of the Phallus. It is true that he did not discover them the background to these mysteries; but the sages who came after him have some gave a further explanation. So it's Melampous, adds-instituted the procession of the Phallus which is carried in honor of Bacchus, and it was he who instructed the Greeks of the ceremonies they still practice

* i t-ii, which has

today^1]."

The Freemason Dulaure also writes about this cult of the Phallus to which he devoted a whole book: "A particular sect and little known, called the sect of the Baptes, celebrated in Athens, Corinth, in the island of Chio, in Thrace and elsewhere, the nocturnal mysteries of Cotitto, species of Venus popular. The initiates who indulged in all the excesses of the debauchery, employed the Phallus in a particular way; they were of glass, and served as a drinking vessel. Those who do not see, in this symbol of reproduction, that the character of libertinage, must be surprised that it was an integral part of the ceremonies dedicated to Ceres, deity so recommended by its purity, and nicknamed the Holy Virgin; from what it was in the mysteries of this goddess in Eleusis, called mysteries par excellence, to which all men of antiquity, distinguished by their talents, by their virtues, were honored to be initiated (...) It is Tertullian who tells us that the Phallus was, at Eleusis, one of the mysterious objects.

No other writer of antiquity had made this peculiarity known, no initiate had before him revealed this secret: "All that these mysteries have more holy, he says, what is hidden with so much care, what one is admitted to know only very late, what the ministers of religion, called Epoptes, make so ardent desire, it is the simulacrum of the manly limb[82].'' here is some extracts from the book "Shiva and Dionysus" (Alain Daniélou - 1979) concerning the similarities between the initiations of ancient religions and those of modern secret societies aiming to divinize Man: "Certain ritual techniques will allow us to act on the latent energies present in the human being and thus to transform it and make it the vehicle of the transmission of certain powers, to raise it to a higher plane in the hierarchy of beings, to make it a kind of demigod or superman closer to the invisible world of spirits. This is the the role of initiation. This process of transformation of the human being is long and difficult, that is why initiation can only be done in degrees. The pashu (animal man) will first become a sâdhaka (apprentice), then a vîra (hero) or follower, i.e. a being who can dominate and surpass the appearances of the material world. The next degree is that of siddaha (realized), also called, in the Tantrikas, the stage of kaula (member of the group), a word that corresponds to the title of ''companion'' in Masonic initiation, where the rank is also found apprentice. The kaula has reached "the state of truth". Only then is the barriers between the human and the divine are erased and that the follower can be considered divya (deified). In the language of the Greco-Roman mysteries, we called "hero" the follower, the initiate. The higher degrees are probably kept secret. This transformation concerns the whole of human being. (...) Only an initiate can pass powers on to a new initiate.

This is essential for the initiatory transmission to be valid. It's why an interrupted tradition cannot be restored. Initiation is the real transmission of a shakti, of a power, transmission that takes the form of enlightenment. The continuity of the transmission from one initiate to another is compared to the transmission of one flame that ignites another. Insiders form groups of men different from the others. These groups are called kula (families) in Tantrism, hence the name kaula (family members) or "companions") given to their followers. Kula corresponds to thiase Dionysian. (...) The ritual bath preceded, for the mysteries of Eleusis, the phase considered the most mysterious of initiations. It was preceded, according to Plutarch, abstinence for ten days from any sexual intercourse. The same rule is applied in India. (...) "The novice is then led inside the initiation area, carefully marked on the ground. The entrance to the west is the better for followers of all castes, but especially for those of the royal caste, the Kshatriyas... The novice must do three times the turn the phallic image and, according to his means, offer God a handful of flowers mixed with gold, or only gold if flowers are missing, in reciting the hymn to Rudra (Rudrâdhyaya). Then he will meditate on Shiva by repeating only the pranava, the Syllable AUM." (Linga Purâna, II, chap. 21, 40-42). Similarly, in the Dionysian rite, "the initiate has a veiled head and is guided by the officiant. A recycle bin filled with fruits and symbolic objects, one of which is shaped like phallus, is placed on the head of the initiate. (H. Jeanmaire, Dionysus, p.459) (...) "The headband which blinded the disciple is then removed and the yantra is shown to him." (Linga Purana, II, chap.21, 45).”

We find here the same protocol in Freemasonry when the apprentice must be blindfolded to receive the initiation.

some Current testimonies seem to confirm that the cult in Dionysus/Bacchus and globally all these Luciferian cults are still practiced today in occident. Le livre “Ritual Abuse and Mind Control : The Manipulation of Attachment Needs” contient le testimony of a survivor of satanic ritual abuse and mind control. THE woman was born into a family that would practice these rituals of generations in generations, here is an excerpt from his testimony: "The first child murder I consciously remember goes back to the age of four or five years. My mother was engrossed by X (...) We were taken to a large stately home, it was during the summer on the occasion of an important date (...) On Friday night there was a ritual followed by an involving many people dressed in costumes and doing cabrioles in this huge living room. Bacchus was one of the gods they worshipped. the next day we went outside in a large meadow, there was a hundred people, it was a great ritual. My mother was lying on the floor, she was doing the work for giving birth while X was singing (...) The child was born, she was a little girl. He then put a knife in my hand left telling me some things about this child. Then he put his hand on mine and we pointed the knife towards the baby's chest and we killed him. He took away the heart, everyone cheered and took it away.

unleashed, then the child was dismembered and consumed[83].

Dans son livre “The Occult Conspiracy : Secret Societies, Their Influence and Power in World History” Michael Howard écrit à propos des Mysteries of Antiquity: ''The Mysteries Cults practice

initiatory ceremonies that contain the symbolism of the arcana as well as stagings in order to reveal to the initiate the hidden spiritual realities behind the illusion of the material world. During the initiation, the neophyte is put in a trance and then experiences contact with the gods during a journey in ''the Other World''. Initiates pass a symbolic death and are reborn with a perfect soul.'''

What Howard reports here is interesting because it shows the similarities between the cults of the ancient Mysteries, shamanism, the cults of possession and witchcraft... But what he describes also shows a similarity with contemporary Masonic-type secret societies, i.e. symbolic death for rebirth to a new life. one symbolic that we also find in Christians with the rebirth in Jesus Christ through the sacrament of baptism: "Thus, he who is united with Christ is a new creature: that which is old has disappeared, behold: what is new is already there'' (2 Corinthians 5 :17). Jesus Christ came to earth to reform all these religions pagans who practiced the sacrifice of blood in honor of fallen angels. The baptism of blood was replaced by the baptism of water and the Holy Spirit and the blood sacrifice was definitively replaced by His own Sacrifice.

Benjamin Walker, the author of "The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets", describes an initiatory ceremony of the cult of Mithras, which was another of these religions in Mysteries: "There are first a few days of food and sexual abstinence, then a ablution ceremony after which the candidate's hands are tied behind his back, then he lies on the ground as if he had died. After some rites solemn, his right hand is grasped by the hierophant and he is resurrected.

Then comes the baptism of blood. The initiate finds himself naked in a pit covered with a grid, above this grid an animal is sacrificed in order to that blood flows on the candidate. No matter what animal it is, it still symbolizes the bull of Mithras. The Christian poet Prudentius did a description of this ritual, of which he has a personal memory: "Through the grid flows into the pit the red liquid that the neophyte receives on his body, on his head, on his cheeks, on his lips and on his nostrils. He makes the liquid flow over his eyes and mouth to soak his tongue with blood and to swallow as much as it can. Symbolically, the initiate was resurrected from the dead and cleansed by the revitalizing blood of the bull. It is now considered "born again in eternity". It will be welcomed in the community of initiates as a brother and he will now be allowed to participate in the sacramental meal of bread and water, which will establish its status of elected official."

survivor "Svali", ex-illuminati, herself born within a Luciferian cult, reports in her testimony that the group to which it belonged to practices similar to the old Babylonian religions of the Mysteries with a baptism of blood: "They (the children) will participate in rituals during which the adults wear robes, and they will have to, among other things, to bow down before the guardian deity of their worship. Moloch

Ashtaroth, Baal, Enokkim, are demons that are commonly worshipped. The child may witness a real, or staged, sacrifice serving as an offering for these Deities. Animal sacrifices are common. The child will be forced to participate in the sacrifices and will have to go through the baptism of blood. He will have to take the heart or other organs of the sacrificed animal to eat them (...) They do initiatory rituals with children or with older followers, the initiate is attached and a animal is bled to death above him[84].

A document[85] containing the hearings and minutes of the Dutroux case in Belgium reports some testimonies of blood sacrifices during rituals with sometimes a kind of blood baptism. These are depositions and complaints, no meaningful investigation has been conducted to determine whether these testimonies were true. All these cases are systematically Suppressed. Why is that? Here are some excerpts:

in

In 2000, France 3 broadcast a report entitled "Rape of children, the end of silence?".

The documentary contains the testimony of a little girl who was a victim satanic ritual abuse. It describes a cult scene taking place in Paris or in his region: "Then we would go down into a maze where it was cold, it was dark, and it seemed like a basement. Here there was a locker room where we went to dress with the white and red clothes. Then we went here (editor's note: showing his drawing), there was a room where they raped children, it was a large room, like a large cave in the form of a cathedral or crib and it there were a lot of people here. There was also a very very great statue of an African or black god, and when he growl, people put money in large baskets that circulated. around this statue, there were ashes, with children's heads on pikes in these ashes."

Doesn't the Old Testament repeatedly describe child sacrifices? Rituals of sacrificing children to fire in honor of the demon Moloch (see the end of this chapter). These practices of sacrificial cults do not seem to have ended with the modern world... under different forms, the Mysteries are like dark funeral, celebrating a mystical death and resurrection under the form of a heroic or divine character. In his book entitled "Antichrist Osiris", Chris Relitz explains that this ritual initiation of the Mysteries could take different forms consisting of to replay the life of a deity, its death, and resurrection. Knowledge secret was encoded in these initiation ceremonies and could thus go through the centuries. First of all the candidate for initiation must die symbolically by replaying the story of a god. Then comes the search and the discovery of his body, then finally the "resurrection" where the initiate receives a secret that he must keep. A secret that seems to the first initially insignificant, on the other hand, the priest is perfectly aware that this information is of extreme importance. What has just been entrusted to the initiate is in fact "the secret of all secrets", it is information encoded and veiled in symbolism that the initiate will not be able to usually not directly understand. All they can do is continue to transmit blindly and eternally this occult symbolism to other candidates for initiation[86].

In 1928, the founder of the Revue Internationale des Sociétés Secrètes (R.I.S.S.), Bishop Jouin, declared in the first issue of the ''occultist supplement'' of the R.I.S.S.: ''Yes, the great secret of occultism is there: that is to say, not in sensational discovery a confession or an accusation still unpublished, but in the obvious and serene conclusion of a kind of comparative grammar of the symbolism of all the Sects. For the followers, condemned to hide their "truth" under veils impenetrable, have probably forbidden themselves at all times categorical formulas, tans what they teach would disgust unvarnished to the mind and the hearts of men (...) But it is easy to see at least that a fixed interpretation of these symbols has always been in place within humanity, that a traditional cabal, long oral, then written, developed from all time side by side with the canon of scripture and finally finds itself in a a number of works, at first sight incomprehensible or contradictory, but whose key to symbolism makes it possible to reconstitute the true meaning.'

Christian Lagrave, the author of the book entitled ''The Dangers of Contemporary Gnosis'', said at a conference: ''How these Have Gnostic errors been transmitted and persisted since antiquity? Several modes of transmission are possible and can also combine with each other. First of all, there is the clandestine persistence of these doctrines in religious sects or in secret societies, with an "esoteric" transmission (reserved for a small number of initiates) carried out in an occult way, i.e. one never reveals entirely and explicitly these perverse doctrines but they are hidden under symbols and myths by gradually leading the initiate to discover them by himself. This tactic of gradual initiation was already in use in the j_/W U1 ancient and medieval Manichean sects. It is still practiced in the modern occultist sects, especially in Freemasonry. The purpose of this tactic is to gradually bring the new initiates to doctrines which would make them flee if they were revealed to them entirely from the outset.''

All these sects, called schools of the Mysteries or religions of the Mysteries, were therefore intended to transmit a certain knowledge esoteric and occult. Only aristocrats could join such groups to receive the initiation to the "famous" Mysteries. These initiates were trained with a methodical combination teachings and indoctrinations. Sleep deprivation, torture ritualized, drugs and sometimes demonology were used to program the minds of the "students". These aristocrats initiated into the Mysteries and linked by rituals to certain demonic entities (which can bring them a population. This is how a kind of caste was born, little by little, aristocratic who developed a sense of spiritual superiority translating as "enlightenment". That is to say, access to knowledge hidden from the majority of lay humans. A number of authors have clearly identified the strong resemblance between these ancient mysteries cults and organizations modern fraternals, secret societies that appeared later in Europe. Jean-Marie R. Lance, member of the A. M.O.R.C

(Rose-Croix), said in a Canadian television documentary: "The history of the Order, in its traditional aspect, goes back to ancient Egypt and can even be traced back to 1500 years before Christ with for example Akhenaten who was associated with these schools of the Mysteries, with these ''Houses of Life'' which were places that allowed men and women to study together the mysteries of life[87].''

Some authors claim that Freemasonry was built on the one hand on the tradition of cathedral builders and on the other hand starts on the model of these ancient schools of the Mysteries with the practice of starts on the model of these ancient schools of the Mysteries with the practice of unhealthy and traumatic initiation rituals. During these rituals the terror suffered by the candidate is the central point of the initiatory process, its vulnerability during this experience marks the power of the group over the individual: "We could have kill you, but we didn't." After crossing this process, the initiate will be helped and protected by the group/sect provided that it complies with the strict requirements of secrecy. This principle of initiation by the trauma is the common point of all fraternal structures Luciferians or Satanists, for whom initiation during the little one j_/W U1 childhood is the best way to get a loyal, faithful adult, who will respect perfectly the law of silence while perpetuating the dark tradition. Rituals involving perverse and immoral acts, including the despicable

Paedocriminality, also make it possible to establish a blackmail in silence on the people who took part. This makes it possible to create "fraternal" links, all the stronger when a human sacrifice, a ritual crime, was committed in a group and cameras were filming the scene to immortalize it. The followers who plunge into this violence addictive feel connected to each other by a secret that it is strictly impossible to reveal to the outside, it is an unhealthy cement that welds the members among themselves and that gives them a sense of superiority over the mass human being.

A relatively well-known example of a secret society that practiced satanic rituals is that of the Brothers of St Francis of

Wycombe, better known as "The Hell Fire"

Club'' (Club of the Flames of Hell). This group was founded in May 1746 by Francis Dashwood at the George and Vulture public

House of London. Francis Dashwood, a close friend of King George III who later became The Minister of Finance of Great Britain. This "club" was located in the underground of a church-type building, with a series of tunnels, halls and caverns that served to the members (the ''brothers'') for their occult activities which consisted in fornicating with prostitutes, to make devotions to Bacchus and Venus and to offer sacrifices to Satan. Without being a direct member, Benjamin Franklin occasionally attended hell fire club meetings.

Franklin was himself a Freemason, Grand Master of the St John's Lodge in Philadelphia and Grand Master of the lodge of the nine sisters in Paris. It was also

Grand Master Rosicrucian.

In February 1998, a worker working on a construction site discovered the bones of six children and four adults. These were the restoration site of a London house located at 36 Craven Street, which was none other than that of Benjamin Franklin, the Father of the Constitution American. The caaavres were aates ae lepoque where Franklin occupied the places, i.e. from 1757 to 1762 and from 1764 to 1775. This discovery of bones has even been announced in the British press, notably not the Sunday Times. Evangeline Hunter-Jones, MP and President of the ''Friends of Benjamin Franklin's House'', reported that ''the burned bones were buried deeply, probably to hide them and there is every reason to think that it there are still some.'' To exonerate Benjamin Franklin, he was quick put forward that during his absences, his friend Dr. Hewson could have used the house to perform dissections of human corpses for its students[88].

Albert Mackey is a famous Freemason (the one who co-opted Albert Pike) who studied the philosophical roots of Freemasonry going back to biblical times. Mackey deduced that the "pure" form that was practiced by the Israelites (Noachites) implied a belief in a single God and in the immortality of the soul. he states that its "parasitized" form was this set initiation rites practiced by pagans, and in particular practices Dionysians of the Tyrians. Pagan practices which, according to him, involved "severe and difficult trials... a long and painful initiation. with a series of initiatory grades''. According to Mackey, these two forms of masonry merged during the construction of the Temple of Solomon to produce a prototype of the modern (Masonic) institution.

Mackey thus identifies a corrupted form of Freemasonry combined with a pure form dating back to the origins. He states that this confers on this secret institution a side both bright and at the same time obscure. It defines this dark side, this form of "parasitized" masonry, as a kind of black masonry with terrifying and traumatic initiatory practices, which uses the symbolic representation of the mythical descent into Hades, the falls or hell, to then return to the light of day: the initiatory rebirth[89].

Mackey reveals to us that there are therefore two sides in Masonry, one of which is unaware of the existence of the other, which can be translated as "the good do not know the bad guys, but the bad guys know the good guys".

The author Freemason Manly P. Hall, honored by the Journal of the Scottish Rite as "the greatest philosopher of Freemasonry", clearly described the two distinct aspects of Masonic organization: "Freemasonry is a fraternity hidden in another fraternity: a visible organization hiding an invisible fraternity of Elected... It is necessary to establish the existence of these two separate orders and yet interdependent, one visible, and the other invisible. Organization visible is a splendid camaraderie composed of "free and equal men," who are dedicated to ethical, educational and fraternal projects, patriotic and humanitarian. The invisible organization is a fraternity secret, of the most august, majestic of dignity and grandeur, of which the members are dedicated to the service of a mysterious ''arcanum arcandrum'', that is to say, a hidden mystery[90].

To complete this description of Hall, here is what Albert Pike says in "Morals and Dogma": "Like all Religions, all the Mysteries, Hermeticism and Alchemy, Freemasonry reveals its secrets to no one, except the Adepts, the Sages and the Elect. It uses false explanations to interpret its symbols, to mislead those who deserve to be misled, to hide from them the Truth, that it calls the light, and thus removes them from it (...) Freemasonry hides jealously his secrets, and intentionally misleads his interpreters pretentious[91].'' in his book "The Externalization of the Hierarchy", the famous occultist of the New Age Alice Bailey, writes about this totally occult fringe of Freemasonry: "The Masonic Movement is the guardian of the law. It is the House of Mysteries, and the seat of initiation. It holds in its symbolism the ritual of the Godhead, and preserves in his pictorial work the way of salvation. The Methods of the Godhead are demonstrated in his Temples. The world can move forward under the gaze of this Eye from which nothing escapes. Freemasonry is a much more organization occult as one can imagine. It is intended to be the training school of the most advanced future occultists (...) These Mysteries, when restored, will unify all beliefs[92].

Alice Bailey tells us here about Lucifer (this Eye from which nothing escapes) and the construction of a new world order (the Mysteries that will unify all beliefs).

there are a number of Masonic sources concerning the connection between religions with Mysteries and contemporary Freemasonry. Some brothers have openly acknowledged this in several publications. The Masonic Book entitled "The Master Mason" clearly describes the link between the cults to mysteries of antiquity and modern masonry: "The idea behind the legend of Hiram is as old as religious thought in men. the same elements existed in the history of Osiris, celebrated by the Egyptians in their temples, just as the ancient Persians referred to it with their god Mithras. In Syria, the Dionysian Mysteries contain elements very similar to the story of Dionysius and Bacchus, a god who died and rose. There is also the story of Tammuz, as old as all the Other. All this refers to the ancient Mysteries. They are celebrated by the secret societies, just like ours, with allegorical ceremonies during which insiders are progressing in these old societies by moving from a degree to the other. Read these old stories and marvel at the number of men who have all received the same great truth, in the same way[93].

The book 'The Master Mason'' therefore invites Freemasons readers to read the stories on the ancient religions at Mysteries to see how they teach the same ''great truth'' than Freemasonry. In the book ''A Bridge to Light'' (a bridge to light), the 32nd degree Freemason Rex R. Hutchens also speaks of the "great truths" related to the Mysteries. Here is how it describes the 23rd degree in the rite Scottish: ''Here we begin the initiation symbolic in the Mysteries practiced by the ancients and by which the Masonry has received the great truths[94].

In his book entitled ''Symbolism of Freemasonry or Mystic Masonry'', the 32nd degree mason J.D. Buck writes that ''Freemasonry is modeled on the model of the Ancient Mysteries, with their symbols and their allegories, this is much more than a coincidence due to the strong similarities[95].''

Henry C.Clausen, a 33rd degree Freemason, wrote in his book

"Your Amazing Mystic Powers": "Freemasonry is at the dawn of a new day. Due to the inadequacy of modern theology, the impossibility of materialism and sterility of academic philosophy, men themselves turn to the eternal truths perpetuated in the arcana of the ancients Mysteries[96]."

The Freemason S.R. Parchment said in his book "Ancient Operative Masonry": "The hierophants of universal science and the sublime philosophy teaches the Great Mysteries of Egypt, India, of Persia and other nations of antiquity. They reveal the secrets concerning the subtle forces of nature to the candidates who are worthy of them and Qualified. These faithful are also taught in the doctrine of the Universal fraternity, then finally initiated into the consciousness of the "I am what I am". These ideals are landmarks, symbols and traditions of the Old Operative Freemasonry, nothing more! [97]."

In 1896, in "History of Freemasonry", Albert Mackey wrote about religions in Mysteries: "It is known that in the Mysteries just as in Freemasonry, there are solemn obligations of secrets with penalties in case of violation of the oath (...) I traced the analogies between the ancient Mysteries and modern Freemasonry: 1/ The Preparation, which is called the 'Lustration' in the Mysteries, is the first stage of the Mysteries and it is also the work to be done in the degree apprentice Mason (who will have to "polish" or rough his stone). 2/ Initiation (...) 3/ Perfection (...) Freemasonry is uninterrupted continuity of the ancient Mysteries, the succession of what was transmitted through the initiations of Mithras."

Indeed, the analogies between the Mysteries cult of Mithras and contemporary Freemasonry are numerous and indisputable. In its book "Son of the widow", Jean-Claude Lozac'hmeur cites several of these similarities. First of all the room of the mysteries of Mithras was underground and it had a crypt whose ceiling could be decorated with stars symbolizing the universe, just like the ceiling of temples Masonic. The two cults have the same layout of the places: each side of the room, lengthwise, was arranged benches between which stood four small pillars for the temple Mithraic and three pillars in the Masonic temple. To the two columns Jakin and Boaz of the modern lodges correspond the two columns framing the bas-reliefs of Mithras. Last but not least, the two cults include a initiation which is preceded by tests and they also include several degrees of initiation. The initiatory ritual of the first Masonic degree is almost identical to the representations of initiation to Mithraism. In the two cases, the candidate has his eyes veiled with a blindfold that holds behind him a character and in both cases the master of the ceremony presents him with a sword. In the initiation of Mithras, the candidate is naked and he sits on hands tied behind the back, while in Masonic initiation, the candidate has a bare arm and leg and he stands with his hands free. he is more than likely that we are dealing here with the same cult having crossed the centuries. As we have seen above, the Mystery cult of Mithras practiced real blood sacrifices to baptize the initiate in a form of resurrection and purification by the blood of Taurus.

Albert Pike himself admitted that Freemasonry was a remnant of religion antediluvian, i.e. the religion of the Mysteries, the religion Babylonian: "The legend of the granite, brass or bronze columns that survived the flood, is supposed to symbolize the Mysteries, including Masonry is the legitimate succession! [98]]."

Albert Mackey states in "The History of Freemasonry" that "the traditional history of Freemasonry begins before the flood. he there was a system of religious instruction which, by its resemblance to the Freemasonry at the legendary and symbolic level, was named by some authors the "Antediluvian Masonry!"]."

In his book "La Symbolique Maçonnique", Jules Boucher, also a Freemason, asserts that "current Masonry is not a survivor of the mysteries of antiquity, but a continuation of the so-called Mysteries! [10°]!."

In the face of all these quotations, it is therefore legitimate to ask this question: does modern masonry transmit initiations and knowledge similar to that which was taught before the flood, then from the time of Nimrod and Babylon? This Masonic knowledge has it retained a purely Luciferian doctrine, i.e. based on paganism and Satanism, including among other practices depraved sexual and blood sacrifices (sexual magic and demonology)? Do they still sacrifice the Taurus of Mithras? Do they still practice blood baptism? Is it this "parasitized" masonry, black masonry to the traumatic initiation rituals of which Albert Mackey speaks? the trauma resulting in altered states of consciousness, the sacrifices of

Are blood and paedocriminal sexual magic initiatory keys that some modern secret societies would use to establish connections with certain entities and thus acquire power and power?

This claim of a descent from the most shameful mysteries of antiquity by many Freemasons writers proves that the Freemasonry tends by its doctrines and practices to the restoration of ancient paganism in its greatest perversion. Secret societies modern Masonic type would they be the direct descent of the ancients Mysteries religions and fertility cults? Cults that worshipped gods like Baal, Moloch or Dionysus (Bacchus) and whose rites included sacrifices. Group sexuality was also an element essential of these pagan sects, the solar phallic cult being today represented by the obelisks that stand in honor of the "royal secret Masonic" on our great public squares...

The author from "Who Was Hiram Abiff", J.S.M. Ward reports that human sacrifice rituals were practiced in the mysteries of As pie, Tammuz and Adonis, he writes: "We have an abundance of evidence that at a certain time human victims were regularly sacrificed for Astarte (...) The most usual method seemed to be by fire, the victim was killed before being placed on a funeral pyre. It is this form particular sacrifice that was associated with Melcarth or Moloch. Melcarth was Baal, the god of fertility (see at the end of this chapter "Rituals of sacrifices in the Old Testament")

(...) These archaic beginnings evolved with the great rites at Mysteries and Freemasonry itself, in which men receive the doctrine of the resurrection of the soul and life beyond the grave. All these Primitive rituals are associated with the cult of fertility! [101]."

In his book "The Golden Bough", Sir James Frazer writes that fertility cults represent a religion universal primitive in which were regularly practiced human sacrifices. In 1921, Margaret Murray popularized the knowledge of such secret religions following the publication of his book "The Witch Cooked in Western Europe". Murray asserts that the "witch hunters" of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries had discovered and exhibited a real cult of the goddess linked to "1 Ancient Religion": that is to say cults organized hierarchically and meeting in assemblies according to a certain calendar. These ceremonies are known as Sabbaths.

The orgiastic rituals of the Sabbath, which may include blood sacrifices, are cults related to fertility! [102].

For the Indian historian Narendra nath Bhattacharyya, there is a kind of archaic matriarchal substrate on which all take root the religions of India and the Middle East, most of which are said to be related to a form of sexual magic. Bhattacharyya also suggests that the ancient Cults to the mother goddess of Isis, Astarte, etc., take root in a "primitive sexual rite based on the magical association between the fertility of nature and human fertility! [103]."

some extracts from the book "The ancient Greek world" illustrating the ritual practices of ancient religions, including cults related to fertility: "Immediately, in order around the vast altar, they put away for the god the splendid hecatomb (a large number of animals intended to be sacrificed) (...) arms raised, pray aloud: you whose bow is silver, listen to my words... This is how he prays and Phoïbos Apollo listens to his prayer. We stop praying, the grains of barley thrown, the heads of the victims are raised to the sky, the throats are slit, they skin, they detach the thighs, they are covered with fat in a double layer; we have above the pieces of raw flesh (...) Sacrifice of consumable goods, collective meal with what remains of it. Everything takes place in the open air around a simple altar (...) The sacrifice of the animal remains the most characteristic rite. It can be of the Uranian type as here, the blood of the animal oriented towards the sky, the offal eaten in joy despite the seriousness of the circumstances (the Greeks are threatened with the plague). Worship

land; the flesh is burned to the ground in holocaust (...) We see that both rituals can be used for the same god, depending on the circumstances.

Chthonian rites are addressed to infernal deities, accompany some atoning sacrifices, often oaths, sacrifices to the sea and to the rivers, to the dead heroes (...) Simple offerings of popular cults, often magical character, small statuettes clay, beginnings of harvests, hair (...) Demerter's daughter, Koré-Persephone, the young girl of the grain, goes down in the summer, after the threshing of cereals, to join her infernal husband,

Pluto - or Ploutos, ie the rich, rich silos dug into the ground or jars half-buried and filled by the new harvest. In October she returns to her mother to witness the sowing and the recovery of vegetation. This return is marked by the festival of Thesmophories (...) it is reserved for married women, who alone are carriers of fertility. It is then that one removes from the pits, where they had been thrown as a sacrifice to Eubouleus, the putrefyed pigs whose remains, mixed with cereal seed, in will ensure fertility (...)

This is just one example among the countless ceremonies designed to ensure the fertility of the soil (...) A number of shrines also derive their reputation from their oracular function. It is accepted that the signs are multiple by which the gods address to humans (...) the flight of birds, the bowels of sacrificed victims (...) The most famous is undoubtedly the Oracle of Delphi that Apollo inherited from the earth that had preceded him in these places. Consultation of the Pythia is the process favorite. After completing the preliminary formalities (purifications, consecration of the "pelanos", sacrifice of one victim to Apollo, another to Athena) and having made sure that the god consented to listen, the consultant is introduced into the bottom of the temple, the "adyton", where the Pythia is located, installed on the tripod that covers the oracular pit! [104]]."

In the book entitled "Dictionnary of Satanism", Wade Baskin writes about fertility cults: "In mythology classic, Dionysus is the god of wine and fertility. His cult was widespread in Thrace, women were particularly linked to these rites orgiastic. The Menades, in their ecstatic frenzy, abandoned their houses, roamed the fields and hillsides, danced while spinning their flaming torches. In their passion, they caught and shredded animals, sometimes even children, and devoured their flesh, thus acquiring communion with the deity (...) Selected religions pagans gave initiations through secret rituals, undisclosed in the public. The secret knowledge which the initiate received provided him with benefits in his present life and in his life after death... The Mysteries Dionysian were present in several places. Orgiastic ceremonies, the animal sacrificed and drinking his blood. The ultimate goal of such a cult was to achieve immortality."

Walter Leslie Wilmshurst stated in her book "The Meaning of Masonry" that Freemasonry descends many from the ancient Mysteries where to nprpccitaipnt rin Unirp In uin oaprp rin mancmr la nUair prnp rln

achieve immortality, i.e. "become a god", is the central point. This quest for immortality is a constant in all the Luciferian cults, all the pagan doctrines: "This notion which concerns the evolution of man into a "super-man", has always was the goal of the Ancient Mysteries. The true purpose of modern masonry does not concerns not the social or charitable works put forward, but rather the acceleration of the spiritual evolution of those who aspire to perfect their human nature to transform into a kind of god. That thing is a very specific science, a royal art, that each of us can put in practice. Join this Art for any purpose other than that of studying and to practice this science is to misunderstand its true meaning... which is the conscious realization of our divine potentialities! [105]."

In his book "The Lost Keys of Freemasonry", the Lutheran Manly Palmer Hall states: "When a Mason learns that the meaning of the warrior on the board actually represents a dynamo releasing a a living power, he then discovered the mystery of his noble profession. the Lucifer's bubbling energies are in his hands. Before he can begin to move forward and rise, he must prove that he is able to use correctly these energies (...) Man is a god in making, and just like in the mystical myths of Egypt with the potter's wheel, it must be shaped! [105]."

Wilmshurst writes in "The Masonic Initiation": "Few Masons know what true initiation entails... True initiation consists of an expansion of consciousness passing from the human state to the state divine... Man has this thing in him, allowing him to evolve from the animal stage mortal at the stage of immortality, of super-human, of divine being... This process can human evolution be accelerated? To transform the human animal into an illuminated divine being? To these questions, the Ancient Mysteries answer that "Yes, the evolution of the human can be accelerated in initiated individuals! [107]]."

What are these occult practices accelerating the spiritual evolution of the human being, leading him to become a divine being and even a God? These Mysteries remain reserved for the initiates of the high lodges and rear lodges, or rather of the arcanum arcandrum, the

Invisible Brotherhood described above by Manly P. Hall. However, some seem to have broken the oath of silence, this is the case of Bill Schnoebelen which describes this Masonic "Royal Art" or "Royal Secret" as the key to immortality. It would be an opening to other alternative universes or the individual evolves as a god... Wilmshurst speaks of a real acceleration of the evolution but without revealing any details on the practices that allow access to it. According to Schnoebelen, this royal art would employ sexual magic operative, trans-Yuggothian magic, for allow access to certain dimensions. Some authors claim that the use of sexual magic may be a way to access the subconscious much faster than with any meditation technique. the dissociative trance states also make it possible to reach other dimensions of the being, causing a kind of enlightenment. Satanic ritual abuses that are related to both trauma and sexuality, therefore combine dissociation (profound altered state of consciousness) and sexual magic. Two powerful catalysts to access others dimensions and acquire "power". Therapist Patricia Baird Clarke speaks of "living sacrifices" literally serving as "batteries": "A helpless baby or a child will be chosen to be the living sacrifice to Satan. The child is then subjected to many painful and terrifying rituals in which demons are called to possess the child, thus making him or her a "tank" or battery used to store satanic powers that can be used to will by the members of the cult (...) The most way common way by which these powers are accessed is sexual perversion on the childi[108]]." We will return to sexual magic later in this chapter...

in

"The Masonic Initiation", Wilmshurst describes well how altered states of consciousness, the deep Dissociative states, are an essential point in Masonic initiation:

"Some dissociative states happen naturally even in the most balanced and perfectly healthy people (...) a complete "ecstasy", a state where consciousness then separates from the Ego and the physical body. Remote appearances and even actions are well-recognized facts. Such phenomena can be explained by the existence of a vehicle more subtle than the coarse physical body and consciousness can temporarily transier ae i a a i another. These two bodies are able to function jointly in complete independence (...) A Master is someone who has overcome these incapacitys to which men are subjected underdeveloped means. He has the full knowledge and control of all its parts, whether his physical body is awake or dormant, it maintains a continuous state of consciousness. It is able to cut itself and to disconnect time affairs and replace them with other matters of order supra-physical. It can operate at a distance from its physical body, it can go beyond banalities to access higher shots of the scale cosmic... Initiation always occurs when the physical body is in state of trance or sleep and when consciousness, temporarily released, is transferred to a higher level! [109]]."

In this excerpt, Wilmshurst clearly describes a dissociative state with decorporation, an "astral exit". He also describes in his delivers the "cord of areent" connecting the corns nhvsiaue to the astral corns during these outputs (we will come back to this in chapter 6). To trigger these profound altered states of consciousness and astral outflows, traumas are among the most radical and sadly effective techniques.

electroshocks. This seems rather benign here, but you should know that electroshock is one of the most effective methods to create mental dissociation and a state of timelessness. Survivors of ritual abuse and mind control often report the use of electrical prods for torture slaves and put them in dissociative states. Here is the description of the Masonic ritual: "Certain forces are sent through the body of the candidate to the course of the ceremony, especially at the time when he was appointed and received as Apprentice Freemason. Some parts of the lodge were heavily loaded with a magnetic force so that the candidate can absorb as much as possible this strength. The first thing about this curious method of initiation consists in exposing to this influence the different parts of his body which are used during the ceremony. In Ancient Egypt, a low electrical current was sent into the candidate by means of a rod or a sword with which he was hit in some places. It's partly for this reason that during this first initiation, the candidate is deprived of all metals, because these can easily interfere with the circulation of electric current."

The Most Venerable Master (T.V.M.) must be an outstanding occultist, because it is he who "charges" the candidate during initiation. As it is written in "Freemasonry

Universal": "The T.V.M. gives light, pure white light of truth and enlightenment." ...

the

Lynn Brunet's book "Terror, Trauma and The Eye In The Triangle", already cited above, is an investigation into the influence of Masonic initiatory practices in the production of contemporary art. Brunet supports that the rites and concepts of the Masonic tradition contain symbolically the process and impact of the trauma on the functioning of the human psyche. Here is an excerpt: "This ability human escape from terror and emotional or physical pain intense through denial and dissociation may have been exploited by Freemasonry for the purpose of attaining mystical experiences.

Interfering in the brain process by physical or mental trauma

(shock, terror, hypnosis), the mind can undergo a disruption of the notion of time and experience a sense of timelessness. As William points out

James dans “Exploring the World of the Celts”, de telles expériences peuvent produce a sense of absolute courage, invincibility and immortality. the feeling of invincibility that this produces is clearly used in the warlike cultures. Prudence Jones and Nigel Pennick in their book "A History of Pagan Europe" claim that Freemasonry is connected with the ancient practices of Druidism, war culture, sacrifices and magic! [111]]."

Here is now an illustration of these notions of timelessness, invincibility and immortality caused by dissociative states. What some have called the "Sublime" or "enlightenment"... In the Scandinavian tradition, the Berserk is a warrior who fights in a state of trance caused by his animal spirit (a bear, a wolf or a wild boar). This spirit animal makes it overpowering, it enters a state of invincibility and becomes capable of implausible exploits. In English the term "to go berserk" means in colloquial language "go mad furious" or "lose self-control". These warriors of Odin were gathered in brotherhoods where each aspirant had to pass an initiation like to kill ritually the bear then drink his blood so that the power of the beast is infused in him. The warrior then became a Berserker and obtained in addition to his fury, a gift of metamorphosis allowing him to change the perception that others have of him by appearing in a form Animal. During their fits of fury, the Bersekers left erase their human spirit to let the animal spirit take control. All young warriors had to go through an important ritual with the sorcerer of their brotherhood: the Ritual of Awakening. This ritual was at the very origin of their sacred anger... either they survived or they died. The Ynglinga Saga describes these warriors as follows: "His men (odin's) were moving forward without armor, enraged like dogs or wolves, biting their shield, strong like bears or bulls, and killing people in one fell swoop, but they, neither iron nor fire sorry. They were called berserkers." (Wikipedia)

Here we have a good example illustrating what is a deep altered state of consciousness, a state of dissociative trance in which the warrior achieved that absolute courage provoking a feeling physical invincibility and immortality. The fact of let the human mind fade away to let the animal spirit take the control may mean that it is a split of the personality of the warrior, a deep dissociative disorder that leads to the creation of an alter animal, here a bear or a wolf. This is what is now called a Disorder Dissociative of identity that one of the alter personalities believes truly that it is an animal (see chapter 5). The brotherhood aspect involving initiation rituals with a sorcerer-priest reinforces the possibility of a certain programming based on trauma if one believes the Ritual of Awakening of which the candidate could not coming out alive!... if he came out alive, it was with a sacred anger, that is to say, a personality divided by trauma. The warrior ended up with an alter personality "enraged" by the traumas experienced during the ritual. The dissociative process is a key to initiation found in various types of cultures. he is likely that the dissociation and splitting of the personality is still today a key point in the initiatory protocols of companies modern secretes.

in his work entitled "Metamorphoses", the writer Apulée seems to describe his own initiation to the Mysteries of Isis and of Osiris to whom he would have been initiated during his stay in Greece: "The high priest then removes the laymen, makes me put on an ecru linen dress, and, taking me by the hand, takes me into the deepest part of the sanctuary. No doubt, my reader friend, your curiosity will enquire about what is said, ae what was done next. I would say so, if I may say so; you would learn it if it were allowed to be learned. But it would be crime to the same degree for confidant ears and for revealing mouth. If however it is a religious feeling that animates you, I would make scrupulous of you torment. Listen and believe, because what I say is true. I touched the doors death; my foot landed on the threshold of Proserpine. On the way back I have traversed the elements. In the depths of the night, I saw the radiating sun. Gods of hell, gods of Empyreus, all were seen by me in front of face, and adored closely. That is what I have to say to you, and you will not be more enlightened! [112]]."

We therefore find here three essential components of secret societies of the Masonic type: death and resurrection, the trial by the elements and finally the enlightenment. It is possible that it this is a traumatic ritual leading the candidate for initiation into an experience on the borders of death (I have touched the gates of death) with a deep state of dissociation illuminating his consciousness (I saw the sun radiating) just like the Amerindians enter into a dissociative trance during the "Dance of the Sun". one

"dance" which is nothing more and nothing less than a traumatic ritual aimed at doing access the initiate to altered states of consciousness (we will return below to this "Dance of the Sun" Amerindian).

Ancient Egypt seems to be the meeting point between the dark side of modern secret societies and Satanism, the roots of worship

phallic. David L. Carrico's work entitled "The Egyptian- Masonic- Satanic Connection" gives us some insights into this issue.

American Satanist Michael Aquino, who has been repeatedly accused ritual abuse and mind control of children (without any condemnation), founded in 1975 the Temple of Set, a famous satanic occult order of the United States. Set is the Egyptian name of Satan, Albert Churchward writes about it: "This Sut or Set was originally a god of the Egyptians, but he was also the god of the South Pole, or southern hemisphere, this is amply proven and confirmed by the monuments as well as by ritual. Set or Sut, according to Plutarch, is the name Egyptian typhoon, the Satan of christian worship! [113]]."

In his book "Antichrist Osiris", Chris Relitz writes that according to Plutarch, Greek historian of ancient Rome, it was the widow of Osiris who founded the religion of the Mysteries. While the Mysteries religions spread throughout the world from ancient Babylon, they manifested themselves in various places by changing only the name of the gods and making some variations in the rituals.

It is in Egypt that the Mysteries seem to have developed at the highest level level. The 33rd degree Freemason Manly Palmer Hall wrote in his book "Freemasonry of the Ancient Egyptians": "It is today generally recognized that of all the ancient peoples, it was the Egyptians who were the best trained with regard to the occult sciences of Nature. The wisest philosophers of others nations visit i Egypt ann a erre inities to the Mysteries sacres by the priests of Thebes, Memphis and Hermopolisi[114]."

the

is undeniable that the cult of the Egyptian Mysteries has a deep connection with modern Freemasonry. In his book "Freemasonry its Hidden Meaning", George H.

Steinmetz writes: "Regardless of the origin of the modern lodge, or the name 'Freemason', we can, after removing the symbolism of the adaptations modern, discern in Freemasonry the outline of the teachings of ancient Mysteries of Egypt! [115]."

Manly P. Hall a écrit dans “The Lost Keys of Freemasonry” : “Les premiers historiens francs-maçons comme Albert Mackey, Robert Freke Gould and Albert Pike had a common purpose which was to establish a correspondence definitive between hiram's legend of Freemasonry and the myth of Osiris exhibited in the initiatory rituals of the Egyptians! [115]."

in his book entitled "The Egyptian Origins of Masonic Uses and Symbols", the Freemason historian Jean Mallinger undoubtedly states that the candidate for the rank of master symbolically represents Horus: "Our Brother Goblet d'Alviella demonstrated to us in his study on the Origins of the Master Grade that the Initiate was in reality symbolized by the young Horus, son of the Widow, his divine mother Isis, whose husband Osiris had was murdered by Seth (or Typhoon! [117]))."

This is confirmed in the very official "Interpretative Catechism of the rank of Master": To the question "What is the widow whose masons say the sons?" the applicant for the rank must answer: "It's Isis, personification of Nature, the Universal Mother, Widow of Osiris, the invisible god who enlightens the intelligences."

the

this is therefore a cult to the "Mother Goddess", in opposition to God the Father (which as we have seen above is considered by this doctrine Luciferian as the "evil god"). The Mother Goddess is linked to the fertility, a belief that is systematically found in religions at accompanied by blood sacrifices as part of a fertility cult. According to Sir James George Frazer, egyptian rites included human sacrifices. in his book "The Golden Bough", Frazer writes: "As far as the ancient Egyptians are concerned, we can say from Manetho (Egyptian historian and priest) that they used to sacrifice and burn red men to then scatter their ashes (...) these barbarian sacrifices were offered by the kings on the tomb of Osiris. We can assume that the victims represented Osiris himself, who was killed, dismembered and cremated every year through these victims to accelerate the growth of seeds in the land (...) The reddish color of the poor victims is significant. In Egypt, the oxen that were sacrificed had to also being red, a single black or white hair on the beast disqualified her for sacrifice! [118]]."

The mysterian cults of ancient Egypt of which modern Freemasonry seems to be so proud contain traumatic rituals with orgies and blood sacrifices in honor of the "Goddess"? Are all these doctrines related to the cult of fertility still relevant in our "modern" societies? All these gods and goddesses do they still receive offerings today by certain sects?

Isn't the time of the Pharaohs ancient history? The many obelisks (the phallic cult) that grew on the great squares of our Modern capitals may tell us that no... Just like some revolutionaries and thinkers of the "Enlightenment" for whom Isis was the goddess of Paris (Parisis). So modern Pharaohs and Templars don't seem to have totally gone...

Now let's turn to the Egyptian Book of the Dead. It is a series of writings (papyrus) that have been discovered in Egyptian tombs. The ancient Egyptians attributed the Book of the Dead to the god Thoth, who would be the mythical author of the magic formulas of this sacred book. The Book of the Dead

Egyptian which dates from 1500 BC.C. clearly describes the practice of rituels magiques et traumatiques. Dans son livre “The Soûl in Egyptian Metaphysics and The Book of the Dead”, Manly P. Hall compare this ancient Egyptian sacred book with transcendental magic: "'The Book of the Dead has received a modern title that unfortunately does not really correspond to its Egyptian literary meaning. The reason for this name is obvious, but the impression it gives is strangely Inadequate. The text is indeed dominated by a spirit of transcendental magic! [119!] . "

In "The Lost Keys of Freemasonry", Manly P. Hall also writes that "if the identification of the myth of Osiris with that of Hiram is accepted, then the 'Book of the Dead' is the sesame of Masonic symbolism, revealing a beauty hidden under the rituals, an unsuspected splendor in symbols and a divine purpose activating the entire Masonic process! [120]."

like you will see, The Egyptian Book of the Dead contains bloodthirsty doctrines and practices (symbolic?) that can be compared with some testimonies of ritual abuse modern satanic. The sacred book describes in some passages the interaction between the soul of the dead and the gods (demons). A full symbolism of "splendor" according to the Luciferian occultist Manly P. Hall... There is talk of "blood-eater", "gut eater", "bone crusher", these are the qualifiers of the gods, who are none other than fallen angels.

The book makes a few references to a "torture chamber", a term that will certainly speak a lot to survivors about trauma-based mind control. Here are some excerpts from a translation: "So here is what great god of slaughter, powerful terror, he washes in your blood, he bathes in your blood." / "I got power over the animals by the knife in their heads" / "He took the hearts of the gods, he ate the red, he swallowed the green, their charms (magic) are in his belly, he swallowed the knowledge of every god." / "Unas (the king) devours men and lives above the gods, the one who cuts off the scalps" / "Unas weighed his words with the hidden god who has no name, on the day of the setting apart of the newborn" / "who devours the bodies of the dead and swallows their hearts, but he remains invisible! [121]]."

priests of the Egyptian Mysteries cults practiced theurgy, a magic said superior with the aim of communicating directly with the gods. here is what Porphyry (Neoplatonic philosopher) reports about the Greco-Roman nhilnsnnhe Plotinus, having once agreed to attend a session of theurgy: "An Egyptian priest who came to Rome and was introduced to Plotinus by some friend, had the desire to demonstrate his powers to him and offered him to evoke a sensitive manifestation of plotinus' guiding spirit. This one willingly accepted and the evocation was made at the temple of Isis, the only pure place, it is said, that he could find in Rome. On the call, a deity appeared who was not not of the daimônes class and the Egyptian exclaimed: "You are singularly favored, because the director daimôn that is in you is not of the lower degree, but a god! [122]!."

The word "daïmôn" is a Greek word meaning "demon" or "supernatural being" that can sometimes be interpreted as a "personal genius", a supernatural" that can sometimes be interpreted as a "personal genius", a

"guardian spirit", a "familiar" demon or an intermediary between the gods and mortals. In this book dedicated to the MK, the word "demon" or "demonic" will be used very regularly to qualify entities Luciferians, that is to say the fallen angels working to bring down man by all means with the declared intention of elevating him to the status of god. That's all the inversion that is currently underway in our world and it is the Main concern of our elites: the spiritual fall causing material worship to lead to the cult of man, finally worshipping the prince of this world, Lucifer, the "civilizing" god bringing light, the knowledge and emancipation of a god called "evil": this is the Transhistorical Gnosis described by Professor Jean Claude Lozac'hmeur.

The use of magic and traumatic rituals to contact demons, i.e. the Luciferian rebellion, for the purpose of to obtain guidance to make man a god, is part of the main prerogatives of luciferian sects of Masonic type. THE Freemason Oswald Wirth names these entities of another dimension the constructive intelligences of the world or the Masters transmitting their directives to the high initiates (the Unknown Superiors) connected to the high spheres of the afterlife[123]!... Chapter 6, a whole programme, will deal with this crucial question of connection to other dimensions.

According to Charles Webster Leadbeater, there is said to exist a "Black Masonry" that is dedicated to the study of evil between the 19th degree and the 30th degree of the Scottish Rite, the 30th degree being known as the Knight Kadosh. In his book entitled "The Ancient Mystic Rites", Leadbeater defines this Black Masonry as follows: "Rare are the Egyptian brothers who seem to have exceeded the degree of the Rose-Cross, these are those who need to know more than the splendid revelation of the love of God they received in what we call the 18th degree. but for those who feel that there is still much to learn from the nature of God, and who long to understand the meaning of evil and suffering

as well as its relationship with the divine plan, the prototype of a Black Masonry exists, education is between the 19th and 30th degree. This Section of the Mysteries was particularly interested in the work on Karma in its various aspects (...) Thus, the first stage of higher education, that of the Rose Cross or Red Masonry, is devoted to the knowledge of the good, while the second stage, that of Kadosh or Black Masonry, is devotes to the knowledge of evil! [124!.]"

Certainly all this remains hermetic for a layman but still leaves interrogative ...

In his book "La Conjuration Antichrétienne", Bishop Henri Delassus states that certain sections of the Kadosh knights worship Eblis (Iblis), which in the East is the name of the demon, the Sheitan. In his "Encyclopedia of Freemasonry", Albert Mackey explains that the Kadosh doctrine represents the persecution suffered by the Knights Templar. He writes that "the Knights

Modern Kadosh are the ancient Knights Templar and that the Builder of the Temple of Solomon is now replaced by Jacques de Molay, the Great Master Templar martyr! [125]."

it should be noted that the Order of the Templars to which this Black Masonry refers with the Kadosh doctrine, practiced satanic rituals.

Eliphas Levi wrote in his book "History of Magic": "The Templars had two doctrines, one hidden and reserved for the masters, it was that of Johannism; the other public was the doctrine Roman Catholic. They were thus deceiving the opponents they aspired to supplanter, The Johannism of the followers was the Kabbalah of the Gnostics, soon degenerated into a mystical pantheism pushed to the idolatry of the nature and hatred of any dogma revealed. To be more successful and to make supporters, they cherished the regrets of fallen cults and the hopes of new cults, promising everyone freedom of conscience and a new orthodoxy which would be the synthesis of all persecuted beliefs. They in thus came so far as to recognize the pantheistic symbolism of the great masters in black magic, and, to better detach oneself from obedience to the religion which in advance condemned them, they returned the divine honors to the monstrous idol of the Baphomet, as in the past the dissident tribes had loved the golden calves of Dan and Bethel. Recently discovered monuments, and valuable documents that date back to the eleventh century, prove in a way more than enough everything we have just put forward. Further evidence are hidden in the annals and under the symbols of occult masonry! [125]]."

In his book "The Occult Conspiracy", Michael Howard listed the charges made against the Templars at the time of their arrest in 1307: "The Templars were accused of denying the principles of faith Christian, spitting and urinating on the crucifix during secret rituals initiation, to worship a skull or a head of Baphomet, to make anointings with blood or fat from unbaptized babies, to worship the devil under the form of a black cat and commit acts of sodomy and zoophilia (...) Candidates entering the Order must also embrace their initiator on the mouth, navel, penis and at the base of the spine. those oaisers were regarded by critics ae i urare as evidence of their perverse sexual activities, but in the occult tradition, the navel, sexual organs and perineum are the physical locations of psychic centers of the human body, known in the East as Chakrasi[127]."

Accusations also reported by Helen Nicholson in her book "The Knights Templar: A New History". The British historian Nesta H. Webster writes that "The Confessions of the Knights (Templars) would they be the result of a pure imagination that men under the torture coercion could have invented? It's hard to believe that the testimonies of the initiation ceremony could be a pure invention, it was given in detail by men in different countries, all the testimonies were similar, only the phraseology was Different. If they had been led to invent a story, the testimonies would have contradicted each other (...) Of course not. each seems to have describes the same ceremony more or less in its entirety! [128]."

Author Donald Michael Kraig claims that the Templars designed their sexual rituals from the Sufi teachings of the Arab world, which came themselves from the Indian Tantric tradition, teachings that then found themselves among the alchemists of the Middle Ages and finally among modern occultist magicians. We will return later to the sexual magic.

Black Masonry therefore nourished a revenge against the persecutors of the Knights Templar: the Catholic Church. In "The Ancient Mystic

Rites", Leadbeater writes that "The Tradition of Vengeance against the Execrable King, the Pope and the Traitor has been transmitted through the ages, and is intimately linked to the Egyptian tradition corresponding to our Black Masonry which results in this that we call today the 30th degree! [129]."

the

Black Masonry with the Kadosh Knights, the modern Templars, has therefore worked ardently for the destruction of the Kingdom of France and its Church. the Occult struggle of Freemasonry against the King and the Catholic Church is explained in detail in the excellent work of Bishop Henri Delassus entitled "La Conjuration Antichrétienne". the Freemason made knight Kadosh is therefore firmly anti-Catholic and the "revenge" is a central point in this Masonic initiatory grade. "When knight Kadosch has taken his oath, the dagger is put in his hand, and a crucifix is placed at his feet, then the 'very tall' said to him: "Crowd in the foot this image of superstition, break it." If it does not not, in order not to make us guess anything, we applaud and the 'very-great' addresses him a speech about his piety. We receive him without revealing the great secrets. But if he crushes the crucifix, then he is made to approach the altar, where are three representations, three corpses if you can get hold of them. Bladders full of blood are in the place where he is shouted to hit. It executes the order and the blood reflects on him, and taking by the hair the severed heads, he exclaims: "Nekam! revenge is done!" So, the 'very great' speaks to him thus: "By your constancy and fidelity you have deserved to learn the secrets of the real masons. These three men that you just hit are superstition, the king and the pope. These three idols of peoples are only tyrants in the eyes of the wise. It is in the name of the superstition that the king and the pope commit every crime imaginable! [13°]]. "

Eliphas Levi wrote that masonry was not only desecrated, but it even served as a veil and pretext for the plots of anarchy, through the occult influence of the avengers of Jacques de Molay, and the continuators of the schismatic work of the temple (...) The anarchists have resumed the rule, the square and the mallet, and wrote on it liberty, equality, fraternity. That is to say, freedom for covetousness, equality in baseness, and fraternity to destroy! [131]]."

One important thing to clarify is that the international Masonic high lodges, whether "black" or called "pure" or "authentic", all get along and speak the same language when it is about destroying the Catholic Church. It is therefore an occult force

Anti-Christic.

the

it is interesting to note that Eliphas Levi in his book "The History of Magic"

magic) attributed to the Count of Cagliostro the establishment of Masonry

Egyptian on the Old Continent. He is indeed the founder of the rite of Misraïm or Egyptian, which deals mainly with esoteric research. Cagliostro also played an essential role in the spread of Cabalistic Masonry. Eliphas Levi accused

Cagliostro for having dishonored the Order and states in his book that it used black magic for the cult of Isis by hypnotizing young girls to make them priestesses: "Cagliostro was the agent of the Templars, so he wrote in a circular addressed to all the Freemasons of London, that the time had come to put their hands to work to rebuild the temple of jehovah. Like the Templars,

Cagliostro indulged in the practices of black magic, and practiced science fatal evocations; he guessed the past and the present, predicted the future, made wonderful cures and also claimed to make gold. he had introduced into masonry a new rite which he called the Egyptian rite, and he was trying to resurrect the mysterious cult of Isis. Himself, the head surrounded by strips and wearing like a Sphinx of Thebes, he presided over the Nocturnal solemnities in apartments full of hieroglyphs and Torches. His priestesses were young girls whom he called doves, and that he exalted to the point of ecstasy to make them return oracles

by means of hydromancy (...)

This follower is not, however, unimportant in the history of magic; his seal is as important as that of Solomon, and attests to his initiation to the most noted secrets of science. This seal, explained by the Kabbalistic letters of the names of Acharat and Althotas, expresses the main characters of the great arcane and the great work (...) The name of Althotas, master of Cagliostro, consists of the name of Thoth and the syllables al and as, which, read kabbalistically, are Sala which means messenger, sent; the full name therefore means Thoth, the messiah of the Egyptians, and such was indeed the one that Cagliostro recognized above all for master! [132]]."

According to Fritz Springmeier, an American writer and lecturer specializing in monarch mind control, one of the secrets of these religions at Mysteries, especially the Egyptian cult of the Mysteries of Isis was the ability to use drugs, torture and hypnosis to create multiple personalities in a human being. According to him, sex slaves under mental control are used nowadays in high degrees Masonic and other black back lodges. A dissociated alter personality can serve as a priestess during certain rituals. These MK slaves undergo trances, demonic possessions and all kinds of perverse rituals based on sexual magic. This initiatory knowledge has not happened dissolved with the fall of ancient Egypt: the occult world has never ceased to split and program slaves by a process of psychic dissociation based on trauma. This knowledge has been transmitted to the modern world through initiatory secret societies guarding preciously Pandora's box...

In her book "Terror, Trauma and The Eye In The Triangle", Lynn Brunet writes that the myth of Osiris and Isis, who takes a very important place in the Scottish Masonic rite, may well be a metaphorical illustration of the process of trauma and personality splitting. Brunet makes the parallel between the myths, rituals, Masonic symbolism and the psychology of trauma, it is to tell the functions of the brain that can be related to initiation practices aimed at creating a mystical experience. The human body can be taken as an external symbolic representation of the cosmos with a mystical reality internal and a physiology that offers a structure for its understanding. Lynn Brunet exhibits something complex that may not be very understandable at this stage of the book, which is why the extract has been put in Appendix N°1 under the title: Trauma and dissociation in Masonic mythology.

4 - Sexual magic and secret societies

The occultist Pierre Manoury, author of a practical treatise on sexual magic, defines this "discipline" as follows:

We can therefore catalogue magical sexuality according to three main criteria.

1) Abstinence, deprivation, maceration and chastity. This in a mystical context, a symbolic approach or communion with hierarchies spiritual of high nature.

2) By an exacerbation of the potentializing desire of the energies applied to rites and ceremonies of so-called practical magic, the eroticization being in this case only cerebral. This is the most common principle in the most of the ceremonial magics and basic rituélies of the high sorcery.

3) Finally in the magics and witchcraft grouped under the generic term of sexual magics or exacerbation and potentiation of desire and energies are followed by liberation in the ritual context itself, according to very special modalities... Applications in these specific cases are extremely effective materially, physically and mentally

Sexual magic can therefore be considered as a basis of ritual practices applicable at a very high level, by trained people (and responsible), and constituting one of the major instruments of power, if not the more powerful (...) Sexual magic is therefore an essentially based practice on a use of vital energy, which will have to be domesticated, filtered, captured, accumulated, developed, potentiated and then channeled as part of the ritual! [133]1.

Red magic (related to blood) and sexual magic are the two most powerful magics because they use the human life force to give power to the one who practices them. That is why they are usually combined. Sexual magic is inspired by Oriental tantrism, it aims to master the "Kundalini" and the immense sexual energy potential. In Tantrism, kundalini is identified with "Shakti", the snake goddess present in the human body at the base of the sacrum, supposed to rise along the spine, during a rise of Kundalini, to reach the brain by irrigating all energy centers (Chakras) of its power. In the book entitled "The Voudon Gnostic Workbook", Michael Bertiaux writes about Tantrism: "The secret of the Brahmins happens to be the basis of Tantric Physical Magic. This secret is the root essence of organic Hinduism and is found in the deepest levels of the Hindu brain, manifested by strange genetic mutations, due to the direct intervention of the Mother Goddess herself. This secret manifests its Power (Shakti) by a state of particular consciousness, a level of ultra-consciencd[134]]."

Since their first encounters with Indian religions in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Westerners have been both fascinated and repellent by the Tantra tradition; a form of religious practice very particular due to the deliberate use of impure substances and transgressive rituals. Tantras are works of an esoteric nature related to the cult of the goddess, they deal with Yoga, cosmology, alchemy, magic and sacrifices. Tantrism condenses all these disciplines millennia for the purposes of erotic-magical and spiritual realization. have long been for Western writers something at a time of repugnant and enticing. Today, especially through the growing influence of the "New Age", tantrism is seen as a simple method of releasing body and mind, a form of "sexuality spiritual" in which sexual pleasure becomes an experience

nun. It is seen as a way of transgressing morality the so-called "repressive" western approach to sexuality. Tantrism is today became a very lucrative fashion for some gurus, however little Western followers of the New Age philosophy know what certain rituals of authentic Tantra entail.

Krsnananda Aagamavagisa is one of the greatest authors of Tantrism, he lived in the fifth century in Bengal. This author describes in his works of esoteric ritual practices involving the use of organic substances such as blood, seed and menstrual fluids.

Krsnananda also describes tantric rituals including sacrifice animal, today still practiced in Bengal. Blood sacrifices are related to the Vedas and Brahamic ritual practices, however, in the tantrism sacrifices transgress and deliberately violate directives given in the tradition of the Vedas. For example, the Vedas recommend sacrificing the animal with as little violence and suffering as possible, while that in tantric sacrifice, the animal is beheaded in a very bloody way, the ritual focusing on blood and the decapitated head, which are the offerings to the goddess. It would seem that tantric sacrifices involve a calculated inversion of the ancient Vedic texts: the unclean animal replaces the pure animal, bloody beheading replaces strangulation non-violent, the Goddess takes the place of the male God (we find again this notion of Goddess versus God! 135!).

the Sacred text of kalachakra tantra, the "Wheel of Time", contains a treatise on alchemy and demonology.

Here is what is written in Stanza 125: "The consumption of feces and urine, semen and menstrual blood, mixed with the human flesh, prolongs life. These are the five ingredients that go into the composition of nectar pills (...)
The consumption of the five fleshes, with honey and ghee, puts an end to all ailments." at note that in this same text it is indicated in stanza 154 that a veneration subtle entities "brings supreme happiness": "Snakes, demons, planets that influence men, evil Nâga who are revel in human blood, the Kushma goblin, the tutelary deities of the place, vampires, spirits that cause epilepsy and Garuda can bring supreme happiness, if they are revered in a mandala. "

Ancient tantric practices were taken up by twentieth-century Western occultists such as Aleister Crowley, a figure main in the importation of Tantra into the West with all the transgression and the "power by impurity" (or redemption through sin) that it Involves. Crowley was introduced to tantrism during his trip to India and the Sri Lanka in 1902, but he combined this tantric practice with different other techniques of sexual magic.

Tantrism with the phenomenal energy that it deploys perhaps diverted and combined with a powerful black magic, this was already practiced in Vedic times at the risk and peril of the initiates. Sexual magic is not not something innocuous simply pertaining to an elaborate "Kamasoutra". The arcana of these occult practices can lead the initiates more ambitious to commit abominations, both the search for power and psychic powers can turn them into real monsters perverse... Lebanon Silburn wrote in his book "Kundalini:

The Energy of the Depths” (Kundalini : l’énergie des depths): "The mysterious energy triggered by Kundalini Yoga manifests itself with violence and cannot be manipulated without run certain risks. Some deviations are called "demonic" because they lead to depression and madness... The awakening of kundalini may have disastrous consequences! [135]]."

in 1922, Krishnamurti had a climb of Kundalini that he qualified "ri w^ii spiritual" and that changed his life. Here is an excerpt from Darrel Irving's book "Serpent of Fire, a Modem View of Kundalini" that shows us that this Kundalini opens doors to other dimensions and allows contact with demonic entities: "Krishnamurti began to have chills and tremors and he complained of a intense headache. He had great pain, he seemed to be half unconscious and experiencing outings out of his body... At that time, the entity that Krishnamurti called Telemental" took over and she did this that she wanted... "I throw myself, I groan, I complain and I whisper things strange, just like a possessed. I get up thinking someone is calling me but I immediately collapse on the ground. I see strange faces and Lights... All the time. I have a violent pain in my head and neck... I will become a clairvoyant once all this is over or maybe that I'm going crazy!!" ... The Krishnamurti personality has moved into the background and it is the entity that has gained the upper hand over the functions of the body... There was the perception of this invisible presence that was working on his body, opening it and preparing it for the great spiritual mission... the process continued year after year... "Krishnamurti will even say that he was wounded in him because "they" had burned him inside! [137]]."

U. V V VII

in his book "Theories of the Chakras, Bridge to Higher Consciousness", the Japanese Hiroshi Motoyama reports things similar during a climb of Kundalini: "I hear like a buzz of bees... and I see a kind of fireball on the point to explode... my levitate body... my whole body is inflamed and I have a severe headache. I stayed in a feverish state for two or three days. I felt like my head was going to explode... During this experience

I met a horrible demonic entity. It was an experience terrifying and indescribable! [138]]."

the Kundalini is symbolically represented by a snake that rises while whirling around the spine going through the different Chakras. In his book

"The Secret Teachings of Ail Ages",

Freemason Manly P. Hall writes that the tree in the Garden of Eden would represent this kundalini fire and knowledge for the use of this sacred fire would be the gift of the great serpent, the temptation of the forbidden fruit: "Enough similarity exists between the Masonic CHiram and the Kundalini of mysticism

Hindu to justify the hypothesis that CHiram can also be considered a symbol of the Fire of the Spirit moving through the sixth ventricle of the column

Spinal. The exact science of human regeneration is the Lost Key of Masonry, for when the Fire of the Spirit is raised by the thirty-three degrees, or by the segments of the spine, and that it enters the chamber-dome of the human skull, it finally passes into the pituitary body

(Isis) where he invokes Ra (the pineal gland) and demands the Sacred Name. the Operative masonry, in the full meaning of this term, means the process by which the Eye of Horus opens (...) In the human brain, there is a tiny gland called the pineal body (...)

The pineal gland is the sacred pine cone in man. The unique eye that can't be opened without CHiram (the Fire of the Spirit) and increased by the sacred points that are called the Seven Churches in Asia (the Chakras)! [139!.]"

In Greek mythology, worshippers of Dionysus were often depicted carrying a stick topped with a pine cone. that represents the energy of the Kundalini as it moves up the backbone (the stick) to the pineal gland located at the sixth chakra, symbolized here by the pine cone. Indeed, we find the conceptions and the practices of Tantrism in Dionysism, Marcel Détienne writes in his book "Dionysus put to death": "The overcoming of the sacrifice that the Orphics and the Pythagoreans operate from above, Dionysism accomplishes it from below... the faithful of Dionysus... sing themselves and behave like ferocious beasts. the Dionysism makes it possible to escape from the human condition by escaping into bestiality from below, on the side of the animals, while Orphism offers the same escape on the side of the gods." In the Dionysian world, we call "Orgiasm" the practices corresponding to those of Tantrism. Orgiasm consists of in group ceremonies in which blood sacrifices take place, ecstatic dances and erotic rites. Dionysus presents himself under the double aspect of a god of Nature and a god of orgiastic practices, everything like Shiva in India or Osiris in Egypt. Orgiasm aims at deconditioning of the being, which returns for a moment to its deepest and most deepest nature Repressed. This return to animal instincts is an important aspect of the tantric method.

Sexual magic and the Kundalini experience are part of the teachings of some Western secret societies. This is a initiation reserved for members who already have good knowledge of occultism. Just like ritual sacrifices, satanic sexual magic allows a ootemr aes powers, ae ia "spiritual power as well as material favors. On the other hand, total abstinence and transmutation of sexual energy will bring an intense happiness much more stable than that brought by tantric sexual practice.

An article entitled "Sex and the Occult" appeared in the newspaper of the company "Dark Lily" refers to the use of sex as a means of accessing the subconscious. The author of this article claims that thanks to a sexual ritual, participants are able to access their own subconscious much faster than with other techniques such as prolonged meditation. With such a method "the multi-week work can be done in a few days or a few Hours! [140]!." Would sexual magic be the "Royal Art" (Masonic) of which the Freemason Wilmshurst quoted above speaks? A practice that would accelerate spiritual evolution to attain the status of a God?

The teachings on tantrism teach us, among other things, that a carnal and sexual relationship is a sharing of energy and karma. This has the consequence that the individual may find himself contaminated by psychic disorders or "bad karma" of the partner, or on the contrary, be deeply inspired if the partner is a spiritually very very being pure. In tantric practices, it is the sexual organ of a very young woman woman who is revered. According to Mahamudra Tilaka Tantra: "Girls over the age of twenty no longer have any power occult." Is the purity and innocence of childhood sought? in satanic sexual magic practices? Probably yes, just as with a blood sacrifice, it is a question of vampirizing this reserve of energy and purity. Especially when the child is in a deep state of dissociative trance that connects it to other dimensions. he is used as a real tool of power. The child is purity inpcirnpp the innnppnr'p rir> the f^T~p>a tin rides> U>ir'i qa <am îïlli îrp cnn sacrifice represents the ultimate offering to Satan. That's why we find systematically sexual perversions and blood sacrifices during satanic ritual abuse. The child's blood is of great purity and it is at puberty that the purest principle of it passes into the seed. It's on this that sexual magic and its aberrations are based.

in his treatise on sexual magic, Pierre Manoury makes a description of the conduct of a ritual in which the woman will have multiple sexual intercourses with several men at the same time, this in order to perform "a charge energy" in women. Here is what he then writes: "These somewhat scabrous descriptions do not constitute an incitement to debauchery, they are very discreet practices, stemming from millennia-old traditions. must know that they constitute ritual practices of energy manipulation in several traditions. From some very closed Western societies, Sabbaths of high witchcraft, from greek bacchanals to priapées in going through shivaic orgiastic rituals, etc (...) some branches of magic are quite elitist, sexual magic is part of them! [141]]."

In his book "Mémoire de sang : contre-initiation", Alexandre de Dànann teaches us that in the Assyro-Babylonian tradition the priestesses had the duty, during the "coitus sacer" (sacred copulation) with the initiates to the Mysteries, to impose on the means of specific techniques of sexual magic, the orders from the power of the Chaldean priestly caste. This is in order to prepare the events desired by the one that this caste called "Justice or Virtue First", being none other than Lucifer.

One of the "fathers" of Western sexual magic is Paschal Beverly Randolph. According to him "the true sexual power is the power of God", which can be used both as a mystical experience but also for magical practices used to get money, the return of a loved one or for all kinds of things...

Randolph's teachings on sexual magic have circulated widely in many secret societies and other European esoteric fraternities, especially at the Ordo Templi Orientis (O.T.O.).

Randolph, in addition to being a medium, had founded a religious order dedicated to the spiritual regeneration of humanity, named the Fraternity of Eulis, officially founded in 1874. Randolph declared that his new sect took root in the Mysteries of Eleusis, one of the many ancient Greek religions. Randolph was also related to the Rosicrucian tradition, but he affirmed that the Fraternity of Eulis was much more connected to the Mysteries than is the Order of the Rose Cross, which according to it is only a gateway to the sanctuary of Eulis.

Eulis' deepest secrets are largely centered around the rituals of sexual magic, in connection with the cult of fertility of the ancients religions to Mysteries! [142]).

These various ancient sects seem to have mixed the notion from the fertility of mother earth to that of human fertility, bathing thus in ritual orgies and blood sacrifices related to a certain calendar to honor and make offerings to gods and goddesses. the ritual abuse, blood sacrifices and sexual magic that take place even today, these ancient Babylonian practices follow:

it is the "nameless religion", the cult of demons.

Sarane

Alexandrian, the author of "La Magie Sexuelle : Bréviaire des sortilèges amoureux", reports in her book that it is the initiatory organizations, i.e. the secret societies, that have been charged with teaching sexual magic to initiates. Karl Kellner and Theodor

Reuss, two high-ranking Freemasons, are the two founders of the Ordo Templi Orientis, which according to Alexandrian, is a true school of sexual magic. In 1912, the O.T.O. published in the Oriflamme: "Our Order has rediscovered the great secret of the Knights Templar which is the key that opens all mystics Masonic and hermetic, namely the teaching of sexual magic. this teaching explains, without exception, all the secrets of the Nature, all the symbolism of Freemasonry and all the workings of religion! [143!."]

The Freemason Karl Kellner says he was initiated by an Arab fakir and two Indian yogis by whom he received "the mysteries yoga and the philosophy of the way of the left hand that he calls 'magic sexual][144]"' Kellner was at the head of a small group called "Inner Triangle" that practiced tantric-like rituals in order to create an elixir composed of fluids males and females...

Satanist Aleister Crowley created a Gnostic Mass (a sexual ritual), a ceremony in which seed and menstruation symbolize the sacred host. A ritual that has become a central practice for the Ordo Templi Orientis. Alexandrian states that the O.T.O. includes 12 initiatory degrees and that it is only from the eighth degree that we can begin to approach sexual magic... in starting with initiatory masturbation. The seventh degree is centered on the worship of the phallus under the symbol of the Baphomet.
The ninth degree teaches sexual magic itself, i.e. the way to perform the sexual act in such a way as to obtain powers. This degree is considered royal and priestly art, making followers capable of the Great erotic work. This is how the initiate becomes superior to the layman.

Dans son livre “Stealing from Heaven : the rise of western magic modem", Nevill Drury also claims that the O.T.O.

practice of sexual rituals with the use of blood, feces and the seed (red, black, white, the colors of the Great Alchemical Work). the livre “Secrets of the German Sex Magicians” donne

the three initiatory degrees of sexual magic taught by Aleister

Crowley and practiced by the members of the O.T.O.:

VIII°= Teaching of autosexual magical practices (masturbation).

IX°= Teaching of heterosexual magical practices, interaction between sperm and menstrual blood or female secretions.

XI°= Teaching of homosexual magical practices, insulation of the anus (per vas nefandum), sodomy, interaction with feces.

find that the teachings in sexual magic that arrive in last are those related to the rectum. In his book Shiva and Dionysus: The Religion of Nature and Eros, Alain Daniélou writes: There is a whole ritual related to penetration through the narrow door that opens onto the labyrinth (in humans, intestine). In Tantric Yoga, the center of Ganésha, the guardian of the doors, is in the area of the rectum. The male organ, if it penetrates directly into the area of coiled energy (Kundalini), can allow to awaken it brutally and to cause states of illumination and of sudden perception of realities of transcendent order. That is why this act can play an important role in initiation. This explains a rite of male initiation, very widespread among primitive peoples, although rarely reported by Western observers, in which insiders adult males have sexual intercourse in the anus with novices (...) This act is also part of the charges brought against the Dionysian organizations by their detractors, and against certain initiatory groups in the world Christian and Islamic."

Australian psychologist Reina Michaelson, who received in 1996 an award for his work on the prevention of sexual abuse of minors, states that in some rituals of the O. T.O., children are literally Massacred. The O.T.O. Sued Michaelson for these charges and a won the lawsuit. The psychologist had stated, according to her sources, that this secret society was a paedophile network of which some members practice trauma-based mind control as well than ritual abuse involving sexual magic. She also stated that this satanic cult had a lot of power because directed by very powerful and influential families, also leaving personalities of television are part of a high-level and covered paedocriminal network by the authorities. In 2008, a couple was sentenced to prison for refused to withdraw their allegations that the O.T.O. was a real network of paedocriminals. Vivienne Legg and Dyson Devine had to present their publicly apology to be released after seven weeks in prison! [145]l These multiple denials and systematic attacks in court by the O.T.O. serve to destabilize investigators and create disorientation about nature and the practices of worship. Under this surface swell, the occult hierarchy remains intact and in perfect working order.

Frater U.\D.\ the author of "Secrets of the German Sex Magicians" asserts that modified states of consciousness are sought by occultists through the sexual rituals to get what they call "powers magic". He cites for example an experiment he calls the "Gnostic Trance". This author encourages his readers to practice rituals that lead to an overcoming of sexual taboos and he insists on the fact that "through the use of bizarre practices and unusual, we access altered states of consciousness that provide the key to magical powers! [145]]." These are the kinds of statements that could explain the testimonies concerning ritual abuses whose perversity goes beyond understanding, even going as far as human sacrifice.

The violent and sometimes murderous rituals as well as the extreme sexual debauchery of these sects are to be linked to the notions of transgression, excesses of all kinds and violation of social morality. They are seen as the ultimate way to surpass the human condition and social order for access a kind of transcendence of the human, especially when this is accompanied by altered states of consciousness due to drugs and states dissociative: "Dionysian ecstasy means before all the surpassment of the human condition, the discovery of a deliverance total, obtaining freedom and spontaneity usually inaccessible to human beings... In addition to these freedoms, there is also the issue of prohibition, rules and conventions of ethics and social order! [147]]."

"Do what you want will be the whole of the Law", "There is no other Law than Do what you want." (Aleister Crowley)

The Thule Society, or the Order of Thule, was a German secret society that largely inspired mysticism and Nazi ideology. In its livre “Spear of Destiny” (La lance du destin),

Trevor Ravenscroft (former British soldier and journalist) explains that thule members, who practiced black magic, were behind the ascent in power of Hitler before the Second World War. According to Ravenscroft the members of the sect, as Satanists, were "only concerned about raising their consciousness through the practice of rituals can connect them to the evil and non-human intelligences of the universe, but also able to allow them to reach a means of communication with these intelligences. One of the main followers of this circle was Dietrich Eckartl[148!.]" Thule members also practiced a form of sexual magic derived from the teachings of satanist Aleister Crowley, including Dietrich Eckart was inspired to initiate Adolf Hitler.

Hitler joined the Order of Thule in 1919. Until 1923, Dietrich Eckart, who was his mentor, spared no effort to make Hitler a a particularly fervent follower of occultism and black magic. Eckart had received a message from his 'guide-mind' him saying that he would have the privilege of forming the "Anti-Christ". From the very beginning of their relationship, Eckart believed that Hitler was this avatar and by therefore, he did not forget any teaching, any ritual, any perversion, this in order to spiritually train Hitler for his future role. It is at from his studies of the powers engendered by occult practices perverse that Eckart conceived a ritual that he used when he opened the centers

(chakras) of Adolf Hitler to give him vision and the means of communication with the 'Powers'. Once his initiatory training was completed, Hitler felt that he was "born again" with an "over-personal" force, a force it would need to carry out its mandate orderly. Hitler used the Christian term "born again" to describe his initiation. It is interesting to note here that during an interview

George W. Bush's television for the 1988 presidential campaign, the journalist Barbara Walters asked him a question that made him startle. she asked him if he was a Christian... The future President paused, looking perplexed, and after a few seconds he replied, "If speaking of a Christian, you mean 'born again,' then yes, I am a Christian." Here is the answer we can expect of an occultist for whom the initiatory rituals in which he participated make of him a "Born Again". This is the symbolic process of "death and rebirth" applied in ritual abuses and mind control. The skull and bones secret society through which Bush father and son (and many others) passed practice rituals identical to those of the Thule order where Hitler was initiated, these are the practices of black magic. Ron Rosenbaum wrote about Skull & Bones in an article for Esquire magazine: "The (ritual) death of the initiate will have to be so terrifying that it requires the use of human skeletons and psychological rituals (...) sexual perversion is part of these psychological rituals (...) naked in a coffin, the initiate will also have to tell his darkest and deep sexual secrets during initiation! [149]]." We will return in more detail to this question of the "initiatory resurrection" in Chapter 4.

This initiatory black magic that transcended Adolf Hitler combined sexual perversion and enlightenment caused by profound altered states of consciousness, i.e. a mixture sexual magic and trauma-related dissociation. These rituals involved highly perverse and sadistic practices: sodomy, orgies, animal sacrifices, floggings... Ravenscroft reports that Hitler had was heavily tortured during these traumatic rituals, including during a "magical, sadistic and monstrous ritual" after which he became helpless. This impotence was not a castration physical, it had a deep psychological origin due to the extreme sadism and masochism of rituals. Hitler's relationship with Eva Braun were of the same order. Trevor Ravenscroft also wrote about of Hitler: "Sexual perversion took a place central in his life. A monstrous sexual perversion that was truly at the heart of his existence and who was the source of his powers mediums and clairvoyance." In his book "Hitler - A study in Tyranny", Alan Bullock writes: "His power to bewitch a crowd is to be put in connection with the occult art of African 'medicine- men' or Asian shamans; others compared this to the mediumistic sensitivity or magnetism of a hypnotiseur."

those

rituals of black magic and sexual magic open doors to the world of spirits, these provide initiates with a certain power as well as psychic powers. In 1921, at the age of 33, Hitler was totally owned by a hierarchy of demonic spirits and he was finally ready to take the leadership of the National Socialist Party. No one can understand the monstrosity of Hitler's plans without knowing the satanic perversion in which he had immersed himself long before he came to power. Hitler received a real protection of supernatural order to carry out its mission. In his book "Hitler, Medium of Satan", Jean Prieur reports that on several occasions the future Fürher would have been saved thanks to

"dark forces" during the First World War: "However, a voice speaks in him muted and orders him to move as far away as possible the trench; so he continues to walk like a sleepwalker. Suddenly a burst of iron and fire forces him to put himself on the ground. The explosion is all close (...) When calm has returned, he hastens to the trench and no longer recognizes anything. Instead of the squad shelter, it is a gigantic funnel dotted with human debris. All his comrades were killed. It was since that day that he was convinced of his divine mission.

For the fifth time, Providence intervened on its behalf (...) In the summer of 1915, he was again saved in extraordinary circumstances, which he told an English journalist, Ward Price, years later: "I was in the process of dinner in the trench with several comrades, when I had the impression when a voice said to me: "Get up and go there!" The voice was so sharp, so insistent that I obey mechanically as if it were an order military. I got up immediately and got away twenty meters away, taking away my dinner in my bowl. Then I sat down to continue my meal; my mind had calmed down. No sooner had I done that than a flash of lightning and a deafening detonation reached me from the trench I had just left. A shell misplaced had burst over the group, killing everyone! [150]]."

During the First World War, Hitler already seemed to have a serious baggage of occult and pagan knowledge. Jean Prieur reports in his book: "It was during the autumn of 1915 that he composed this curious and disturbing poem, where it is appropriate to see much more than a literary exercise:

> On biting nights, I often go into the silent
>
> clearing at wotan oak > Unite with the dark powers...

With its magic formula The moon

traces the runic letters,

And all those who are full of impudence during the day are made very small by the magic formula[151]. In this poem, Hitler refers to 'Wotan'', also called "Wodan", corresponding to Odin, the Norse god of the dead, the god of victory and knowledge. Scandinavia called him Odin and Germania named him Wotan. Adolf Hitler was totally adept of this old man Nordic paganism. This is why the Nazis created (or perhaps absorbed) the Ahnenerbe, a society for research and teaching on the esoteric ancestral heritage.

Hitler also escaped several attacks in an extraordinary way, such as in 1936 at the Berlin Olympics, but also in 1937 and in 1939. When some people around him were amazed at the little measures taken for his safety, Hitler replied: ''He must have faith in providence, one must listen to the inner voice and believe in its destiny. I deeply believe that fate has chosen me for the most great good of the German nation.'' Once he will tell Eva Braun: "Providence protects me and we don't have to no longer fear our enemies.'' ... Ravenscroft reports that during a press interview, Hitler said ''I walk like a sleepwalker dictated by providence.'' From what providence

Speak? Certainly of the "Luciferian providence", in other words the demonic possession for which it had been prepared for years initiations...

Aleister Crowley had proclaimed himself: "The Beast 666". His biographer, John Symonds, said: ''Sex had become for Crowley the means to reach God. He performed the sexual act not for joys emotional or for reproductive purposes, but to renew one's psychic strength.

He believed that this would give worship to the god Pan." In his journal Rex de Arte Regia, Crowley describes his practices of "Royal Art" (sexual magic) in specifying that he makes a wish during the rituals, usually for a return to school of money, and that he always ends up getting his desires. The ex-

occultist
William 'Bill' Schnoebelen made several public revelations about the rituals of Luciferian high masonry. Schnoebelen was part of the Church of Satan, he was a Freemason for 9 years, initiated in the 32nd degree of the Scottish rite, in the 90th degree of the rite of Memphis-Misraïm and in the 9th degree of the O.T.O. It also reached the 9th degree among the Rosicrucians. In 1984, he came completely out of the occult to become a Christian. Here is a conference excerpt in which he states that Masonic "Royal Art" is linked to practices of sexual magic on children: "These rituals contain a deeply sinister aspect but that I must address.

I apologise in advance because it is something vulgar. But we must talk about the "Royal Secret" of masonry and how it intervenes in this spiritual hierarchical pyramid (...) In 1904, Crowley had contact with an alien being (demon) named Iwas. this entity dictated to him a book during his wife's medium trances: the book of the Law. This book states that God is fallen from his throne and that a new conquering child-god comes to take his place. As a result, Crowley declared the end of Christianity and the advent of Crowlianism. In fact, he was a genius, he could play chess with his eyes closed. He was a poet accomplished, a painter and a writer. It was so covered with titles Masonic that he could have filled five pages of a book. This man was one of the most honored Freemasons in the world but he was also the man the most dangerous of the 20th century.

Following the Book of the Law, he began to do rituals to bring back this god-child. For this he founded what he called the sect of ''the Child fascinating'', and in doing so, he unveiled and revealed the Royal Secret of the freemasonry. Following the publication of his book, a man introduced himself her. This man was Theodore Reuss, a German occultist and leader of the O.T.O. (Order of the Temple of the East) which is the order of the Templars of the East, still Knights Templar... This man then told Crowley that he had revealed the greatest mystery in the history of occultism. What to Crowley replied that he did not understand what he was talking about. Reuss has it so initiated to the 9th degree of the O.T.O. and revealed the secret to him. This secret is that as a Freemason, immortality is promised to you. If you go to a Masonic burial, you will hear a sermon on immortality. you hear the promises saying that after their death they will go into the great higher celestial lodges for eternity. How do they get this immortality? They do not believe in Jesus. The name of Jesus is not even authorized to quote in the blue lodges of Freemasonry (...) Where do they get this promise of immortality? Crowley's indirect secret discovered, probably thanks to a demonic intervention, is that this immortality is accessible through operative sexual magic. This type of Sexual magic that we are talking about here is the rape of a young child, unfortunately. Crowley taught that one can live forever through the sexual vampirization of young children (...) I apologize, it's so horrible... But masons practice this. Not all of them! Please misunderstand me. But it is a problem important enough that I feel compelled to you in speak. This is the reason why masons think they can get immortality. Every time they defile a child, they steal a little of the youth of this child. (...) Then they think they can access alternative universes in which they will become gods (...) Crowley reveals the secret of the symbolism of the ''Eye that sees everything'' in one of his books, the book of Toth, which is a very advanced manual. This is the eye of Lucifer, but believe it or not, this symbol also corresponds to an organ that we name a delicate name: the rectum. Which is ironic when you know he also represents Lucifer. This refers to the occult and archaeometric doctrine of masonry which claims that by the sodomy bias, especially with young boys, you can access alternative dimensions of reality, through what they call 'typhoon tunnels' (vortex). They have this belief that through perversion sexual, they can access these tunnels, and the purpose of this type of magic is to find one's own universe and become the god of that universe.

Satan betrays these people by inciting them to practice evil. However, what is important is not to know if it works or not but to know that these people really believe in it (...) This form of magic is "Trans-Yuggothian" magic. This means that it is a magic that acts beyond plutonian space, a planet that they think they are out of reach of the Sun, and therefore out of reach of the rays of the Judeo-Christian God. They think there are entities beyond Pluto that are far more powerful, more dangerous, and more deadly than God or the devil. That is the thing these people are trying to achieve.

Do not misunderstand me! I can't say it enough: One or two masons out of a hundred practice such things. But it's more than it Need! And this is a serious problem[152]!"

According to Bill Schnoebelen, the sexual magic practiced on children would therefore be a key to accessing other dimensions and to obtaining power. A child tortured and raped during satanic ritual abuse finds itself in a state of dissociation, i.e. it itself becomes a door open to other dimensions (see Chapter 6 on the connection between trauma, dissociation and access to other dimensions). The practice of would sexual magic on a child in a state of dissociative trance be a source of youth? In such a state of dissociation, would the child be a kind of bridge, a medium acting as an intermediary for connecting the earthly world and the spirit world? Unfortunately, this this question comes to be asked because there is every reason to believe that this is a Pandora's box of which mind control is an essential component.

In his book ''Do What You Will: A History of Anti-Morality'', Geoffrey Ashe writes that Crowley had ''hypnotic powers'' that he frequently used to seduce women but he writes also that he was ''like three or four different men[153]''. Crowley himself described his altered states of consciousness in which he faced other imaginary entities, dissociative or spiritual. Did Crowley himself have a personality multiple, a personality divided by traumas related to its childhood? Did he have a dissociative identity disorder? In its livre "Magick in Theory and Practice", Crowley advocates self-punishment by scarification with a razor blade. the therapists who work with survivors of ritual abuse report that scarification self-harm is the most common feature of patients with severe dissociative disorders. Crowley joined the Hermetic Golden Dawn order in 1898 and was finally expelled in 1900. In 1901, a scandal splashed the Golden

Dawn, Theo Horos (Franck Jackson) and his wife have been accused of raping a sixteen-year-old girl. At the time, the judge found that the couple had used golden dawn rituals for the sexual exploitation of minors.

Selon Richard Kaczynski, l’auteur de “Of Heresy And Secrecy : Evidence of Golden Dawn Teachings On Mystic Sexuality”, les

Sexual magic practices would be something common within this secret society. It is likely that sexual magic is a teaching common to all these different Luciferian lodges.

The Golden Dawn is said to have been created following the discovery of mysterious Germanic documents. These were coded manuscripts that were deciphered and transcribed by one of the founding members of the Order, Dr.

William Wyn Westcott, a Freemason Subsequently, the documents were suspected of forgery and in order to clarify the issue, the author of "The Magicians of the Golden Dawn", Ellic Howe, forwarded Westcott's translations to an expert in graphology. This one has concluded that Westcott likely had a multiple personality disorder

(dissociative identity disorder) due to its different styles very marked writings. In his book "What You Should Know About The Golden Dawn'', Gerald Suster, a lawyer for the Golden Dawn challenged the multiple personality disorder argument by noting that a another important member of the Order, Israel Regardie, also had a style of writing that could vary and that he had never been diagnosed with a multiple personality or some psychiatric disorder... one interpretation of these variations in writing would be to say that these men have both dissociative disorders caused by ritual experiences

Traumatic. But this is an accurate diagnosis that is rarely done because few mental health professionals are trained to detect this kind of personality disorders [154].

Another secret society with a Masonic-type doctrine and structure is the F.S., Fraternitas Saturni or Brotherhood of Saturn. In his book entitled ''Fire ' '

Ice : Magical Teaching of Germany's Greatest Secret Occult Order", Eldred Flowers mentionne la F.S. comme étant une "sympathique

Luciferian organization''. Just like the O.T.O. and many books

Masonic, the F.S. gives considerable importance to the concepts and Gnostic terms. In this book, Eldred Flower frequently refers to "Gnosis-Saturnian" and specific sexual rituals.

Note that Linda Blood, in her book "The New Satanists'' reports that Eldred Flowers, for whom the F.S. is a "friendly Luciferian organization", assisted Michael Aquino at the head of the Temple of Set. Linda Blood knows what she's talking about for she was the mistress of Aquino and a member of this sect[155].

5 - Sacrifices, witchcraft, shamanism and multiple personalities

Archaeological evidence proves that the Ugly, Inca, Mayan and Aztecs have in common the practice of violent and bloody rituals. Looking into the subject in greater depth, it also appears that human sacrifice has also been practised in Europe. In an article entitled ''Vessels of Death: Sacred Cauldrons in Archaeology and Myth[156]'', Miranda Green refers to human sacrifices practiced by the Germanic people of the Cimbri and reported by the Greek geographer Strabo. The article describes that the ceremony was performed by the "holy women", one of them slit the throat of a prisoner of war and harvested his blood in a large bronze cauldron. Then his body was opened in order to inspect his bowels and organs for a divinatory purpose. Human sacrifice is a common heritage in the history of mankind, it is a practice related to the worship of demonic and Luciferian gods. Historically, early pagan rites included both animal and human sacrifices. The sacrifice of a human being as well as cannibalism seems to have held a certain place in ancestral and even contemporary rituals. In Kingship and Sacrifice: Ritual and Society in Ancient Hawaii, Valerio Valeri reports the existence of ritual sacrifices of humans practiced by priests until 1819, before they were banned. Valeri points out that human sacrifices were also used in witchcraft rites. The ancient Haitian Voodoo cult practiced the sacrifice of "the hornless goat", a euphemism that designates a human sacrifice[157]. Just as the term "long pig" (in reference to pork) refers to human flesh in the cannibals of Polynesia. Cannibalism has also been attributed to certain shamanic practices. A ritual of cannibalism is probably a traumatic experience both for the victim before his death, and for those who participate and survive the ritual. In ''Dictionary of Folklore, Mythology and Legend (Funk & Wagnalls)'' R.D. Jamison writes: ''The Cambridge expedition to the Torres Strait reported that sorcerers ate the flesh of corpses or mixed this flesh with their food after ritual practices. This results in them becoming violent and committing murders out of anger. Little is known about the processes that induce shamanic trance except that cannibalism causes the consumer to be in an inhuman or superhuman state."

In an article entitled "Sacrifices of raw, cooked and burnt humans[158]",Terje Oestigaard notes that human sacrifice is a common practice serving as an offering for the gods. This offering can be buried raw, cooked as a meal for the deities or cremated to ascend directly to heaven. Cremation is a transformation and a medium through which a certain transmutation of the offering takes place. Animal or human sacrifice can be perceived as a communion between man and the gods through a meal, it was often the central rite of paganism because it allowed to "share the table of the gods", but it also served as a cathartic act.

The Roman Emperor Julian was known for his pronounced taste for sacrificial acts and they are unanimously decried by his contemporaries, both faithful and detractors. He was described as never leaving his "amulets and talismans" and dividing his life between concern for the state and devotion to the altars. Libanios awarded him as a title of glory for having practiced in ten years, more animal sacrifices than all the Greeks put together. The emperor Julian made blood sacrifices as much in the temple of Zeus as in that of Tyche (fortune) or Demerit (fertility[159]).

In "History of the Wars", the historian Procopius refers to human sacrifice as the most "noble", preferably the first human captured in time of war. The god of war, Mars, was to be appeased with the wildest and bloodiest rituals by putting the prisoners to death. For these ancient peoples, bloodshed was a means of appeasing the prince of war.

In a travelogue among the Volga Bulgarians (Vikings), Ibn Fadlan recounts how different animals were sacrificed while the men of the clan raped a slave before she was killed and placed by her master on a boat. Then the fire was set on the boat to reduce to smoke the human offering[160].

Ritual killings seem to be common practices among wizards of the Cebuano culture in the Philippines. In the book "Cebuano

Sorcery: Malign Magic in the Philippines", Richard Lieban writes: "To become one of those who can practice 'Hilo', it is said that man must first kill a member of his own family, then he must make one or more victims every year. One of these wizards revealed that the obligation to kill grows every year. The longer the sorcerer practices his magic, the more frequently he will have to kill. All informants agree that when the sorcerer assumes such obligations, if he does not commit the murders according to the schedule, he himself will become a victim, struck by his own instruments of witchcraft that will turn against him. As one sorcerer says, 'If he does not kill, he will get seriously ill, and he will only be better when he is dead. If he does not kill pa.s, he will die[161]'."

In one of his lectures on the theme of "New Age", Father Jean Luc Lafitte reports what he experienced in Gabon: "I preached several retreats in the bush (...) We heard every night the melodies of these sorcerers who worked on the a.deptes of their religion. It is a hallucinogen that he reduced to powder and that he made the a.deptes drink to make them dance all night to the sound of the drum. After a while, all these people were entering a trance (...) Once they were in a trance, the sorcerer managed to completely empty their personality, so much so that to progress in this system of false religion, you had to do something that the guru asked you. The first initiation was to kill an animal, so at first it was necessary for example to cut the neck of a hen. The second step was to kill an enemy and the third step was to kill a member of his family. The fourth step is to killyourself..." Here we find three things common to modern ritual abuse testimonies: drugs, trance states and blood sacrifices. Western survivors say they were first forced to kill an animal, and then sometimes a human being, usually a baby. The fourth step described by Abbé Lafitte, which consists in killing oneself, may correspond to the programming of suicide among victims of mental control (MK), but the abbé does not specify in what context or in what way this fourth stage can be triggered in the tradition he describes.

Initiation traumatic rituals are a common factor in many traditions practicing witchcraft and spirit worship. In his book

"La Conjuration antichrétienne", Bishop Henri Delassus writes: "Satan had temples erected and altars erected on all places of the earth and he had a cult as ungodly as it was superstitious. How many times did the chosen people themselves allow themselves to be led by him, to the point of sacrificing to "Moloch" even his children! (...) The missionaries of the xlIth century were very surprised when, leaving france slightly skeptical at the time, they landed in the East Indies and found themselves in the middle of the strangest diabolical manifestations. Both voya,geurs and missionaries today witness the same wonders. Mr. Paul Verdun has published a book: "The devil in missions" (...) Apparitions and possessions are frequent things in them, known and accepted by everyone. In all these countries there are sorcerers. To become so, one must undergo cruel trials that go far beyond the most painful prasques of Christian mortification. In most of these initiations, a manifestation of the devil shows that he accepts the candidate as his own, he makes a possessed one where he removes him[162].

In Papua New Guinea, traumatic rituals aimed at terrorizing the initiate are an integral part of local cults. In his book "Ritual and Knowledge Among the Baktaman of New Guinea", Frederik Barth describes how a Baktaman novice who was so terrified of the course of initiation literally defecated on it. In the book Rituals of Manhood: Male Initiation in Papua New Guniea, Gilbert Herdt reports that in the Bimin-Kuskusmin initiation, novices are totally terrorized by the ceremony of piercing their nasal septum and burning their forearms. This creates serious trauma and the author reports that signs of profound psychological shocks have been observed in several individuals who have gone through this initiation. In his analysis of the Orokaiva initiation of the Papuans, in the book Exchange in the Social Structure of the Orokaiva, Erik Schwimmer writes that one of the functions of these rites is to provoke "absolute and lasting terror in the candidate". All ethnographers who have studied the Orokaiva have pointed out the particularly terrifying nature of the packed ceremony. Several authors have reported that a real panic is deliberately induced in young candidates for initiation, but they also describe the anguish of parents who witness the suffering of children. In "The Concept of the Person and the Ritual Sytem; An Orokaiva View'', André Iteanu even writes that there is always a risk that the child will not survive the trials of initiation. In his book "Prey into Hunter: The Politics of Religious Experience", Maurice Bloch makes an analysis of the ceremony packed with its sacred and transcendental character. According to Bloch, the most important effect of this ceremony is that the initiate is symbolically killed, or more precisely that his vitality is neutralized, it is then that he becomes a purely transcendental being (dissociated?). Following this initiation the child becomes sacred, so it is a question of conquering its vitality and putting it under a certain control. For this, the child is symbolically killed in order to transform him, to transcend his person so that he himself becomes a killer and no longer a victim[163].

Here we have a description that can correspond to the satanic ritual abuses "modern" with the mental control that follows. These are traumatic initiation rituals that aim to sacralize the child through deep dissociative states and a rebirth as a "Monarch" child; make him a killer rather than a victim, a full member of the Luciferian/Satanic cult.

The book "Cult and Ritual Abuse: Narratives, Evidence and Healing Approaches" by James Randall Noblitt and Pamela Perskin Noblitt addresses the anthropological aspect of ritual abuse and mind control using dissociative identity disorders (multiple personality disorder). The book reports many sources that concern traumatic rituals whose boundary between dissociation and demonic possession remains very blurred. Here are some of the sources they report in their book...

Isaiah Oke's book, ''Blood Secrets: The True Story of Demon Worship and Ceremonial Murder'' clearly addresses the issue of ritual abuse in West Africa. Isaiah Oke was the grandson and successor of an important Babalorisha, a Juju high priest. He tells in his book "the education and training" he received to succeed his grandfather. Oke describes the traumatic ceremonies he went through during his apprenticeship to become a high priest. He also describes the hardships he had to inflict on others, ceremonies that involved acts of torture and even murder during, for example, the ceremony of the "200 cuts" during which he had to put a man to death. He reports what appear to be classic experiences of dissociation when he refers to memory loss and possessions by the spirits of the village's ancestors. Oke writes in his book: "Our rituals serve to appease the most horrible of our gods. These gods are so formidable that our rituals must be just as formidable. We think that there is nothing better than blood to appease the ferocious spirits of Juju[164].

Oke compares African Juju to American Satanism. He explains that this cult is practiced openly in West Africa and even exploited commercially for tourists, but that it has another façade where the secret is such that some say that there is another religion, unknown to the outside world, within the Juju itself: "There is another place of sacrifice that we call the "Tomb", usually in the forest, far from the eyes and indiscreet ears. It is usually a simple well-camouflaged hut in which we call the Igbo-Awo (the secret of the forest). What is practiced in the "Tomb" are not harmless ceremonies, but rather macabre blood rituals[165].

In her book "Ritual: Power, Healing and Community", Malidoma Somé confirms isaiah Oke's statements about this African religion of Juju. Originally from West Africa, Somé studied at the Sorbonne and Brandeis University in the United States. It describes rituals in which people begin to speak with different voices and which show several personalities. It specifies that the priest who directs the rituals is able to act on the minds of those present so that they are unable to remember the events that took place. He relates the example of a man of the tribe who wanted to reveal the secrets of worship to strangers. Before he was able to do so, he allegedly had a psychotic attack and committed suicide. These testimonies are to be compared with those reported by survivors of satanic ritual abuses in the West. Some say they feel their minds blocked or "closed" when they try to remember the details of their abuse. They also say that they become particularly self-destructive, even suicidal, when they are about to talk or have just talked to someone about certain things that must remain secret. In the West, this establishment of internal secrecy is done by what is called MK-Monarch programming. It is a form of extreme conditioning that creates and manipulates programmed reactions with the help of deep trauma. (See chapter

British psychiatrist William Sargant (who worked for the MK-Ultra project), stated in his book "The Mind Possessed: A Physiology of Possession, Mysticism and Faith Healing' that dissociation, amnesia, personality modification as well as mental programming, was an essential part in the Orisha cult.

Orisha is the Yoruba term for the gods or the representation of the spirit of God. It is an African-American tradition originating in Africa. This term is used in Juju but also in Santeria which is a derivative of the Yoruba culture. In his book, William Sargant quotes the author Pierre 'Fatumbi' Verger who is said to have been introduced to these Orisha rituals: "Pierre Verger himself became a priest of the Orisha cult. He could not tell me much about the *secret ceremonies that took place at the convent, but he was able to reveal that there was a severe process of brainwashing in which the ordinary personality of the follower is replaced by a new personality. The initiate is never allowed to remember who he was, what he looked like, and how he behaved with his former personality. When the initiate leaves the convent, he is restored to his former personality by a particular process, but he keeps very little memory of what happened in the convent. When the a.deptes return to the convent, by the same reverse hypnotic process, they find their personality of devotees, which will disappear once again in their ordinary personality when they return to thesecularworld! 155! ."

Here we have an example of mind control based on a splitting of the personality with memories partitioned by amnesic walls (see Chapter 5). William Sargant also stated that "Some people are able to induce on themselves or on someone else a state of trance and dissociation caused by strong and repetitive emotional constraints, to the point where it can become a conditioning system of brain a.ctivity (...) If the trance is accompanied by a state of mental dissociation, the person can be deeply influenced in his thought and in his subsequent behavior.' Sargant makes a clear reference here to the process of mind control using dissociative states.

Author Fritz Springmeier described Haitian voodoo ceremonies involving trance and dissociation. Springmeier makes the parallel between these voodoo ritual practices and MK-Monarch programming: "The first reports on Haitian voodoo were written in 1884 by Spencer St John. His writings describe the blood rituals and cannibalism practiced in this religion (...) Blood sacrifices are often a.ssociated with demons and the possessed person will drink the blood of the sacrificed animal. Gemstones, herbs, trances and dissociative states are used to attract spirits. While the MK-Monarch slave undergoes dissociative states caused by trauma, the dissociative states of voodoo a.deptes are ritually provoked. Voodoo rituals involve singing, drum rhythms, sometimes clapping of hands, and frenetic dances to induce dissociated states. Several factors that cause these altered states of consciousness have been identified in Afro-Caribbean or South American religions. Then dissociated states often follow a period of food deprivation, hyperventilation is also used to achieve these particular states of consciousness. The beginning of demonic possession is characterized by a brief period of muscle inhibition with a collapse (...) During the trance, the limbs of the body as well as the head are taken with tremors, the person becomes so dissociated that he can pick up incandescent embers by hand. The possessed can be conscious, semi-conscious or unaware of what is happening to him (...) Voodoo rituals that induce dissociative states are usually a.ccompa.gnés of amnesia. During this period of amnesic time, the person behaved as if he were a spirit (a god). What has just been described here is more of a dissociated state induced by ritual than of a dissociated state induced by trauma. MK-Monarch programming aims to combine both at the same time: ritual and trauma, with the aim of creating and reinforcing a deeply dissociated state. This is why it is difficult to separate the religious factor from the MK-MonarcH167]programming."

Let us now turn our attention to shamanism, an essential subject when studying modified states of consciousness and interactions with other dimensions. Shamans are what are called "healing sorcerers" or "medicine men". It is a primitive system of medicine dating back to the earliest times, a discipline combining communication with spirits and the practice of exercises to obtain certain "spiritual powers". It is sometimes referred to as a "shaman warrior", an individual capable of reaching deep trance states during rituals, usually with the help of a drum, songs and ceremonial dances. He sometimes uses sleep and/or drug deprivation to facilitate these states of deep dissociation. Once in a trance, the shaman enters the spirit world, a dimension parallel to ours but just as real for the shaman. These trips bring him visions that allow him to diagnose health problems for example, but he may also have to deal with other problems concerning his community. In his spiritual work, the shaman is assisted by entities sometimes called "guardian spirit" or "guide spirit".

Some shamans are not limited to 'benevolent' spiritual activities and may use witchcraft related to dark forces when they need it. In his book "The Way of the Sacred", Francis Huxley makes a clear distinction between black shamanism and white shamanism. Harry B. Wright, in his book "Witness to Witchcraft", makes a similar observation among the Amerindian wizards of the Amazon, with the benevolent curanderos, and the malevolent feiteceros. It is also interesting to note that in the book "The Shaman and the Magician: Journeys Between the Worlds", Nevil Drury reports similarities between traditional shamanic practices and certain modern magic rituals practiced in some occult lodges of the Masonic type. He cites for example the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, the Golden Dawn. It is clear that the psycho-spiritual function, called psychic dissociation, is an essential point in Luciferian occultism.

It is necessary to make a clarification here with regard to "white magic" and "black magic", or "benevolent" or "malevolent" sorcerers. Here's what Anton LaVey, the founder of Satan's church, says about magic:

''LaVey makes no distinction between white magic and black magic, he claims that white Wicca witchcraft and ''new-agers'' freely call on the forces of the shadows to solicit them in their hypocritical desires. LaVey said: "All magic comes from the devil's kingdom, no matter how you dress it. The belief that 'black' magic is only used for destruction and 'white' for healing is wrong. Satanic magic is used to invoke the power of justice, it can be used to help you or someone else, as well as it can be used to harm someone[168].

''There is no difference between white magic and black magic, except in the blissful hypocrisy and self-deception of the ''white magicians'' (...) No one on this earth has ever studied occultism, metaphysics, yoga or anything else of the so-called ''white light'', without a gratification of the ego and with the aim of obtaining personal power[169].

Pierre Manoury also writes that there is no such thing as "white magic" or "black magic": "We often recognize a specialist by the fact that he has a slight smile at the evocation of the terms "white magic". The reason is very simple, white magic does not exist! (...) With all due respect to these good people and the beleaven herd that serves as their audience, white magic does not exist and has never existed. The term white mage is commonly used in the literature to refer to a follower performing only beneficial operations, as opposed to the black magician making an alliance with the forces of darkness. But here it is, it is literature, not initiation! There is in fact only one magic that is subdivided into several specialties. The notion of white or black magic is purely Manichean, simplistic and primary[170].

An important question regarding shamanism is whether these practices involve traumatic ritual abuse. How do shamans get these communications with the "spirits"? The hypothesis that these "spirits" may in some cases be personalities dissociated from the shaman is not to be excluded, and it may be that this personality splitting is created by rituals. Some rituals are not traumatic, others are and involve traumas with the function of producing fierce and intrusive alter identities that can easily be taken for demonic entities.

In his book "The Way of the Shaman", Michael Harner describes the initiatory journey of a shaman, but he does not develop the way in which the spiritual entities called "guides" or "guardians"[1] come to be part of the inner psychic world of the shaman initiate. According to Harner, the guardian spirit must come to the shaman following a severe illness or it is necessary to deliberately go to meet him during a "quest for vision". In his book, Harner uses terms such as "another identity", "alter ego" or "another self" in reference to the guardian spirit of the shaman. In the book "Primitive Magic: The Psychic Powers of Shamans and Sorcerer", Ernesto De Martino quotes an ethnographic account by Martin Gusinde who uses the terms "double personality", "second personality", "medium personality" to describe the shaman's interaction with spirits. De Martino also quotes a text by another shamanism specialist, Shirokogoroff, for whom the drum aims to "produce the attenuation of the awakened consciousness" and to "promote duplication (the coming of the "spirit") (...) During ecstasy, the degree of doubling of the personality and the elimination of conscious elements are variable, but in any case there are limits in both directions, that is to say that the state of the shaman must not turn into a crisis of uncontrolled hysteria, and on the other hand, that the ecstasy must not cease: indeed, neither the crisis of uncontrolled hysteria, nor the suppression of ecstasy allow the regular activity of the second personality and the subsequent autonomy of intuitive thinking." De Martino then takes up the story of Aua who interpreted her illness "as an invitation to become a shaman, as a vocation (...) After various troubles, he will finally find a psychic balance, and "instead of the threat of a dissolution of the unitary presence, he now constitutes a double existence (...) but an existence which, although double, is under the control of a single unitary presence, which emerges victorious from this extra.ordinary psychic adventure[171]".

All the terms used here may correspond to alter personalities due to a split of the shaman's personality. It can be a controlled and controlled dissociation of identity, in a way a shamanic management of dissociative identity disorder (see Chapter 5). The shaman would thus transform a sudden state into a dominated state, a passive dissociation into an active dissociation. The shaman is above all a sick person who has managed to heal, a healer who has healed himself. "During the dramatic and painful fights with the evil spirits, the shamans are engaged in a fierce battle with the physical and psychological forces they experienced during their illness[172] ."

In his book "How about Demons? Possession and Exorcism in the Modern World," Felicitas Goodman writes: "The Shaman Yanomamo in whom Hekura returned is no longer the same person as before. His facial expression is radically different, he moves in a way that has nothing to do with his habit... Even his voice is unrecognizable. Rarely will a practitioner of this kind later remember what happened[in 173] ."

So are we dealing here with real possession or deep dissociation with personality splitting and dissociative amnesia? Perhaps it is also a mixture of both. We will develop this particularly interesting topic in Chapter 6 concerning the link between trauma, dissociation and connection to other dimensions.

One element that could bring shamanic "possessions" closer to dissociative identity disorder (multiple personality) is that sometimes this "possession" of the shaman is only partial. The shaman enters into a trance but the entity does not necessarily take control of its body. This experience is often described as an "inner journey" during which the sorcerer tries to communicate with the spirits. This kind of mental functioning is perhaps related to the DSM-5 (American Medical Manual of Diagnostics) category concerning dissociative disorders and dissociative trance.

Michael Harner adds that a person can sometimes obtain a "guardian spirit" in an "involuntary way", but he does not say how. Is it through accidental trauma? Later in his book, Harner explains that the Jivaro tribe commonly gives its newborns a hallucinogenic drug whose purpose is to accompany the child in a process aimed at obtaining a guardian spirit... After briefly mentioning this practice of drugbing the newborn, he indicates that there are other involuntary ways in which the child can acquire a "guardian spirit", but without going into details.

In his book "The Occult: A History", Colin Wilson argues that traumas are part of the shamanic formation of certain tribes, he writes: "The shaman himself has completed his priesthood through the most terrifying rituals and initiations by pain! 174! ."

Douchan Gersi, the author of "Fa.ce in the Smoke: An Eyewitness Experience of Voodoo, Shamanism, Psychic Healing and Other Amazing Human Powers" wrote: "Becoming a shaman requires years of painful initiations. I have heard that many neophytes die because of the harshness of initiation. The neophyte endures the worst physical and psychological torments leading even to the *madnessl*175\."

In an article entitled "The Role of Fear in Traditional and Contemporary Shamanism", Michael York writes: "The use of shamanic techniques as a rapidly accessible tool to develop human potential, is in total disagreement with traditional tribal shamanism in which it is very rare for the individual to voluntarily choose to become a shaman. In an Aboriginal context, the individual conducts a long and arduous training to become a shaman, usually following the experience of a profound unwanted trauma[176\."

Mircéa Eliade describes thus an initiatory ritual of an Australian "man-medicine": "Finally, the third method includes a long ritual in a deserted place where the candidate must suffer, in silence, the operation is done by two old medicine-men: they rub his body with rock crystals so as to skin the skin, squeeze crystals on his scalp, pierce a hole under the nail of the right hand and make an incision on his tongue (...) After this initiation the candidate is subjected to a special diet with countlesstaboos! 177! ."

In his book entitled "The Makhuwa Heritage in Mozambique", Pierre Macaire writes about shamanic initiations: "Initiations take place in isolated places, huts, where the neophyte is delivered to sufferings that are comparable to those of a monster that engulfs and digests (dismember, tears the flesh of the bones and the eyes from their orbits) (...) The death of the neophyte then means a regression in the embryonic state, a regression which is not of a purely psychological nature, but fundamentally cosmologicall 178\."

Perhaps this monster that engulfs and digests is to be compared to the great god of slaughter that we find in the Egyptian Book of the Dead, a flesh-eater and bone crusher, powerful with terror that washes in the blood. A morbid symbolism possibly related to the initiatory rituals of death and resurrection.

Mircéa Eliade reports that shamanic initiations sometimes involve traumatic rituals as a result of which the initiate returns to the village with such amnesia that even the basic gestures of everyday life must be re-learned... and it is then given a new name. Here we find the principle of the tabula rasa following a radical trauma, a blank slate on which perhaps rewrites a new identity. This is the basis of MK-Monarch mental programming. Just as the traditional shaman will develop connections with the spirit world during his initiation, the satanic/traumatic ritual abuses through which the child passes will create a spiritual breach as well as a splitting of his personality making him an initiate. It then becomes a medium that bridges our world and the spirit world, an indispensable piece to embody and carry out projects established from other spheres.

Jean Eisenhower, a survivor of mind control, described a method used by a tribe to train a shaman by intentionally inducing trauma in the young child. The child is separated from his tribe for a few years by being locked in a cage a short distance from the village. We don't talk to him anymore, we don't take care of him except to provide him with the basic care. The child can hear the tribe but he cannot interact with the members and he will therefore split psychologically and turn his consciousness towards the grandeurs of the cosmos, the other dimensions of the being. These other dimensions are inhabited by entities that will interact with the child and with whom he will establish strong relationships. Finally the tribe reintegrates him with honor and benevolence into the village, but the young shaman will never be like the others again. for for the rest of his life he will do spiritual work for his tribe[179].

The film "A Man Called Horse" (1970) depicts traumatic shamanic practices inspired by real facts. The film tells the story of a captive white man from a Sioux tribe. Once the pale face has managed to show his hunting prowess and gain the respect of the tribe, he is allowed to participate in an initiatory ritual of tribal torture. The ceremony consists of hanging it in the air by hooks planted in its pectorals. During the torture, the man enters a trance that appears to be the result of physical suffering. His altered state of consciousness then provokes spectacular visions. According to North American Indian scholars, such rituals were practiced in the past and are still practiced today in some tribes. White men sometimes call this ritual "Sun.' Dance" (the Dance of the Sun), however the Indian term to describe this ceremony translates better as "Sun Gazing Dance" (the dance of contemplation of the sun). The author of "Lame Deer Seeker of Visions: The life of a Sioux Medicine Man", John Lame Deer, describes this ceremony as follows: "Dance is no longer as violent as it was in the past, but it still requires a lot of effort from a man. Even today, a man can faint due to lack of food or water. He can be so thirsty when he blows in his eagle bone whistle, that his throat becomes as cra.quelée as a river bed has dried. For a while, he will lose his sight by staring at the sun and his eyes will see only incandescent spirals and bright lights. When the eagle's talons (editor's note: hooks at the end of a rope) penetrate his chest, the pain in his flesh can become so intense that there comes a time when he will no longer feel them at all (editor's note: dissociated state). It is at this point, when the sun burns in his head, his strength is gone and his ja.mbes have flexed, he enters a trance and the visions occur. The visions of its transformation into a 'medicine man', visions of the future (...) It is when we fast on the hill or by tearing our flesh during the Dance of the Sun, that we experience sudden Vittumination, coming from the Great Spirit. This enlightenment, this discernment does not come pa.s easily, and we do not want pa.s of angels or saints to bring us in*second hand*[180]. " The American authorities banned the Dance of the Sun and other tribal rites in 1881. The practice continued, however, underground until 1934, when the ban was lifted by the Indian Reorganization Act.

Here again, we find that rituals causing extreme physical and psychological suffering lead to deep dissociative states that open the door to a form of spiritual enlightenment. In the book "Kahuna

Magic", Brad Steiger states that circumcision was practiced among Hawaiians as a kind of blood ritual. Without anesthesia, circumcision is an extremely painful ritual experience that certainly causes a profound alteration of consciousness - to escape the unbearable pain - the infant then enters a deep dissociative state... What are the future consequences?

M.D. Lemonick, the author of a Time article entitled The Secret of Maya, reports that in Mayan culture (from Mexico and Guatemala) the profound altered states of consciousness had religious significance for the community. Lemonick writes that the rituals ma.cabres of bloodletting a,ccompa,gn were any major political or religious event in the ancient Mayan culture (...) *The intense pain of such rituals provoked visions allowing initiates to communicate with ancestors and with mythological entities*l181].."

Dr. James Randall Noblitt hypothesizes that repeated experiences of trauma are necessary for the creation of dissociated identities. However, some blood rituals including sacrifices and cannibalism can probably lead to the mental integration of the image of the victim, or the entity (god or goddess) that the victim symbolizes, which would thus facilitate the creation of dissociated identities or alter personalities among worship followers.

It is with the discovery of the deep states of dissociation caused by traumatic rituals that some shamans gave birth to a new spiritual tradition: The witchcraft and black magic. Such a traumatic and diabolical practice has obvious drawbacks (violence, pain and the total abandonment of all morality) but on the other hand, this witchcraft is capable of producing powerful and lasting experiences of possession and dissociation creating links with demonic entities, purveyors of various powers.

In many pre-industrial cultures, there was this desire to have the immediate presence of the gods in the community. Such a thing was possible when a god took possession of an individual. Among all the methods of invoking the gods, the use of traumatic techniques was the most effective way of producing possession and thus of obtaining the immediate presence of a god or a deity. In most cultures, traumatic rituals had to remain secret, when personality splitting and traumatic amnesia worked effectively, so the victim could not reveal the details of the ceremony. It has been shown with dissociative patients that when dissociation gradually disappears, it facilitates the return of traumatic memories.

Through repetitive observation, malevolent wizards understood that they could create particular 'entities' that could be at their service. Isiah Oke calls this entity the Iko-Awo or slave spirit. The slave spirit is probably a dissociated alter personality that is created in the victim during a traumatic ritual. The Iko-Awo is instructed to do whatever the sorcerer commands him to do, including committing suicide. The victim will be amnesiac of the traumatic ritual and ignorant of the evil programming that took place during the initiatory ritual. "The slave spirit" is therefore a dissociated mental state, comparable to an alter identity in an individual with a multiple personality. The slave spirit is created by the sorcerer during a traumatic ritual, usually during childhood. The victim will remain amnesiac of the abuse and the existence of this programming. This process may be similarly found in some patients with dissociative identity disorder. They are usually amnesic of the abuses that caused their dissociation and their alter personalities.

The black magic associated with mind control probably works that way. When a spell is thrown, a curse or trigger signal is given, "the slave spirit" is called to surface and take control of the victim's body. This "slave spirit" is programmed by the sorcerer to perform particular tasks. Commands can be a simple signal to which the victim has previously been conditioned during a traumatic ritual to meet the request of the sorcerer. When the sorcerer has effectively programmed several individuals from the same tribe, then his community will have great fear and respect for him or her, especially after such "magical powers" have been publicly demonstrated. Wizards who themselves have dissociated personalities (assimilated to gods or deities by laymen) will probably be considered even more "powerful". Such practices are secretly transmitted from generation to generation in the families of sorcerers and occultists. It is important to note that in many cultures, witchcraft is considered hereditary. In the United States, the problem of ritual abuse is frequently multigenerational, and another worrisome feature of witchcraft in many cultures is incest.

Now let's look at alchemists and kabbalists. Alchemists are known for their research on the "philosopher's stone", supposed to change lead into gold. Some interpret this as a metaphor representing the process that the individual goes through to transform into a spiritually higher being. According to Robert Ziegler, in alchemy suffering is considered a process of "purification of the basic nature of man to transform it." Indeed, the trials and sufferings of life make it possible to evolve, it can be the more or less difficult hazards occurring throughout the life of an individual, sometimes painful experiences that shape the person and that allow him to overcome them and evolve. However, this notion of transcendence through suffering and pain applies and is embodied in a much more basic way through traumatic initiation rituals causing direct physical suffering. Suffering that triggers a neurological process of transcendence: dissociation, a function that allows the initiate to overcome and overcome the physical and psychological pain intentionally caused during rituals. This dissociative process also allows access to another reality. All this is summarized in the Masonic formula "Ordo ab Chao" (order by chaos), a formula closely related to alchemy.

The search for the elixir of life and the fountain of youth by alchemists may represent the desire to escape the limitations of mortality through magic. The infamous Gilles de Rais was tried and convicted in 1440 for the murder of one hundred and forty children. The one who was nicknamed "Bluebeard" looked for the philosopher's stone in the blood of the children with whom he worked in the manner of an alchemist... An isolated madman? Unfortunately, the Child is a source of youth for the worst occultists of yesterday and today.

Alchemists are also interested in the creation of the homoncule, a replica of an artificially created human being, just like the "golem" of kabbalists. In his book "The Sorcerer Handbook", Wade Baskin explains that a "golem" is a kind of homoncule. In the Kabbalistic tradition and Jewish mysticism, the golem is an automaton humanoid, a zombie without soul or conscience created by a magician, a sorcerer. It is possible that the homoncule of alchemists and the golem of kabbalists are in fact references to dissociated personality states that can be created by traumatic rituals. In "The Golem and Ecstatic Mysticism", Bettina Knapp wrote that golems are created in the phenomenal or experimental world of occultists when they are in a modified state of consciousness. In Jewish mysticism, golems are soulless bodies and one can think that at one time, when traumatic rituals and dissociative trance ended up creating an alter identity, this fraction of magical personality could be considered an empty shell without a soul, because created only by magic. For the sorcerer, this alter personality did not exist as a real person, she was simply a golem. She could therefore be a victim of violence and be used as a soulless robot to serve as a slave.

In 1932, Joseph Achron composed a suite for orchestra entitled "Le Golem''. The first part of the work introduces the golem while the last part, which is the exact inverted mirror of the first part, represents the disintegration, the dissolution of the golem. Fritz Springmeier argues that mind control techniques use musical sequences to bring out the deepest alter personalities in a programmed individual. The inversion of this musical sequence will dissolve again the alter, the golem, in the depths of the psyche of the victim. We find here what William Sargant described with the Orisha cult in which the different personalities of the followers come and go according to certain occult processes of which only the high initiates know the workings.

In his book Kabbalah, Gershom Scholem describes kabbalistic doctrine with some of its magic practices. "Various ideas and practices related to the concept of golem also take their place in the practice of Kabbalah thanks to the combination of the characteristics of the Sefer Yezirah and a number of magical traditions." The operative part of kabbalah that concerns the creation of the golem uses trances, magic and visualizations. Scholem writes: "In this circle, the Sefer Yezirah is almost always interpreted in the manner of Saadiah and Shabbataï Donnolo (editor's note: two authors involved in Satanism), with a tendency to see this book as a guide for mystics and followers of magic. The study and understanding of this book is considered a success when the mystic reaches the vision of the golem, which is linked to a specific ritual with a remarkable ecstatic result (editor's note: altered state of consciousness). ''

Jewish wizards used God's secret Kabbalistic names, in accordance with the precise instructions for creating the golem. Once created, the golem must in turn recite the combination of Hebrew letters but in the opposite direction. In addition, the "Seal of the Holy Name" must be inscribed on the forehead of the golem with the word "emet(h)" ("truth" in Hebrew and one of the names of God). At some point, to stop and dissolve the golem, the first letter (Aleph) of the inscription he has on his forehead is erased, resulting in the word ''met(h)'' which means ''death''. Fritz Springemeier argues that this type of occult programming is used nowadays to manipulate the deepest alter personalities in MK slaves.

It may be that the alchemists themselves were aware of how to create alter personalities. Through the experimentation of dissociated personalities, they would thus be able to lead to another of their quest which is the discovery of "spiritual gold": that is to say eternal youth, the fact of feeling youth even in old age. Such a thing can happen when a child alter personality takes control of the individual. Another thing that can also produce the illusion of immortality is the creation of an alter personality whose identity is transmitted from generation to generation. Some survivors of ritual abuse testified that their families practiced a kind of "ancestor worship". They thus think they are attaining immortality by inserting their identity into another individual who will live after them and this identity or personality will be transmitted successively in future generations. Do the damned souls of the ancestors then take possession of their descendants with a fractional personality and therefore wide open to act as mediums?

The scientists of the twentieth century who worked on mind control projects such as the MK-Ultra did not invent anything, they only took uppsycho-spiritual processes that had been discovered for a very long time by sorcerers, shamans and occultists.

Psychiatrist William Sargant who worked in the MK-Ultra program said that "methods of religious initiations are often so close to modern political techniques of brainwashing and thought control that one sheds light on the mechanisms of the other." He also wrote in his book "Battle for the Mind": "It is one thing to break down a person's mind by inflicting extreme stress on him... it is another to make new ideas firmly take root in one's mind.'' That's all the work of MK programmers.

This governmental and scientific interest in trance states, dissociation and psychic powers was motivated by the desire for absolute control over the individual, and more generally over the whole society and the whole world; unlike shamans and other tribal sorcerers who have no plans for a globalist conquest and whose practices only affect or affect their community.

Wizard-controllers have understood the advantage they can derive from this science of the mind to manipulate programmed, amnesic and loyal individuals. Mk-Ultra-type mental programming is a perverse deviation from the old practices to form a shaman. Through sensory isolation, torture, drugs, hypnosis, electric shocks and sexual trauma, the subject becomes both amnesic and totally enslaved. It can be programmed for this or that function; functions in which his physical and intellectual abilities will be much higher than average. During this traumatic process, he may also have developed paranormal psychic faculties such as mediumship and remote vision (topic developed in chapter 6).

It is only recently that mind control has modernized to become a science in its own right. Thousands of non-consenting human guinea pigs have been and still are subjected to such experiments. It is a real science, a psychic and spiritual surgery that does a lot of damage.

4 - Rituals of sacrifice in the Old Testament

The Bible teaches us that sacrificial rituals were a common practice in the pagan nations of the Old Testament. The Bible calls this type of ritual: "going through fire" (Jeremiah 32:35, Leviticus 18:21, 2 Kings 23:10). This ritual of sacrificing children to the fire is quoted by Moses when he declared the list of Laws against Sexual Crimes: Thou shalt not surrender any of your descendants to pass through fire in honor of Moloch (Leviticus 18:21).

Moloch is a demonic entity represented as a horned beast, an idol taking the form of a bull or a giant goat. The Bible did not include these rituals of child sacrifice in the list of sexual crimes for nothing. Modern satanic ritual abuses related to child sacrifices also involve rape and sexual orgies. Here are some passages from the Bible about the sacrifices of children serving as an offering to demons:

Anyone among the Israelites or among the immigrants who stay in Israel delivers to Moloch one of his descendants, will be punished by death. (Leviticus 20:2).

Thou will not do so with respect to Jehovah thy God; for they did for their gods all kinds of horrors which are odious to Jehovah, and even they burned with fire their sons and daughters in honor of their gods. (Deuteronomy 12:31)

Those of Avva made Nibhaz and Tartaq; those Sepharvaïm burned their sons by fire in honor of Adrammelech and Anammelech, gods of Sepharvaïm. (2 Kings 17:31)

They mingled with the nations and they learned (to imitate their works),

They worshipped their idols, Who were for them a trap, They sacrificed their sons and daughters to demons, They shed innocent blood, The blood of their sons and daughters, That they sacrificed to the idols of Canaan, And the country was desecrated by murders, They prostituted themselves by their actions.

(Psalm 106:35-39)

Who are you kidding?

Against whom do you open a wide mouth and pull your tongue?

Aren't you rebellious children?

An engeance full of falsity, Igniting near the terebinths, Under any green tree, Slaughtering children in ravines, under rock slits?

(Isaiah 57:4–5)

They built high places in Topheth, in the valley of Ben-Hinnom, To burn their sons and daughters with fire: What I had not ordered, What had not come to my mind.

(Jeremiah 7:31)

For they have abandoned me,

They made this place unrecognizable, They offered incense to other gods, That do not know them, their fathers, nor the kings of Judah, And they filled this place with the blood of the innocents, They built high places in Baal, To burn their sons in Baal with fire: What I had not ordered , What I had not talked about, What had not come to my mind.

(Jeremiah 19:4-5)

You took your sons and daughters, whom you had given birth to me, and you sacrificed them to devour them! Wasn't that enough of your prostitutions?

You have slaughtered my sons and given them, making them pass by fire in their honor.

(Ezekiel 16:20-21)

I defiled them with their gifts, when they made all their elders pass by fire; I wanted to plunge them into desolation and make them recognize that I am the Lord.

(Ezekiel 20:26)

The Lord said to me:

Son of man,

Will you judge Oholah and Oholiba?

Describe to them their horrors, for they have engaged in adultery, and there is blood in their hands: They have committed adultery with their idols; In addition, their sons that they had given birth to me, They made them go through the fire for them, So that they would be devoured.

Here again they did to me: They defiled my sanctuary in the same day, and desecrated my Sabbaths.

While immolating their sons to their idols, They went the same day to my sanctuary, to desecrate it.

That's what they did in the middle of my House.

(Ezekiel 23:36-39)

You hate the good

And you love evil,

You remove their skin and flesh from above the bones.

They devour the flesh of my people, tear off their skin

And they break his bones.

And they put the pieces
Like (what is cooked) in a pot, Like meat in a cauldron.

Then they will cry out unshovah, but he will not answer them; He will hide his face from them at that time, because they have committed bad deeds.

(Micah 3:2-4)

Your father is the devil, and you want to fulfill your father's desires. He was murderous from the beginning, and he did not hold himself in the truth, because the truth is not in him. When he utters the lie, his words come from himself because he is a liar and the father of the lie.

(Jean 8 :44)

Chapter 3

The MK-Ultra Program

> "Mk-Ultra was designed with many sub-projects to develop the perfect soldier, the perfect spy. What I was told was that it had to serve our National Security more than any soldier or diplomat could ever do... No one has told me that they are being used for drug trafficking and prostitution. No one told me that they were used as livestock to provide children to sheikhs and world leaders. No one has told me that we > used for money laundering operations."
>
> Mark Philipps - Mind-Control Out of Control Conference, 31 October 1996.

1 - Brief history

During the "Cold War", the arms race included research on war material but also on mind control and behavior modification. The aim was to manipulate, modify and control the consciousness and behaviour of targeted individuals or groups.

Following the war, the United States and the USSR considered that this field of research had an obvious military interest and the development of these "non-lethal weapons" (includingpsycho-electronic weapons) was discreetly set up in experimental programs of the American and Soviet army and intelligence services; all strictly covered by defense secrecy.

The forerunners of scientific experiments on mind control were the Nazis. In Nazism, there is the notion of "ideological war" aimed at imposing their ideology on the countries they occupied. The Americans took up this doctrine and called it "psychological warfare". Psychological warfare is "the use of propaganda or other mind control techniques to influence or confuse thought, or to overthrow morality" (Webster's New World Dictionary). This post-war psychological struggle aimed to transform the minds of populations, from the simple individual to a global scale. This is what we saw in chapter 1 with engineering/social psychiatry.

The roots of the MK-Ultra program go back to Nazi Germany. Adolf Hitler had indeed detected a certain satanic "culture" in northern European families immersed in transgenerational incest.

Families who systematically practice ritual abuse of their offspring, practices involving physical torture and Psychological. The Nazis understood that the victims of such violence in childhood developed certain dissociative peculiarities that made them totally permeable to "robotic" mental control. During the Second World War, the Nazis experimented with the use of drugs, hypnosis, trauma and various chemicals on concentration camp inmates as part of research on mental and behavioral control. Following the war, during Operation Paperclip (made public in 1973), many Nazi scientists, including psychiatrists, were secretly brought back to the American continent and then infiltrated into the military, academic and private sectors for all kinds of scientific research, including psychiatry and government projects on the mental programming. For the Americans, it was clear that if they did not were not bringing these scientists home, so it was their enemy, the Soviet Union, that would have used them. Major General Hugh Knerr, deputy commander of the U.S. Air Force in Europe, wrote:

"The

the discovery and occupation of German scientific and industrial establishments has revealed that we are lagging behind alarmingly in many areas of research. If we do not seize the opportunity to recover the material and the brains that developed them to get them back to work as soon as possible, we will be several years late before reaching a level that is already being exploited [182]."

In August 1945, President Truman approved the Paperclip project to transfer Hitler's best scientists to the United States. In November 1945, the first Nazi scientists landed on American soil. By the early 1950s, the CIA and U.S. military were conducting their own mind control programs codenamed Chatter, Bluebird, Artichoke, MK-Often, MK-Ultra puis le MK-Search, MK-Naomi, MK-Delta, Monarch...

In 1977, the New York Times published a CIA directive about the objectives of the Artichoke project launched in 1951:
"Evolution and development of any method by which we can obtain information from a person against his will and without him having any knowledge (...) Can we gain control of an individual to the point that he will accomplish our goals against his will and even against the laws?

fundamentals of nature such as self-preservation[183] ?"

As a continuation of Operation Paperclip, Project MK-Ultra, led by Sydney Gottlieb, was launched on April 13, 1953 by then CIA Director Allan Dulles. With an initial budget of $300,000, or 6% of the CIA's annual research budget, this was an important program of study. Over the next decade, U.S. taxpayers donated more than $25 million to this classified program.

secret-defense that was the MK-Ultra[184]. During this period many sub-projects focused on the control of the human mind were born. Like the Bluebird and Artichoke project, the existence of the MK-Ultra was known to very few people and the US Congress itself was completely unclear about this type of research. The MK-Ultra program was conducted in 80 institutions including prestigious universities and hospitals, but also penitentiary institutions. Examples include: Princeton, Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Stanford, Baylor,

Georgetown University Hospital, Boston Psychopathie Hospital, Mt Sinai

Hospital...

Many scientists have participated in this research, including James Hamilton, Louis Jolyon West, William Sargant, Ewen Cameron, Leonard Rubenstein, John Gittinger, Robert Heath, William Sweat, Harold Wolff, Lawrence Hinkle, Carl Pfeiffer, Harold Abramson, Martin Orme, Jose Delgado and many others. The four directors of the CIA who succeeded each other during the period of activity of the MK-Ultra and MK-Search program are: Allen W.

Dulles, John A. McCone, William F. Raborn et Richard Helms.

This research on mind control officially ended in the early 70s. Most of the files were deliberately destroyed in 1973 under the orders of Richard Helms, who explained his action in 1975: "There were relations in this program with foreign scientists who were sensitive to this kind of thing, when the project ended, we thought that by getting rid of the files, it would save all those who helped us from having to suffer embarrassingharassment! 185]..."

Richard Helms not only admitted that he had destroyed the records but also admitted that foreign scientists had carried out studies on mind control without having any idea that they were involved by their contract in the MK-Ultra program.

Helms was determined to protect them and keep their identities secret, certainly because of the immoral nature of these experiments.

Despite this, some documents have been preserved and testimony in the U.S. Senate has subsequently made it possible to publicize the techniques that have been used on hundreds, if not thousands, of non-consenting humans. "Mind control" was induced by drugs, electroshocks, over-stimulations or deprivations sensory, hypnosis, ultrasound, irradiations, psychosurgery including implants, as well as various traumas extremes aimed at creating dissociation and a real tabula rasa in the victims. This type of MK program had three goals: 1 / Induce hypnosis very quickly in an involuntary subject 2 / Create a lasting amnesia 3 / Permanently implant functional post-hypnotic suggestions

This research aimed, among other things, at the creation of Manchu Candidates. This is an individual who has been brainwashed and has been programmed to kill with amnesia once the operation is complete. Dr. Colin Ross, a Canadian psychiatrist and former president of the International Society for the Study of Dissociation, wrote in his book "Bluebird[186]":"The main objective of mind control programs during the Cold War was to deliberately create dissociative disorders, including multiple personality disorders (editor's note: dissociative disorder of , identity). The "Manchurian Candidate" was well created, it is not fiction. It was created by the CIA in the 50s as part of Operations Bluebird and Artichoke (...) To be able to understand these experiences on "super-spies", we must put them in their social and historical context. It was a time when experiments on mind control were ubiquitous and systematic. These were not isolated "mad scientists", but heads of the institutions.

psychiatric and major medical schools (...) According to my definition, the Manchu Candidate is an individual with an experimentally created dissociative identity disorder that meets the following four criteria:

1/ It is created deliberately.

2/ A new identity is implanted in him.

3/ Amnesic barriers are created.

4/ It is used in real or simulated operations.''

A declassified CIA document entitled ''Hypnotic Experimentation and Reasearch, 10 February 1954'' describes a simulation related to research on Manchu Candidates. Experience proves that it is possible to program an individual into an undetectable assassin and totally unaware of his actions:

''Miss X has been instructed (She has already expressed her fear of firearms before) to use all the means at her disposal to awaken Miss Y (kept in a deep hypnotic sleep). If she can't do it, she can take the pistol nearby and shoot Miss Y. She was programmed so that her rage would be so great that she would not hesitate to kill Y for failing to wake her up. Miss X followed the instructions to the letter, including firing (pistol not loaded) at Y, and then falling into a deep sleep herself. After a few appropriate suggestions, both were awakened. Miss X expressed a total denial of what had just happened (so she was amnesiac).'' (CIA Mori ID 190691,2/10/54)

This work on human mental and behavioural control also led to the drafting of a confidential mental manipulation and psychological torture codenamed ''Kubark''. Written in 1963, it was made public in 1997 when journalists from the Baltimore Sun obtained its declassification in the name of freedom of information. The document of 128 pages were presented as a manual of interrogations intended for the counterintelligence.

People who suffer from mental illnesses make good subjects for these experiences because they are often deprived of their rights and it is easy to discredit them afterwards by putting their testimonials on the account of their illness. Karen Wetmore is one of these victims of the MK-Ultra program, she is the author of the book "Surviving Evil: CIA Mind-Control Experiments in Vermont".

During her adolescence, in the early 70s, she was interned for "schizophrenia" in a psychiatric hospital in Vermont. A long stay of which she kept only fragmented memories. It was not until adulthood that she was diagnosed with dissociative disorder of identity, a personality disorder that has most certainly been reinforced by these experiments on mind control.

In 1995, a psychologist advised him to consult his medical file to find out what exactly had happened in this hospital.

psychiatric. She then discovers that she has been given a very strange treatment, she describes it as a "psychological rape".

While researching the doctors who followed her, she discovered a certain Dr. Robert W. Hyde who was regularly mentioned in her file.

Further researching she discovers that this doctor was in contact with Sydney Gottlieb, one of the managers of the MK-Ultra program. According to psychiatrist Colin Ross who investigated Karen Wetmore's case, she could have been selected because she already suffered from a dissociative disorder due to the repetitive sexual abuse she had experienced as a child. According to Ross, the scientists of the MK-Ultra were interested in reactions to programmed stimuli with for example keywords, codes to create a click. A person with dissociative disorder

the identity already has several personalities, so it is easier to make him a killer responding to orders without discussing than with a person not Split. While studying Karen Wetmore's case, Ross discovered that doctors had given her pentylene-tetrazole, a product used by the Soviets during interrogations and for brainwashing.

In addition, her medical record indicates that she received several dozen consecutive electroshocks in a single session. several psychiatrists have demonstrated that electroshocks can lead to the patient's amnesia. For Dr. Ross, there was no justification for such treatment on Karen Wetmore, he is convinced that the CIA doctors subjected her to electroshocks to erase her memory and that it is very likely that she was subjected to a mental control program. He came to this conclusion by seeing the treatment she had undergone, that is, the type of medication she had been given, the systematic and repetitive electroshock sessions, but also by the diagnoses that were made by the doctors who followed her at the time.

An internal CIA document[187] dating from 1955 gives a list of methods used in MK programs:

- Substances causing illogical reasoning and impulsivity to the point that the subject will publicly discredit himself.
- Substances increasing mental abilities and perceptual abilities.
- Materials preventing or counteracting the toxic effects of alcohol.
- Materials that increase the toxic effects of alcohol.
- Materials that produce the signs and symptoms of known diseases in a reversible manner, thus being able to be used to simulate them.
- Materials increasing the effectiveness of hypnosis.
- Substances that enhance the individual's ability to endure deprivation, torture and coercion during interrogation or brainwashing.
- Physical materials and methods that produce amnesia of events occurring before and during their use.
- Physical methods to produce shock and confusion on long periods of time and susceptible to stealthy use.
- Substances causing physical disabilities such as paralysis of the legs, acute anemia, priapism.
- Substances causing a "pure" euphoria, without "redescent".
- Substances altering the personality in such a way that the subject will tend to become dependent on another person.

- Materials causing such mental confusion that the individual will have difficulty supporting an invented story during an interrogation.
- Substances that lower the ambition and overall effectiveness of the subject even when administered in undetectable amounts.
- Substances that cause weakness and visual or auditory distortion, preferably without permanent effects.
- Knocking pill that can be administered surreptitiously in food, beverages, cigarettes, or as an aerosol that can be used safely, causing maximum amnesia and that could be suitable for certain types of agents on an ad hoc basis.
- Material that can be administered surreptitiously through the upper routes, and which in very small quantities make physical activity impossible.

Thanks to these experiments, the American intelligence services have been able to make a general clearing of the various techniques and technologies intended to modify the psyche and human behavior. Subsequently, research quickly turned to the study of the electrical and radio activity of the brain for the design of electromagnetic weapons, called "psychotronics". The report of the Peace and Security Research (GRIP) entitled "Non-lethal weapons: a new arms race" (Luc Mampaey, GRIP 1999), defined as the devices altering the behavior: "The objective of these weapons systems is to interfere with the biological and/or psychological processes of the human organism, by subjecting it to physical, chemical, electromagnetic stimuli or "morphing" techniques, without the intention of giving death, but with the aim of inducing a certain behavior, altering mental faculties or influencing memory."

The New York Times publicly revealed mk's programs in August 1977. The article in question contained, inter alia, an extract from a memorandum dated 1950 concerning the recruitment of psychiatrists to conduct experiments: "The ethics of a candidate could be such that he would not wish to participate in some more revolutionary phases of our project (...) In 1963, a report by the Inspector General apparently resulted in the interruption of a program, mentioning that the concepts implemented during the manipulation of human behavior are considered by many people, both inside and outside the agency, to be repugnant and unethical[188].

Here is an excerpt from this report on inspector general John S. Earman's MK-Ultra: "Research into the manipulation of the Human behavior is considered by many medical authorities and related fields as professionally immoral, for this reason the reputation of professionals participating in the MK-Ultra program may be endangered. Some of these activities raise questions of legality and ethics. A review of MK-Ultra's programs reveals that the rights and interests of U.S. citizens are impacted. The public disclosure of certain aspects of the MK-Ultra programme could lead to a strong negative reaction in American public opinion[189].

Senator Ted Kennedy stated on August 3, 1977 before the Intelligence Committee, Subcommittee on Health, Research Unit of the Resources Committee.

Human: "The Deputy Director of the CIA revealed that more than thirty universities and institutions had participated in a large project experiments that included drug tests on subjects

non-voluntary of all social categories, high and low, American and foreign. Many of these tests involved administering LSD to non-consenting subjects in various social situations. At least one death has been recorded, that of Dr. Franck Olson. A death that is due to these activities. The Agency itself has acknowledged that these experiments have no scientific value. The officers who followed up were not competent scientists.'

Dr. Frank Olson was a scientist who worked for the U.S. Army in a top secret division from Fort Detrick to Frederick, Maryland. Olson died in suspicious circumstances in New York (see the documentary Project Artichoke: the secret CIA experiments). His research for the army is poorly known but he has worked on biological weapons and on mind control through the use of drugs.

All this research on mind control went much further than senator Kennedy claimed above, as did then CIA Director Stanfield Turner, who described the MK-Ultra as a simple drug and drug experimentation program. He declared before the Senate on September 21, 1977: "We are not in a position to reveal to you all the facts concerning these activities, we will just tell you what we know. The dossiers we have studied refer to only a small part of the whole.'

The MK-Ultra program and its subprojects are therefore a real puzzle whose pieces have been destroyed or dispersed. In addition, the CIA had established a network of "screen" companies such as the "Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology", the "Washington Geschikter Fund Medical Research" or the "Josiah Macy Jr. Foundation". This division into a multitude of various projects made it possible to finance discreetly the MK-Ultra programme, which it was necessary to it was a question of compartmentalizing the projects, but also the researchers. Indeed, these scientists often did not know the identity of their real employer as well as the many researches in progress, without apparent link, but constituting the same framework. All this forming the pieces of a gigantic puzzle of which only the sponsors hold the assembly plan. The methods of compartmentalization of these "black projects" are still relevant: each individual of the network receives only what "is good to know for him", that is to say that he will only access what he needs to know to do his "job". He thus remains totally ignorant of the globality of the project or projects, receiving only what is strictly necessary in terms of information for the work he carries out at his level.

to say that he will only access what he needs to know to do his job. He thus remains totally ignorant of the globality of the project or projects, receiving only what is strictly necessary in terms of information for the work he carries out at his level.

In 1977, freelance journalist John Marks requested access to all documents from the Office of Research and Development (DSB) of the specialized of the Agency) concerning "any research or operational activity related to bioelectricity, electrical or radio stimulation of the brain, electronic destruction of memory, stereotactic surgery, psychosurgery, hypnosis, parapsychology, irradiations, microwaves and ultrasound." He was informed six months later that the DSB had identified 130 boxes, or about 39 m3 of documentation. John Marks had obtained under the Freedom of Information Act the declassification of a thousand secret CIA documents. It was he who publicly revealed the frightening scale of mk's programs by publishing his research work in 1979 in the book "The Search of the Manchourian Candidate". His access to CIA documents was abruptly halted after the publication of his book in 1979.

Victor Marchetti, a former CIA agent who worked for 14 years years for the agency, said in interviews that contrary to what it claims in its propaganda, the CIA continues its research on mind control. Marchetti published with John Marks a book entitled "The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence" (1973). Before the book was published, the CIA sued Marchetti to have 340 elements contained in his book removed, the author having opposed it, it was in the end 110 elements that were censored. This is the first book that the U.S. federal government has had legally censored.

A publication that nevertheless participated in the establishment of the first investigation (Church Committee) on the MK-Ultra project in the United States Congress in 1975.

In 1999, following a request she had made because of the Freedom Of Information Act (FOIA), Carol Rutz received three CD-ROMs from the CIA.

Carol Rutz is a survivor of these MK programs, at the age of 52 she has finally obtained concrete evidence of all these experiments. For her, this was finally the confirmation and validation of her memoirs concerning experiments on mind control. These files had remained for 48 in government coffers, 18,000 pages of declassified documents relating to the Bluebird, Artichoke and MK-Ultra programs. One of these documents states: "When working on individual subjects, special attention will be paid to granted to dissociative states that tend to spontaneously accompany ESP

(electronicstimulation of the brain). These states can be induced and controlled to some extent with hypnosis and drugs... Data from this study will be obtained from specific groups of individuals, such as psychotics, children and psychics. Researchers will be particularly interested in dissociative states, in "lowering the mental level", in "loss of the soul", in the multiple personality of those called mediums; and an attempt will be made to induce a certain number of altered states of consciousness using hypnosis." (CIA MORI ID 17396, p.18[190])

The cia documents currently declassified clearly show the objectives of these experiments on mind control: the creation of MK subjects with multiple personalities and with amnesic walls to make them do anything and everything... Here is an extract from a document dated 7 January 1953 which describes how two dissociated girls are made program: "These subjects have clearly demonstrated that they can move from a fully awake state to a deep hypnotic state (H) triggered by telephone, by a question, by the use of a code, a signal or words. This hypnotic control can be transmitted without much difficulty. It has also been demonstrated through experimentation with these girls, that they can act as involuntary messengers for information purposes." (CIA Mori ID 190684,1/7/53)

The document entitled ''SI and H Experimentation, September 25, 1951'' (SI meaning Induction of Sleep and H meaning Hypnosis) reports: ''X has been instructed that when she wakes up, she will have to go to such a room where she will wait at the office for a phone call. When the phone rings, a person named "Jim" will engage in a basic conversation with her. During the conversation, this individual will mention a code name.

When she hears this code name, she will go into a state of SI trance, but she will not close her eyes and will remain perfectly normal for continue the telephone conversation. X is instructed that following this phone call, she will have to follow the following protocol: X who is at that time in a deep SI state, is put in the presence of a device with a timer. She is informed that this device is an incendiary bomb (...) Following the telephone conversation, she is therefore programmed to take this bomb that is in a briefcase, then to go to the toilet where she will meet a woman who is unknown to her and who will identify herself by the code name "New York". X then shows this person how the device works and tells him that it must be brought into such a room and placed in the left drawer of the desk, all for the 82 seconds set to the timer of the device. X is further tasked with telling this girl that as soon as the device is placed and activated, she must retrieve the briefcase, leave the room and go to lie on the couch in the operations room to fall into a state of deep sleep. X is also scheduled to return to the operations room and also plunge into a deep sleep after giving the instructions to the other girl (...) The experiment was perfectly conducted without any difficulty or hesitation on the part of the girls. Each acted appropriately, the aircraft was properly placed and the two girls returned to the operations room to fall into a state of deep sleep. Throughout the experience, their attitude was natural, there was no difficulty of movement.'' (CIA Mori ID 190527)

9/25/51)

Another internal document describes the excesses of this kind of experimentation: "On July 2, 1951 at about 13:00, instruction begins with X regarding his studies on sexuality. X stated that he had consistently used hypnosis as a means of inducing young girls to have sex with 11 i n V nnû n t'f ₁ the f û tvtncnrtiûwnû 1iT7-rûr* A re ûo he. 1 , a music list, was forced to engage in commerce sexual with X under the influence of hypnosis. X stated that he had initially put her in a state of hypnotic trance and that he then suggested to her that he was her husband and that she wanted to have sex with him.' (CIA Mori ID 140393 7/2/51)

On October 3, 1995, faced with the accumulation of disturbing revelations about all these experiments on mind control, Bill Clinton, then president in office, had to make a public apology to his nation: "Thousands of government experiments have taken place in hospitals or universities as well as on military bases all over the country (...) In too many cases, no formal agreement has been sought, americans have been concealed from what they were suffering, and far beyond the guinea pigs themselves, this deception has deceived their families and the whole nation. These experiments have remained secret and they have been concealed not for security reasons but for fear of scandal, and this is abnormal. So today, on behalf of a new generation of American leaders and citizens, the United States of America sincerely apologizes to the citizens who have been victims of these experiments, as well as to their families and loved ones[191].

It is clear that Bill Clinton was forced to present a public apology as the MK-Ultra file had been publicly revealed, an apology of a monster hypocrisy as these programs on mind control never really stopped, on the contrary they did not stop to progress like an arms race.

In the United States, the subject of mind control is today untouchable and unassailable because it is buried under the National Security Act of 1947. This law on National Security allows indeed to oust any truly disturbing case, so that it cannot be judged fairly just like any other case. The case of Cathy O'Brien (victim of the MK-Monarch program) fully demonstrates how this "National Security Act" systematically makes it possible to stop any attempt to resort to legal proceedings for damages (the word is weak) relating to mental control and this despite all the evidence. (We will come back to this in Chapter 10)

2 - Child victims of the MK-Ultra: testimonies

In 1995, Christine DeNicola, Claudia Mullen and therapist Valerie Wolf testified before a Presidential Advisory Commission (UNITED STATES). Christine DeNicola served as a guinea pig in the MK-Ultra program from the age of 4, from 1966 to 1976. Claudia Mullen was subjected to mental control at the age of 7, from 1957 to 1984. Valerie Wolf told the Commission that about forty therapists had contacted her when they knew she was going to testify publicly, they wanted to tell her about some of their patients who had also been subjected to radiation and mind control techniques. All these testimonies highlight the close correlation that exists between mental programming and all kinds of traumatic techniques ranging from electroshocks to sexual abuse, hypnosis and hallucinogenic drugs. There are almost no publications on mental programming on children, but four sub-projects of the MK-Ultra were particularly aimed at them. Children who were officially treated for dissociative disorders but who eventually found themselves victims of trauma aimed at making them even more dissociated and fractional, and therefore more easily programmable.

Here are the transcripts of the testimonies before the Presidential Advisory Commission involving the deliberate irradiation of human beings.

Testimonies that were filmed in 1995:

- Valerie Wolf (therapist): I have listened to all the previous testimonies and they seem very familiar to me. I'm here to talk about the possible link between radiation to which these victims have been subjected and mental programming (...) The doctors who exposed them to radiation and administered chemicals to them were the same as those who did research on mental programming (...) It is important to understand that

Mind control techniques may have been used to intimidate subjects, even when they become adults, in order to prevent them from speaking and revealing that they have been victims of these research programs funded by the government. I have been a therapist for 22 years. I specialized in the treatment of the victims of these programs, and even some of their executioners, as well as their families (...) We are now seeing protesting throughout the country former victims who have no contact with each other (...) many of these survivors are afraid to tell their stories to their doctors, because they fear that they will be taken for fools. Several of them named the same people, such as this Dr."Green'', accused by many of torturing and raping children during mental programming experiments. One of my patients even managed to find out that his name was Dr. L. Wilson Green. We discovered that one of the Scientific Directors of the Army's Chemical and Radiological Laboratories had this name. Also included are the names of Dr Sidney Gottlieb and Dr Martin Orne also involved in radiological research (...) We have often tried to obtain information by using the Freedom of Information Act, in order to gain access to data concerning the mental programming. In general, our requests were rejected, however we were able to obtain some information that confirmed what our patients had told us (...) We need to have access to these archives to enable the rehabilitation and treatment of the many victims who present serious psychological and physical disorders (...) It is true that a Commission had been appointed in the late 70s to investigate mental programming, but it did not take an interest in the experiences made on children. At that time, these children were too young to be able to talk about it, some were still being experimented with. The only way to put an end to the suffering of all these victims is to make public everything that has happened during this research on mind control. Please therefore recommend that an investigation be opened and that all records concerning mental control experiences on children be made public. Thank you.

- Christine DeNicola (victim): My parents divorced in 1966. My father, Donald Richard Ebner, was associated with Dr. Green's work. I was subjected to these experiments between 1966 and 1976. In terms of radiation, in 1970 Dr. Green focused his experiments on my neck, throat and chest, and then on my uterus in 1975. Every time I was dizzy, nausea, and I vomited. All these experiences were always associated with mental programming. It was in Tucson, Arizona. Dr. Green mostly used me as a guinea pig for mental programming between 1966 and 1973. Her goal was to control me mentally to train me as a spy and assassin.

My first significant memories date back to 1966 when I was taken to Kansas City University. My father flew me there at a time when my mother was away. He drove me to a place that looked like a lab. It seems to me that there were other children there.

I was stripped of my skin and tied to a table, lying on my back.

Dr. Green placed electrodes on my body and on my head.
He used a kind of projector. While a flash of red light was directed at my forehead, he kept telling me that he was implanting different images in my brain. Between each sequence, he made me undergo electroshocks by asking me to dive ever deeper into my brain, into my mind. He repeated each sentence several times telling me that it penetrated deep into my brain and that I had to obey everything he had to obey me would ask to do. I remember that he had given me a sting at the beginning of the session and that I felt drugged. When it was all over, he gave me another sting. Then I remember that I found myself at my house grandparents in Tucson. I was 4 years old. This experience shows you that Dr. Green was using drugs, trauma, hypnotic suggestions and all sorts of other traumas, to try to control my brain and my intelligence. He used radiation to study its effects on various parts of my body, and also to terrorize me. It was part of his panoply of traumas to program me mentally.

The other experiments were done in Tucson, Arizona, somewhere in the desert. I was taught how to open locks, camouflage myself, how to use my photographic memory and I was shown how to use certain digital techniques to develop my memory. Dr. Green made me "kill" dolls that looked like real children.

Once, after being severely traumatized, I stabbed a doll.

But the next time, I refused. He knew many techniques to make me suffer, but as I grew up I became more and more rebellious (...) Due to my growing lack of cooperation, they eventually abandoned their plan to make me a spy and murderer. Therefore, during the years 1974 to 1976, Dr. Green used various techniques to suppress my assassin programming and to inject me with programs of self-destruction, suicide and death. Why is that? He just wanted me to die. Throughout my adult life, I have struggled to stay alive. If I am still alive, I believe I owe it to God's grace. These terrible experiences have profoundly affected my life. My personality has fragmented into a dissociative identity disorder. Dr. Green's goal was to fragment my personality as much as possible so that I could fully control myself.

It failed! But I have been suffering for years from constant physical, mental and emotional pain. I have been in regular therapy for 12 years. It wasn't until 2 1/2 years ago, when I met my current therapist, who knew about the experiences of mental programming, that I finally started to make real progress and that I began to heal. In conclusion, I ask you to bear in mind that the memories I have evoked are only a small part of everything I experienced between 1966 and 1976 (...) I know that other people can also be helped, as long as they are given the help they need. Please assist us in our efforts to ensure that these acts abominable never happen again. Thank you.

- Claudia Mullen (victim): Between 1957 and 1984, I was a toy in the hands of the government.

Her ultimate goal was to mentally program me to make a perfect spy. For this, he used chemicals, radiation, drugs, hypnosis, electroshock, sensory isolation, sleep deprivation, brainwashing and verbal abuse, physical,emotional and sexual. I have been exploited against my will for almost 30 years. The only explanations I was given were that "the end justifies the means" and that "I was serving my country in its fierce struggle against communism". To sum up my life, I would say that they seized a 7-year-old girl, already traumatized by sexual abuse, to continue to make her suffer in a way that is beyond imagination. The saddest thing is that I knew I wasn't the only one being treated like this. There were countless other children in the same situation. So far no one has been able to help us.

I have already provided you with a written report in which I have included as much information as possible, including conversations that I have heard in a number of official services responsible for these atrocities. If I have been able to describe all this to you in such detail, it is thanks to my photographic memory, but also to the arrogance of the people concerned. They were sure they could still control my brain. Remembering these atrocities is not an easy thing, and it is not without danger to my family and myself. But I think it's worth taking that risk.

Dr. Green once explained to Dr. Charles Brown "that he preferred to choose children as subjects for his experiments, because it was more fun to work with them, and also cheaper." He needed subjects that were easier to handle than military or government officials.

He therefore chose to take only "consenting girls". He added: "Besides, I like to terrorize them. At the CIA, they think that I am like a god capable of creating through his experiences subjects that obey without discussion everything that Sid (Dr. Sidney Gottlieb) and James (Dr. James Hamilton) could imagine."

In 1958, they told me that I had to be "tested" by a number of important doctors from the Human Ecology Society. I was asked to cooperate with them. I should neither try to look at their faces,nor seek to know their names because it was a very secret project. They told me this to help me forget everything. Naturally, as all children do in such cases, I did the opposite, and I tried to remember everything. A certain John Gittinger tested me. Dr. Cameron gave me electroshocks, and Dr. Green gave me X-rays. Then Sidney Gottlieb told me that "I was ripe for the great A''. He wanted to talk about the Artichoke program. When I returned home, I only remembered the reasons given by Dr. Robert G. Heath of Tulane School of Medicine to explain all the traces I had on my body: bruises, traces of bites, burns and pain in the genitals. I had no reason to believe that all this had been caused by anything other than what Heath had explained to me. They had already started to control my brain.

The following year, I was sent to a camp in Maryland called Deep Creek Cabins. There, I was taught how to satisfy the sexual desires of men. I was also taught to force them to talk about themselves. There was Richard Helms, the Deputy Director of the CIA, Dr. Gottlieb, Captain George White, and Morris Allan. They had planned to recruit as many senior civil servants and university presidents as possible so that their projects could continue, even in the event that the appropriations for mental programming and experiments with radiation would one day decrease. I was used to trap all kinds of men who did not suspect anything, for this they used a hidden camera. I was only nine years old when I was subjected to all these sexual humiliations. I once heard a conversation about the DSB (Office of Research and Development). This office was headed by Dr. Green as well as Drs. Steven Aldrich, Martin Orne and Morris Allan. Dr. Gottlieb made a rather cynical remark about leaking information about a fairly large group of mentally retarded children who had been subjected to massive doses of radiation. He had asked Dr. Green why he was so worried about these retarded children: "After all, they are certainly not the ones who are going to sell the wick!"' On another occasion, I heard Dr Martin Orne, who headed the Scientific Office, and who then headed the Institute of Experimental Research, to say that "to continue receiving credits for their projects, their experiments had to use even more coercive means, and even blackmail." He added: "We need to

let's go faster, and then get rid of the subjects, so that they don't come back and ask us later for clarification about what happened.'' I could tell you many other things about these government-funded research projects: the names of the projects and sub-projects, the names of the people involved in the experiments, the locations, the nature of the tests and the different means used to do this.

suffer the subjects (...) I would have liked so much if everything we had suffered had been just a dream that we must quickly forget. But to forget would be a tragic mistake, it would also be a lie.

These are real atrocities that I and so many other children have suffered under the pretext of defending our country. Due to the accumulation of the harmful effects of radiation, drugs, various chemicals, suffering, psychological and physical trauma, I was deprived of the ability to work normally, and even to have children. It is clear that these experiments were in no way justified. From the outset, they should never have been allowed. Our only way to reveal and highlight the horrible truth is to make public all the archives that may still exist concerning these projects, through the appointment of a new Presidential Commission in charge of to investigate mental programming. I believe that all citizens of our nation have a right to know what part of reality is, and what part of fiction is. Our greatest protection is that all this never happens again. In conclusion, I can only offer you what I have offered you today: the truth. Thank you for taking the time to listen tome.

- Dr. Duncan C. Thomas (Professor, University of Southern California, School of Medicine, Department of Preventive Medicine, Los Angeles):

May I ask you what your parents were doing in all this? Do you have any idea how you were recruited for these experiences? Did you have any parents? Do your parents knew what was going on?

- Christine DeNicola: I can give you a brief answer. It was my father who worked with Dr. Green. My mother was not aware of it, because my parents divorced when I was four years old (...) As far as I am concerned, it was my father who "delivered" me for the experiments. He was the one who took care of me when I was a little girl. He started sexually abusing me very early on. He voluntarily put me in the hands of Dr. Green, but my mother did not know about it.

- Claudia Mullen :

As far as I am concerned, I was adopted at the age of two and a half by a woman who sexually abused me. At that time, she was a friend of the President of Tulane University. At a very young age, I started to have the symptoms of a child who has been sexually abused, including dissociation from my personality. She therefore asked the President of that University to recommend a child psychiatrist to her. He advised her dr.

Heath, who was involved in this research (MK). I remember very well all the personality tests he gave me. That's how I was recruited for these experiments. My father had no idea. He died when I was very young. I don't know if my mother was actually at current. To tell you the truth, I don't think she cared much about it. She died when I was a teenager. Subsequently, as I was an orphan, they were then able to use me more easily[192].

Dans son livre “A Nation Betrayed : The Chilling True Story of Secret Cold War Experiments Performed On Our Children and other Innocent People”

Carol Rutz testifies:

"In my family, pedophilia was passed down from generation to generation. I was still wearing diapers when my father started abusing me. It was at the age of two that my mind split in order to manage the trauma of the continual abuse of my father and other members of my family (...) I was "sold" by my grandfather to the CIA in 1952. Over the next twelve years, I underwent experiments and various trainings: Electroshock, drugs, hypnosis, sensory deprivation and other types of trauma to condition myself and split my personality in order to make me perform specific tasks. Each alter personality was created to activate with a post-hypnotic trigger and perform something that was to be forgotten later. This

Programming of ''Manchu Candidate'' was just one of the possible uses of the extensive mind control program of the CIA, financed by your hard-earned taxes...

I was told that I was working for 'The Agency'. It was actually elites of the CIA and other branches of government who worked in connivance with some extremely wealthy individuals wanting to shape the world while remaining in the shadows (...)

I too was subjected to torture by Dr. Joseph Mengele in 1956, I was almost nine years old. I was driven by my father on a winding road to an air hangar in the middle of the countryside. Inside, suspended from the beams by pulleys, were cages with naked children inside, it seems to me that most were younger than me. I was placed in one of the cages, and like the others, I was deprived of food and water. I was very cold and I was constantly curled up to hide my nudity. Every time I tried to sleep, someone would give me an electric spur through the bars. The executioner seemed to take pleasure in torturing the children. He stood at the height of the cages, perched on what he could. When he wasn't torturing us, he was on the ground with Dr. Black. They both smiled devilishly, and our tears had absolutely no impact on them. The purpose of all these tortures was to prepare us for the programming. There was a hospital where each of us was taken after the tortures that had made us "cooperators". I received training that taught me the meridians of the body and how to manage the energy flowing in these meridians. It was a preparation for later experiments in which I would have to use my mind to try to kill psychically from a distance. In another experiment, an alter personality was created for the purpose of memorizing binary codes. If this alter "Robert" could not repeat perfectly what he had learned, I would return to the cage. THE Trauma-based programming is the cruellest form of brainwashing. It leaves the child completely dissociated and open to the mental programming. Joseph Mengele was a master in the field.

3 - Dr. Ewen Cameron in Canada

As Richard Helms has admitted, several foreign scientists have worked for the CIA's MK-Ultra program.

Among them is Canadian psychiatrist Ewen Cameron, who conducted experiments on brainwashing for seven years. Between 1957 and 1964, Cameron practiced his experiments at the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal, Canada. He was also head of the World Psychiatric Association (WPA). Thirty years later, a Canadian radio program described his work as follows: "During treatment, patients are subjected to extreme psychiatric shocks. Under the effect of barbiturates and LSD, the subjects are dumbed down by pre-recorded messages and broadcast in a loop. They undergo massive doses Electroshocks, prolonged sleep for several days, icy showers, etc. Electroshocks, a treatment method that was not very well controlled at the time, are 20 to 40 times greater in scale than what is normally prescribed.

The sessions lasted five hours a day, five days a week, they aimed to "deprogram" the patient's brain and then "reprogram" it. In 1960, the CIA ended funding for the secret research of the Allan Memorial Institute. Dr. Cameron then turned to the Canadian government, which subsidized him until 1963. In all, about fifty patients served as guinea pigs during these experiments[193].

When Canadians learned that the CIA had conducted brainwashing experiments on their fellow citizens, and that on top of that their government was not only aware of it but had even helped to fund these experiments, the shock was enormous. It was the television show 'The Fitfh Estate' (CBS) that first revealed this case in 1984 by revealing the work that had been supervised by Dr. Ewen Cameron in his

Montreal: the scandal broke. Legal proceedings have been initiated by the victims against Dr. Cameron but also against the CIA. A film was even made from this case: "The Sleep Room"' by Bernard Zuckerman, 1998.

Here is the three-step electroshock protocol used by Dr. Cameron:

- First step: This is the first stage ofpost-electroshock amnesia, the subject loses a large part of his short-term memory. The subject still retains the "space-time image": he knows where he is, why he is there and he recognizes familiar faces but he remembers names more difficult.
- Second step: At the second stage of the Amnesia Electrochoc, the subject loses the "space-time image" but he is aware of this loss. This realization causes him extreme anxiety and panic because he wants to remember but he can't. At this point, he will repeatedly ask: "Where am I?'', "How did I get here?", ''Why am I here?''.
- Third and final step: To this stage, the subject becomes extremely calm, all the previous anxiety has disappeared. He is taken back to his room where a tape recorder placed near his pillow will repeat the same instruction in a loop for hours. This technique is called psychic driving. In this condition, the victims had urinary and fecal incontinence.

Ewen Cameron was also working on "radical isolation". These were sensory isolation boxes in which the subject was locked for a while. Deprived of sensory stimuli, "the very identity of the subject was beginning to disintegrate[194]. Cameron himself boasted of having reproduced experimentally on human subjects the equivalent of the "extraordinary political conversions" that occurred in the East[195], i.e. brainwashing for political purposes. In 1957, his request for grant for a study on the "effects of repetition of verbal signals on human behavior"' which allows, he says, to "break the individual as after a long interrogation", was accepted by the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology (front society[196]). His research program was then integrated into the MK-Ultra project[197].

In an article published by Nexus magazine, Sid Taylor reports that following a "treatment" on a woman, Cameron is said to have stated: "Although the patient went through both prolonged sensory isolation (35 days) and repeated restructuring, having even received 101 days of "positive driving" (supposedly a "psychic conduct" with messages with positive content), we did not achieve favorable results[198].

Cameron also supervised experiments with electromagnetic frequencies. Human guinea pigs were processed in a radio telemetry laboratory set up by

Leonard Rubenstein in the basements of the institute. In this laboratory, patients were exposed to a range of electromagnetic waves aimed at controlling and modifying their behaves.199

One of Dr. Cameron's victims was Linda McDonald, a young mother of five. During a moment of weakness and depression, his doctor advised him to go see the famous psychiatrist. After three weeks, Cameron concluded that Linda had acute schizophrenia and he sent her to the Sleeping Room. There, she was plunged into an artificial sleep for 86 days, a comatose state. Dr. Peter Roper, who was one of Dr. Cameron's colleagues at the time, said: "The goal was really to erase the thought patterns and behaviours that were lacking in the patient because they were suffering from it; then replace them with healthy habits, thoughts and behaviours.'

According to her hospitalization record, Linda McDonald has undergone electroshock treatments more than a hundred times. In fact, she was admitted to the hospital for what we now call post-natal depression, but records of her include treatment.

radical and completely inappropriate drug. Here is an excerpt from his medical report: ''May 15 (1963): Subject to a some confusion; June 3: Know his name, but that's about it; June 11: Don't know his name.' Linda testifies that she very quickly became a vegetable, she had no more identity, no more memories, it was as if she had never existed in the world before (tabula rasa). She was just like a baby who had to be fed and washed.

Another victim of Dr. Cameron was Robert Loguey. At the age of 18, one of his legs was causing him pain and his doctor, who had not found the cause of the problem, thought it was of psychosomatic origin. He then sent his patient to the Allan Memorial Institute. As with Linda McDonald, it was also a nightmare for him, a shock therapy based on drugs, including a powerful hallucinogen. He was given an injection of LSD every other day, sometimes mixed with other medications and psychotropic drugs.

Most of these drugs were experimental, but they appeared to be appropriate for brainwashing. During these profound altered states of consciousness created by electroshocks and drugs, human guinea pigs were forced to listen to audio messages supposed to print new thoughts in their minds, the content of the messages was sometimes very bizarre: Robert reports that a tape recorder placed under his pillow looped the words: "You killed your mother" (who was alive at the time). These were very short messages of a few seconds looping. For Robert, this process lasted for 23 days.

These patients never knew that their treatment was being carried out as part of a project led by the CIA. Indeed, Dr. Cameron was far from being an isolated "mad scientist" who decided to apply these techniques on his own. He was following a program of experiments on human guinea pigs. Velma Orlikow, the wife of David Orlikow, a member of the Canadian Parliament, was one of Cameron's victims. She had gone to the Allan Memorial Institute in the late 50s to treat depression. She had a lot of respect for the famous psychiatrist before realizing that he did not care at all about the mental health of his patients, but that he simply used them as guinea pigs, nothing more. He was simply applying what his employers were asking him to do: the CIA. It has therefore decided, with the help of eight other former victims, to prosecute this powerful institution that is the CIA. The trial lasted several years and this case has almost become an obsession for the American lawyer Joseph Rauh, a civil liberties expert. Rauh and his young assistant James Turner knew that they were facing a formidable enemy but that they also had an occasional ally who could balance the trial. Indeed, they relied heavily on the support of the Canadian government led at the time by Brian Mulroney. Unfortunately, instead of helping its own citizens, the the Canadian government feared being held responsible, stabbed them in the back throughout the trial; going so far as to make a disappearing

key element that led to evidence that CIA officials the U.S. Embassy had apologized to the government when the mk-ultra's experiences were publicly revealed. This apology was very important, it was a legally admissible admission in court because one of the two parties to the trial said that she had done something wrong and reprehensible. It was a proof that demonstrated the negligence and misdeeds committed at that time and the case could have been closed quickly to the benefit of the victims. Instead, the legal battle lasted ten years.

Thanks to a campaign of support and the solidity of the case mounted by the victims, the CIA gave in the day before the trial. There was an out-of-court settlement for $750,000. At the time, this sum represented the largest compensation that the CIA had ever had to pay. However, troubling questions still persist today, particularly about the Canadian government. Why did he act in such an ambiguous way when it was a question of helping several Canadian citizens? THE

The answer is simple: the Canadian government was in fact even more involved than the Americans in the experiments conducted at the Allan Institute.

Memorial. Dr. Cameron's experiments were funded to the tune of 1/2 million dollars by the Federal Department of Health and Welfare during the 50s, but the funding didn't stop there... They injected more than $51,000 into these experiments after the CIA project ended in 1961.

When Linda McDonald discovered that her own government had funded experiments on brainwashing on her own person, she made the heavy decision to sue him. The former victim therefore took the Canadian federal government to court for four long years until finally in 1992, Ottawa reluctantly agreed to compensate her and several other victims for $100,000.

per person. In exchange, they had to undertake to stop all proceedings against the Canadian government or the Allan Memorial Institute. However, Ottawa has categorically refused to acknowledge any wrongdoing regarding this psychiatric institute, the stronghold of Dr. Ewen Cameron. A conclusion was written by first specifying that the patients had not suffered irreparable harm, and that in addition, they had consented to the treatment! According to the victims, Dr. Cameron had never told them anything about the treatment they would undergo. He never gave a single explanation or description of what was going to happen to them. All this clearly had nothing to do with a medical treatment worthy of the name, it was indeed experiments on brainwashing with human guinea pigs. Despite this, the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal has maintained its international reputation as a leader in the treatment of mental illness[200].

The Amerindian community of Canada was also the target of experiments of all kinds mainly during the 50s and 60s, especially in hospitals. A large number of children have been abducted from their families under the "sixties scoop" programme, which is said to have officially involved 20,000 Amerindian children. They were in-house residential schools, also known as schools residential. These boarding schools were intended for "schooling", "evangelization" and "assimilation" of the country's children, in other words the little natives, the Amerindians. These thousands of children were separated from their families without anyone being able to complain at the time. This subject is a very heavy dossier combining both the sterilization of young women, medical experiments on the human psyche and the massive spread of infectious diseases to reduce this population. Paedocriminality and ritual abuse have inevitably been added to this pool of children separated from their families and placed in boarding schools. Some testimonies suggest that the MK-Ultra program was run on many Amerindians,obviously non-consenting and literally serving as guinea pigs.

The daughter of a Canadian officer, Sara Hunter (pseudonym) was the victim of experiments with 25 other children and as many adults. According to her, this happened at the Lincoln Park Air Force in Calgary, Alberta between 1956 and 1958. She says that it was a Nazi doctor who practiced these experiments and she says that she was the only one to survive during these two years of torture, most of the children killed were Amerindians, others were runaways or orphans[201].

In the documentary "Unrepentant: Kevin Annett and Canada's Genocide" (2006) about the genocide of The Native Americans of Canada, Pastor Kevin Annett says when asked if he believes all these testimonies of Aboriginal people: "Well, when people who do not know each other continue to tell the same story over and over again, even if you are skeptical, you must a.d. give these facts. You know, it's a story that's widely told and when people started to go further and bring back to me things that I rediscovered later and were able to validate through documents, then I couldn't deny those things anymore. You know, when you're a pastor, you learn to detect pretty quickly if the person in front of you tells you nonsense. You can read the suffering in people's eyes. It is incredibly painful for them to tell their experience, they do not need to add (...) This happened in the summer of 1998 in Vancouver. I brought many survivors to testify in this court. Everything you can imagine of what happened in the Nazi death camps. They told it. There was a group of people from Kuper Island who said they had been the victims of experiments doctors who spoke in German had injected them with chemicals that killed them."

These testimonies, which report that the "scientists" who practiced the experiments spoke German, can suggest that they were Nazi scientists exfiltrated from Germany to America during the operation "Paperclip", described at the beginning of the chapter.

In the same documentary "Unrepentant", Aboriginal police officer George Brown of the RCMP (Royal Canadian Mount Police) says of his childhood: "I am 100% sure that we were serving as guinea pigs in says of his childhood: "I am 100% sure that we were serving as guinea pigs in hospitals for one reason or another. We were lurking in the hospital, I remember it wasn't to see a dentist, and I wasn't sick."

Another testimony is that of Nung Klaath Gaa (Douglas Wilson), who says he came from the Haida Gwaii people. Here's what he says: "I read Kevin Annett's document and it helped me understand how it's that my memory is so weak. In some parts of the document, they talk about shock treatments (...) In my last year there in the spring of 1961, I was taken from school to Charles Camsell Hospital, and from Charles Camsell Hospital to Ponoka Psychiatric Institute. I don't know if I stayed there for a week or two, but I have this vague memory, a memory that came back to me like a flash. I was lying on this table with something on my head, with flashes and lights flashing continuously. ''

Survivor Lynn Moss Sharman, an Aboriginal Canadian, also testified about the ritual abuse and mind control she experienced as a child. She has done a great deal of work to bring together the Native American victims of these horrors and to ensure that all of this is known to the general public. We will return to his testimony in Chapter 7.

4 - Dr. William Sargant in England

The British psychiatrist William Walters Sargant wrote: "Although men are not dogs, they must humbly remember how much their brain functions resemble those of dogs." or" or" We need to excite the mind before we can change it[202]. William Sargant has been directly linked to the CIA's mind control programs.

He used the same brainwashing protocols as Cameron: electroshock, deep sleep therapy, psychic-driving and of course the use of all kinds of drugs.

British actress Celia Imrie was one of Dr.

Sargant. At the age of 14, Celia was anorexic and had to be hospitalized but her condition was not improving despite treatment. Desperate, her parents sent her to St Thomas' Hospital in London where she was entrusted to the "good care" of the internationally renowned psychiatrist: William Sargant.

Even today, she says that Sargant always comes back in his nightmares. More than 20 years after his death, it is now proven that this psychiatrist worked for MI5 and the CIA, especially in the MK-Ultra program.

In a 2011 Daily Mail article entitled "My electric shock nightmare at the hands of the CIA's evil doctor", Celia Imrie says she has few memories of her own electroshock sessions but that she remembers perfectly the electric shocks that the woman suffered in the bed next to her: "I remember the smallest details, whether by sight, hearing or smell. The huge rubber cap stuck between his teeth; the strange, almost silent cry, like a sigh of pain; jerky contortions of the tortured body; the smell of hair and burnt flesh. I also remember the famous "Narcosis Room" (the equivalent of Dr. Cameron's "Sleep Room"), a room where patients were immersed in drug-induced sleep during several days while devices were broadcasting instructions under the pillows. I can perfectly describe sargant's "Room of Narcosis" because I used to sneak out of my room to go and observe through the portholes or a swinging door these women lying on the floor on gray mattresses, as dead, in an electro-induced twilight silence.

When I am asked if I myself have been in this Chamber, I say "no," because I do not remember. But I recently realized that before I was put in the Chamber, the subject was first drugged and I never saw anyone come back from there awake. You would go asleep and you would come out asleep. I think anyone who has been treated with Sargant's sleep therapy has gone to this chamber at one time or another. You were totally unconscious inside, so maybe I was put in this place myself. I couldn't know (...) I can't know the methods of mind control he exercised on me, I don't know what the recordings under my pillow contained, what they told me to do or think about.

A few years ago, I tried to find my medical record at St Thomas'

Hospital, I wanted to check the content of my treatment and whether I had been in this Room of Narcosis. I wanted to know the precise instructions that were recorded on the tape looping under my pillow. I wanted to know what Sargant had relentlessly induced in my young unconscious brain. Unfortunately, my research did not yield anything. When William Sargant left St Thomas, he illegally took away all the records of his patients. At the time of his death in 1988, every evidence and every paperwork concerning his inhumane work on human guinea pigs, were destroyed. So I would never know the truth.

I remember being given massive doses of Largactil, an anti-psychotic drug. The effect of this drug was impressive, my hands trembled uncontrollably, I woke up finding clums of hair on my pillow. But the worst effect was that I saw everything multiplied into four. When Sargant entered my room, I saw four men! It was horrible and terrifying. same simple tasks like lifting a glass of water became impossible. As the doses had increased, I once remember hearing a nurse tell her colleague that I was showing "dangerous resistance" to medication. Dangerous for whom? I wonder... In this place horrible, from what I have been able to observe, the real fools are those who there work, not patients. Sargant used to say that "every dog has its breaking point, it just takes longer for the eccentrics.'' I guess my "dangerous resistance" was what he was talking about, that I was one of those eccentric dogs that he failed to break[203].

5 - Palle Hardrup's programming

The book "Antisocial or Criminal Acts and Hypnosis: A Case Study" by Paul J. Reiter published in 1958 describes the case of a Dane who was subjected to MK-Ultra-type mind control techniques. Palle Hardrup (or Hardwick) was 31 years old when he was found guilty on July 17, 1954, of robbing a bank and murdering two employees a few months earlier. This case proves that an individual can be programmed to commit crimes and then be amnesiac of his criminal acts. According to psychiatrist Colin Ross, Paul Reiter's book can be taken as a real textbook describing how to create a Manchu Candidate.

The Danish judges stated at the time that Palle Hardrup had a multiple personality (using their own words) and concluded that this personality disorder had deliberately been created by his programmer and master, a certain Bjorn Nielsen. A report from the Council Medico-Legal dated February 17, 1954 stated that "Even if the symptoms of the mental disorder seem to have disappeared today, Hardrup cannot be considered cured. The deep split of its personality, which has been well established, will heal only very slowly.'' The jury found Hardrup guilty on all charges but not responsible for his actions. Bjorn Nielsen, the man who transformed Palle Hardrup as an amnesiac bank robber was found guilty of theft and manslaughter, even though he was not physically present at the crime scene. The jury found that Nielsen planned and organized the crimes by commissioning Hardrup to commit them, manipulating him in various ways including hypnosis. Nielsen was sentenced to life imprisonment while Hardrup was interned in a psychiatric institution. At the time, this case caused a great deal of fuss in Denmark. For Nielsen, crime "perfect" had to ensure that no one could trace back to him, a crime for which another person would inevitably have to face the prison sentence.

Hardrup and Nielsen were both part of the Nazi S.S., the former had entered it out of a naïve need for fraternity, and the other, Nielsen, joined in 1940 to be able to leave a reformatory. Following the German debacle of 1945, they were both arrested and sentenced to several years in prison. It was there that they met for the first time, in 1947. Very quickly, they will become comrades and Nielsen becomes the leader and even the master making Hardrup his disciple and slave, just as a young student would be recruited and indoctrinated by a sect.

Alone, far from home, idealistic, naïve, impressionable and unhappy, a condition that made him very vulnerable to mind control and manipulation. The two men finally get permission to share the same cell and they will isolate themselves completely from the other inmates. Little by little, they will lock themselves into the practice of esoteric disciplines such as yoga, meditation, hypnosis, etc.

For 18 months, Hardrup was continuously alone in the cell with Nielsen, or working alongside him in the workshop. Nielsen immediately began his mind control experiments, working by instinct. However, there is no evidence that he had previously had training in mental programming. Palle Hardrup was an excellent subject for hypnosis and Nielsen then set in motion an intensive program of hypnotic conditioning including several hours of trance exercises per day. This usually happened in the evening and very often Hardrup went to bed without having come out of the trance. Nielsen combined sessions hypnosis with yoga exercises, Kundalini awakening and self-hypnosis. He taught Hardrup techniques for emptying his spirit, to transcend and experience the modified states of consciousness, supposed to bring inner peace. These practices were intended to establish direct contact with a "deity". Nielsen told him, for example, that hypnosis would help him learn about his previous lives. Thanks to

"expansions of consciousness", Hardrup had to be able to be one with the "cosmic divine principle" and thus have a direct communion with God. Hardrup was also instructed to isolate himself from others prisoners, his world was to focus only on Nielsen, his master, his guru. The total social isolation combined with these spiritual exercises meant that Palle Hardrup found himself in a state of perpetual trance in which he was constantly turned towards the "divine".

After a while, Nielsen introduced Hardrup to the guardian spirit "X". X was a guiding spirit who communicated through Nielsen, who was therefore a medium. X told Hardrup that his whole unlucky life previous one was just a test to prepare him for his future role. It was X who also took control of the yoga workouts with Hardrup. After a while, the conditioning was such that hypnosis was no longer even necessary, for Palle Hardrup, Nielsen was the embodiment of entity X who spoke directly to him without resorting to hypnosis. As soon as Nielsen spoke, it was X who spoke and gave the instructions. Hardrup was taught about Samadhi, i.e. the state that yogis reach to transcend the needs of their bodies. Entity X was there to guide Hardrup to Samadhi and enlightenment, even making him pass various initiatory tests. X also told him that he had a divine political mission that aimed to unite all Scandinavians under one flag.

Hardrup was thus totally enslaved to a demonic entity whose intentions were most obscure.

In an effort to sever all ties with the material world, Hardrup began a series of hypnotic exercises related to money. First, he had to mentally visualize the movement of a sum of cash into their cell to give it to "a poor woman" beggar"; Hardrup taking this as a transcendent exercise in love and charity. But the exercises have multiplied and worsened.

Still under the orders of Entity X, Hardrup was to see himself robbing a bank and committing murders.

Any scruples or refusals regarding robbery or murders were interpreted by X as a reaction of the physical body that Hardrup had to reject and transcend... The virtual robbery of the bank in which Hardrup was immersed during the hypnotic trance sessions was repeated and visualized in every detail, including the murder of the employees...

After a while, Hardrup began to hear X's voice speaking to him even when the Nielsen medium was not present: the guardian spirit X was now connected to Hardrup. Upon their release from prison, Nielsen ordered and arranged Palle Hardrup's marriage to a certain Bente. Nielsen would beat her in black magic sessions and he took advantage of her under the eye of Hardrup, who was no more than a machine under mental control. The two men were looking for money to create a new political party; Hardrup was to become a machine to steal and kill... It was in August 1950 that Nielsen launched for the first time its robot programmed for a bank attack. The loot is 25,000 crowns, a sum of money that Hardrup immediately gave to Nielsen following the robbery. There will be no casualties this time, it is during the attack of March 21, 1951 that there will be two deaths. A few days after his arrest, Hardrup told police that a "guardian spirit" (X) had ordered him to commit the robbery for political purposes. He stated that this entity X had totally reoriented his life and influenced his actions since he met him in prison. But he claimed that the guardian spirit X was not Nielsen that the latter had nothing to do with the case. He even says that he met the guardian spirit long before his first meeting with Nielsen.

Hardrup eventually confessed in December 1951 about the hypnotic conditioning performed on him by his guru Nielsen. In April 1952, Hardrup unsubmissive to a psychiatric examination with Dr. Reiter, who then wrote a 370-page report on his case. Dr. Reiter reported that at the beginning of the expertise, it was impossible to hypnotize Hardrup, until he could break a "locking" mechanism. Indeed, Hardrup had undergone programming by Nielsen that did not allow him to be hypnotized by someone else. Georges Estabrooks in his book "Hypnotism" (1943) calls this process the "blocking". Once this blocking system disabled, Hardrup then became an easily hypnotizing subject. Le Dr.

Reiter stated in his report that Hardrup had been subjected to intense hypnotic influence by Nielsen and that by committing the crimes, he would have acted involuntarily. He demonstrated that Hardrup had been subjected to sleepwalking amnesia induced by hypnosis and suggestions post-hypnotics. A modified state of consciousness in which critical thinking and free will are totally abolished.

In November 1952, Nielsen had a conversation with Hardrup during a court meeting. For the next two weeks, Hardrup began to hear the voice of Entity X again while showing great anxiety and agitation. In 1961, Hardrup was finally released from asylum, he now had to convince public opinion that he was no longer a programmed instrument and that if he met Nielsen again, the drama was not likely to be repeated[204:205]... Nielsen was probably introduced to occultism and mind control techniques, perhaps during his time in the Nazi S.S., knowing that they were closely interested in all these things.

6 - Occultism, the paranormal and the C.I.A.

Officially the CIA's programs on human behavioral control as well as its mental programming ceased in 1963 with the exception of project MK-Search, officially stopped in 1972. Clandestine programmes of the same type, however, have continued in other forms, refocusing on the use of electromagnetic radiation to affect the psyche and human behaviour, but also through the use of parapsychological techniques. In 1976, research on parapsychology received direct support from the then cia director: George Bush.

For the CIA, the word "parapsychology" is classified, i.e. any document mentioning the term "psi", which refers to all paranormal phenomena related to the human psyche, is automatically classified top-secret or higher[206].

One of the CIA psychiatrists, John Gittinger, confided during his hearing before the US Senate: "The general idea to which we had reached the extent that brainwashing essentially involved a process of isolating human beings consisting of depriving them of any external contact and subjecting them to long periods of stress... without the need to resort to any esoteric means[207]"

Without the need to resort to any esoteric means. This means that the field of research concerning esotericism, occultism, is not to be excluded if need be. In their quest for absolute control over humans, the CIA and the military have taken a close interest in esotericism and parapsychology.

No wonder, knowing that the source of their studies on mind control comes from the observation of alterations of consciousness during rituals traumatic, trances, demonic possessions and powers psychics developed in religious cults. The appearance esoteric of the mental control is therefore as important, if not more so, than the purely scientific and psychiatric aspect. Occultism, ritual practices and black magic, are essential points in the protocols of MK-Monarch programming because related to other dimensions of the being, we will come back to it...

In the December 1980 "Military Review", Lieutenant John B. Alexander of the U.S. Army Wrote an article entitled "The New Mental Battlefield: Beam me up, Spock!" (The new mental battlefield). In this article, Alexander highlights the growing importance of research

Soviet and American on electromagnetic weapons but also research in the field of parapsychology. He cites some disciplines such as out-of-the-body exit (astral travel), remote viewing, precognition, perceptions extrasensory, telepathy, telekinesis, circulation of

In his article, John B. Alexander writes: "The extent of parapsychological research in the United States is not well known and is not organized in such a way as to Centralized. The U.S. government has reportedly funded some research projects, but they have not been published (...)

The use of telepathic hypnosis also has great potential. This capability could make it possible to deeply implement programming to agents without their being aware of it. Cinematographically speaking, we would then have a Manchu Candidate who would not even require a phone call (editor's note: to trigger a program). "

Lieutenant Alexander concludes his article: "The impact that psychotronic weapons and other paranormal techniques will have in the future is difficult to determine at this time. We can think that whoever makes the first major breakthrough in these areas will have a considerable lead over his opponent, an advantage similar to the possession of nuclear weapons. Clearly, progress in one of the areas mentioned above will add a new dimension to the battlefield.

The Soviets have been working on these techniques for several years (...) The information presented here may be considered by some as ridiculous because not corresponding to their paradigm, some people continue to believe that the world is flat (...) This underlines the need for more coordinated research in the field of the paranormal." This is an article published in 1980, where is the research 35 years later?

Knowing that they are exponential...

Lieutenant John B. Alexander worked with Colonel Michael Aquino (founder of the Temple of Set) on Monarch slaves. According to Fritz Springemeier, he was one of the most involved soldiers in the formation of elite units composed of "Warrior Monks" who could fight using both martial arts and paranormal psychic powers. The recruits were obviously subjects who had undergone a protocol of mental programming resulting in them a multiple personality, a traumatic process that could develop particular psychic faculties in the victims (see the chapter 6[208]).

In 1987, the Seattle Times published an article about Lt. Col. Jim Channon entitled "The New Army's experiment with 'New Age' thinking".

Here is an excerpt: "The army is therefore interested in the New Age philosophy, the idea that the world can be changed by changing people's way of thinking, and that the mind has invisible but tangible powers that are just waiting to be exploited. Centers have been established at Ford Ord in California and Washington DC to explore this intriguing idea that the power of the mind could be more effective than the power of guns in winning a war. From 1980 to 1982, these ideas were tested at Fort Lewis by the Lieutenant-colonel Jim Channon. The army recruited young officers enthusiastic about this "new thinking" in order to associate them with rather skeptical scientists (...) a 'think tank' was then created at the Pentagon to evaluate the question of paranormal psychic phenomena. These meetings addressed the topics of extrasensory perception, mediumship and even a headset designed to synchronize the left side (logic) and the right side (intuition) of the brain! [209]]."

This elite military 'new-age' unit founded by Jim Channon was named "First Earth Battalion", MK subjects (previously split and programmed) receive training in martial arts but also an introduction to esotericism and occultism. The following is an extract from a letter from one of these soldiers of the New Age Battalion which was transmitted to Te^e Marrst. lin px-offiripr dp FUS

Air Force became a Protestant pastor. This letter was published in his

"Flashpoint" newsletter in September 1994: "We are a group of highly selected soldiers. We must be "Purified Psychic Soldiers". We have all received our instructions for "The Plan". We are preparing for the emergence of a 'New Order'. We are encouraged to read all types of books that deal with the New Age and occultism, to study the different martial arts and to exercise the powers of the mind. Communication with guide spirits (editor's note: demonic entities) is also encouraged. We are taught to become 'wise men'. My best friend and I study and exercise our meditation and warrior psychic faculties on a daily basis. I also study Ninjutsu, Tai Kwon Do as well as Tai Chi. We are not supposed to talk to people about this special unit (...) At the end of the eleventh Delta Force Conference, the instructor said: "I witnessed a process of unique and majestic value, an army of Excellence." (...) As our faculties grew, we were told that we were becoming "like gods", that there was no limit for a soldier of the First Earth Battalion. We could travel to different places by our mind, walk through fire, move or bend objects by the force of our mind, see in the future, stop our heart (editor's note: extreme biofeedback as practiced by Indian yogis), etc (...) In the end, not all martial arts serve only one real function: to make the soldier-warrior access the truth (...) There are six levels of psychic soldier, it goes from the beginner to the highest who then becomes a Monk-Warrior or a Master-Warrior (...) Military forces new-age involve rituals, songs, meditations, prayers to earth and pledges of allegiances to the planet and people. The first book we are recommended to read is "The Aquarian Consipracy" (editor's note: The Children of Aquarius, the reference book of the new-age movement[210]!) ..."

Gordon Thomas rapporte dans son livre “Secrets and Lies : A History of CIA Mind-Control”, que le Dr. Stanley

Gottlieb, director of the DSB (CIA Research and Development Office) is said to have launched Operation Often in the late 60s. The aim of this project was to expand research on mysteries of human consciousness by exploring the world of black magic and according to Thomas "by harnessing the forces of darkness to demonstrate that the confines of the human mind are accessible." As part of this operation on paranormal, black magic and demonology, the CIA would have recruited clairvoyants, astrologers, mediums, specialists in demonology but also Wicca wizards, Satanists and other kabbalists and occultists seasoned ... According to Thomas, the CIA even funded a chair of witchcraft at the University of South Carolina.

"Operation Often took a very close interest in demonology. In April 1972, the CIA attempted a discreet approach to the exorcist of the Catholic Archdiocese of New York. The latter categorically refused any cooperation.

The agency also approached Sybil Leek, a Houston witch who cast spells using her tame raven. With the bird perched on his shoulder, Sybil Leek gave lessons in black magic to "beautiful gentlemen" of Washington and she took stock with them of the state of occultism in the United States at that time: 400 groups focused on witchcraft, led by 5000 witches or wizards initiated... a thriving market offering thousands of "adventure tellers" as well as an increasingly varied range of anti-Christian products and articles. Satan was not only alive, but it flourished throughout the country! [21] it."

In "America in The Trance-Formation", Mark Phillips writes: "In 1971, the New York Times published an article on the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and occult research, which was inspired by a a collection of documents obtained from the U.S. Government Printing Office under the Freedom of Information Act.

It was a report to Congress, which made it clear that the CIA was interested in clinical discoveries about cause-and-effect relationships about the impact of religious practices on users of black magic and/or the mind of an observer. Of particular interest to the CIA were the increased levels of suggestibility that certain occult rituals caused in the minds of practitioners. Cannibalism and blood rituals occupied a prominent place in their research! [212]]."

7 - Conclusion

So here we are in the 70s and the MK-Ultra program is officially closed... to make way for new mind control projects that combine previous achievements on mental programming with occultism, black magic, demonology but also with the psychotronic black technology.

The Monarch project is the continuation of all this research that began at the end of the Second World War. Monarch which seems to be the most important program, is still classified top-secret and under the guise of "National Security" (see chapter 10). The Bluebird, Artichoke and MK-Ultra programs ended up coming out in the public domain after 30, 40 or 50 years... Mind control research projects are still operational, they have simply been moved even more deep in the meanderings of government institutions. Slaves under mental programming are topical, you have them every day on your television screens...

Bill Schnoebelen, describes the MK-Monarch programming as follows: "We have good reason to believe that the MK-Ultra still exists today in an even more atrocious form as a Monarch project. The difference between project Monarch and project MK-Ultra is that it merges child abuse with Satanism, always under the auspices of the government...

Children are not only tortured, drugged, electrocuted, etc... but they are also hypnotized and undergo the scientific insertion of demons inside their multiple personalities resulting from a Dissociaitf Disorder of Identity (TDI)... By doing this, they create different types of

"SUPER-SLAVES![213]!" ... "

These "super-slaves" can be used as sex slaves, spies, drug smugglers, murderers... The alter Satanist/Luciferian personalities of priest or high priestess will be part of the deepest programming. MK slaves can be injected into many fields such as politics, the judiciary, science, etc. It is a question of having the best subjects in key positions of domination where the "weak link" option is not possible. They are also found in the entertainment industry and top-level sport. (Topic to be amply developed in Chapter 7)

The "Monarch network" was formed by the meeting of two circles that fit together perfectly because of their hidden and compartmentalized side, a common occult subculture but also because of their mutual interests: on the one hand, the intelligence services, the military and organized crime, and on the other hand the networks composed of families practicing systematic incest, child prostitution, child pornography, satanic ritual abuse, etc. Families stuck in these occult practices from generation to generation. In addition to having in common a taste for depravity, violence, occultism and power, children dissociated by trauma living in the families of some are ideal candidates for the mental control programs of others... Whether it is mafia, religious, political or military groups, in a general and international way, they all know that dissociation, the fragmentation of the personality, is the pivot and cornerstone of secrecy and power. Canadian Therapist Alison Miller writes: "What better source than an already dissociated child whose parents have abused in a group practicing ritual abuse?"

For these MK-Ultra type mind control programs and today MK-Monarch, children with dissociative disorders of identity is therefore sought because they are more easily programmable than a child with an unsplit psyche. This was the case of Cathy O'Brien, who was subjected to repeated rapes by her father and uncles in early childhood and fatally developed major dissociative disorders. His father, who produced child pornography, was 'pinched' by the Information. He was forced to make his children available for the MK-Monarch government project in exchange for impunity and protection for his trafficking. Here's how Cathy O'Brien describes her family in her autobiography "America in full

Trance-formation":

"The stays in my father's house were devastating, but informative. My mother had ended up suffering from deep psychological wounds due to her own condition as a "T. D.I." (dissociative identity disorder) and had become insomniac. My father was traveling regularly to London, Germany and Mexico at the time, as well as taking his family to Disney World in Florida and Washington D.C. My older brother Bill still worked for and with my father, and went with him every year to Cheney's hunting lodge in Greybull, Wyoming, to "hunt," and he followed my father's instructions to keep his wife and three children under mind control through trauma. My brother Mike ran a video business to serve as a front for some of the juicy porn video business of my father and Uncle Bob Tanis. My sister Kelly Jo became a contortionist belly dancer excelling in "gymnastics", as she became "as flexible as Gumby" in accordance with her prostitution programming. Her academic background allowed her to work in day-care centres, where she actually found for my father children abused as potential candidates for the office of "elected". In 1990, she graduated to open an official daycare, "The Little Apprentices," in Grand Haven, Michigan, for my father. My brother Tom ("Beaver") is a

"Compu-Kid" (lit. "Gosse-Ordi") (CIA project), namely a programmed computer genius. My brother Tim broke his leg (in the very place where my mother had broken hers years earlier) for following the

my father's sports programming far exceeds the abilities

Human. My younger sister Kimmy, finally, developed a hysterical obsession with a certain "Mr. Rogers". She expressed an inordinate fear about her huge "electric" dollhouse, which lit up at night to look like the White House, and was at the age of seven being followed by a doctor because of anorexid[214]."

Monarch-type mind control organizations and institutions infiltrate satanic cults and Luciferian and incestuous families to gain access to these children who are already deeply

Differentiated appropriations. In exchange for being able to have it available to install programming that serves their interests, these organizations provide the network or parents with a generous remuneration, favours that can be a form of compensation in the face of justice, support in their hidden or illegal activities but also information concerning MK programming techniques. Indeed, MK programming based on trauma is not "reserved" for government projects, it is a systematic practice on the children of satanic/Luciferian sects that goes back much further than the experiments at the governmental level. These various sects practicing traumatic ritual abuses on their offspring, apply MK protocols depending on the level of knowledge they have on the subject.

Ritual Abuse

1 - Introduction

The research on mind control carried out by the Nazis, and then by the CIA, was developed to make ritual abuses "religious" and of the resulting personality disorders, a true science psychiatric. Mk's secret government programs and satanic ritual abuses practiced in a transgenerational manner are therefore intimately linked.

This doctrine of reducing a human to the state of an object is of order satanic, whether it is practiced by a doctor in a white coat or by a priest in black gowed. One of the purposes of the traumatic ritual abuse practiced by these cults is to initiate the child via the dissociation. This dissociative process causes a breach, fragmentation of the soul opening the door to other dimensions, in other words the deep traumas create an unlocking of the bodies energetic of the child, it is a real spiritual heist... (Subject that we will discuss in more detail in Chapter 6). During these rituals traumatic, the child becomes "initiated and sacred", he is thus bound in spite of himself to the spirit world and this connection opens the way to possessions demonic and paranormal psychic faculties. Following these "initiatory" protocols, this reverse sanctification, the child is therefore divided and parasitized by one or more entities, the crack letting the light through... One fact is that the most survivors of satanic ritual abuse suffer from a disorder dissociative identity (formerly known as personality disorder) multiple). Is it a real demonic possession, a personality multiple or a mixture of both? We will come back to that.

Here is what Father Georges Morand, who was an exorcist priest for ten years, said on France Culture in 2011 in the show "Sur les docks" about abuse

satanic rituals:

- Reporter: Father Morand, when you talk about a young girl naked on a cross, washed down with animal blood. When you talk about fetuses that are torn from their mother's womb and sacrificed. You talk to us

What?

- George Morand: I'm talking about people I've met, that I've helped, accompanied for years, who haven't drawn from their affairs only by the prayer of exorcism. People including me could name you... who have fallen prey to small Satanist groups extremely formidable practicing what are called linked black masses to rites of witchcraft and magic, with ritual murders. under the double covered, and I weigh my words, on the one hand of the mafia, all the networks world of low- and high-level prostitution, drug trafficking and on the other hand personalities that could be said beyond all suspicion who hold key positions in our civilization, whether in the world of politics, of all political persuasions. in the world of the judiciary, in the scientific world, in the world of finance, in the intellectual world. and I would even say alas, three times alas, in the world ecclesiastical[215]."

in 2012, Father Gary Thomas, exorcist of the Diocese of San José in the United States, has said at a lecture at Rutgers University: "I sometimes practice the rite of exorcism for survivors of ritual abuse. Abuse

Satanic ritual is a reality. It's also something incredibly criminal, illegal and highly secretive. These satanic cults that are linked with the 'illuminati' are real and they are active, some since hundreds of years. They're going to kill people, they're going to sexually abuse all members of the cult for the purpose of controlling them. They select sometimes outsiders to practice human sacrifices. all this is real. If you go to see your local police, they won't be able to tell you

Talk about it openly, but law enforcement regularly has to deal with that kind of thing.''

in

In 1990, Elder Mormon Bishop Glenn Pace issued a memorandum denouncing the ritual abuse practices within his Church, here is an excerpt: "This ritualized abuse is the most despicable of all the abuses perpetrated on children. The fundamental and premeditated objective is to torture and terrorize these children until they are forced to dissociate themselves systematically and methodically. These tortures are not a consequence of "anger", it is the execution of perfectly thought out and well-planned rituals, often performed by close relatives. The only way out for these children is to dissociate.''

in

In 1989, the television programme "The Cook Report", broadcast on the English channel ITV, devoted one of its episodes to the issue of satanic ritual abuse. In this documentary, the Reverend Kevin Logan has said: ''In my listening and advice function, I have seen terrible things. I have heard some really disgusting things that had happened to from young people, to children who had been raped on the altar, the initiation to the satanism. Children who had to eat feces and drink blood, all these horrible things in which satanists are involved, and especially I have seen the effect that all this causes on these young people[216].'' In an investigation of 125 Chicago police officers in 1992, and reported in the book "What Cops Know", author Connie Fletcher concludes that "satanic ritual murders exist. It is not a question of saying that it is generalized, but people do practice this kind of thing. In a Satanic murder, the victim's right arm can be tied behind the body; the right testicle may be missing; the body can be emptied of its blood; the heart can be removed; human or animal feces may be found in the cavities of the body. There will be body parts missing: the heart, genitals, an index finger, the tongue... There you go as far as confidencesare[217] [217]."

2 - Ritual abuse in the modern world

"It is time to overcome this reality. 20 years ago, if you talked about pedophilia, you were locked up. 15 years ago, it was the same thing with incest. Today, this is the case with ritual abuse. Kids continue to suffer." David Poulton, former Australian Federal Police Sergeant - Preston 1990[218]

"We have just understood that paedophilia exists. We cannot yet understand that there is even worse than paedophilia I would say

"simple", and there are people who still resist with all their strength and strength.

all their interior." Martine Bouillon, former deputy prosecutor of Bobigny[219].

a/ Definition

One of the first references to satanic ritual abuse to be reported in a book dates back to 1930 in Karl Menniger's "The Human Mind", a reference book on psychiatry. The book mentioned the existence of black masses, Satanism and the worship of the devil as real facts that take place in major cities in Europe and the United States[220].

The term "Ritual Abuse" was first used in 1980 by a Canadian psychiatrist named Lawrence Pazder, who defined the phenomenon as follows: "Repetitive physical, emotional, mental and spiritual attacks, combined with the systematic use of symbols, ceremonies and manipulations for purposes malicious."

In a 1992 issue of the Journal of Child Sexual Abuse, David W. Lloyd defined ritual abuse as follows: "Abuse Intentional physical, sexual or psychological of a child by a person normally responsible for his well-being. Such abuses are repeated and practiced during religious ceremonies, and typically involve acts of cruelty on animals and threats to the child[221]."

For David Finkelhor, the author of "Child Sexual Abuse" and "Nursery Crime", these are abuses occurring in a context related to certain symbols or group activities with connotations religious, magical or supernatural. These activities, repeated over time, are used to scare and intimidate children.' Ritual abuse systematically involve mind control over small victims.

In Great Britain there is a document from the Department of Health dedicated to the protection of children, entitled 'Working Together under the Children Act''. The document does not talk about abuse rituals but he uses the term of organized abuse, i.e. networks paedocriminals. A report that at least has the merit of acknowledging the existence of

of these networks, which are generally denied by political institutions, legal and journalistic, an omerta that seems international...

In 1991, this government document defined the matter as follows: "Organized abuse is a generic term that relates to abuse involving a number of aggressors, a number of children, and generally encompasses different forms of abuse (...) A wide range of activities are covered by this term, ranging from small networks of pedophilia or pornography, often but not systematically organized for profit, most of whose participants know each other, to large networks of individuals or families that can be distributed more broadly and in which not all members know each other necessarily between them. Some organized groups may have behavior strange and ritualized, sometimes associated with particular "beliefs".

This can be a powerful mechanism to terrify abused children in order to that they do not disclose what they are going through[222]."

In 2004, the update of the document no longer mentioned "strange and ritualized behavior" but added that "the aggressors act in concert to abuse children, sometimes in isolation or by using an institutional network or position of authority to recruit children for the purpose of abusing them. Organized and multiple abuses occur at the in the context of an maltreatment network involving families or a community, and within institutions such as schools or homes community, and within institutions such as schools or homes

Residential. Such abuse is deeply traumatic for children who are involved. Investigations take time and require work requiring specialized skills from both the police and the social workers. Some investigations become extremely complex in reason for the number of places and people involved[223].

Valerie Sinason, children's psychotherapist and director of the The Clinic for Dissociative Studies in London, defined ritual and spiritual abuse during a series of lectures entitled "Safeguarding London's Children" in 2007: "Spiritual violence is the establishment of a position of power and attachment that leads to total blind obedience by the thought, speech and action, about a child, adolescent or adult, by threats of physical and spiritual punishment of the victim himself, his family or those who want to help him. In this type of abuse, there is no place for a relationship with the divine, the victim does not have the right to have a spiritual relationship other than that which he has with his executioners. A great many abuses involve a ritualized protocol, with precise dates, precise times and repetition of the same gestures and actions. Abuse ritual involves children involved in violence against their will physical, psychological, emotional, sexual and spiritual. This under the covered with religious, magical or supernatural beliefs. The whole nine yards submission and obedience is achieved by threats of violence on the victims, their families or those who would like to help them[224].

in

In 2006, the Advocates for Survivors Child Abuse (ASCA), an Australian lawyer-led organisation, published a report entitled ''Ritual Abuse & Torture in Australia'', of which here are some excerpts: ''Ritual abuse is a multi-level crime, in which dysfunctional families stand together to to organise these crimes by exploiting children for profit. The exploiter and main aggressor of the ritually abused child is most often a parent. These groups of aggressors are usually made up of two or three families forming a network that offers their own children to the abuse inflicted by other members of this network. In his book "Trauma Organised Systems: Physical and Sexual Abuse in Families”, Arnon Bentovim décrit ces familles as an "organized traumatic system" in which severe trauma define and shape the family structure and the interaction between its members. Victims have been growing up since childhood in an environment where violence, sexual abuse and extreme trauma are the norm. In this context of organized sexual exploitation, violence and incest committed by aggressors against their own children can be seen not only as a behavior sadistic, but also as a kind of training in these operating practices sexual[225].''

In 1992, the U.S. Office of the Attorney General of Utah established a Ritualistic Abuse Crime Unit in conjunction with the Child Abuse Prosecution Assistance

Unit). This specialized unit was headed by police officers Matt Jacobson and Michael King. It was responsible for investigating and offering a assistance to Utah police officers regarding ritual and other crimes illegal activities of local sects. After a year of investigation on this subject, Utah Attorney General Jan Graham has asked to meet individually with each township chief, every darling, every senior police officer, as well as with the magistrates, this in order to discuss the creation of a possible jurisdiction concerning this problem. Over the past two years, this unit has surveyed more than 125 cases related to ritual abuse, of which forty cases concerned Homicides. In parallel, investigators met with hundreds of citizens claiming to have been victims of these Satanist practices themselves. this Government initiative produced a 60-page report entitled "Ritual Crime in the State of Utah" written in 1995 by investigators Jacobson and King for the Attorney General's Office. The report defines ritual crimes as follows: "Ritual abuse is an iorme orutaie daous on an eniant, an aaoxescent or an adult, involving physical, sexual and psychological violence with the use of Rituals. Ritual abuse is rarely isolated, it is repeated violence for a long period of time. Physical violence is extreme, including torture, sometimes to the point of murder. Sexual abuse is painful, sadistic and humiliating. By definition, ritual abuse is not a impulsive crime, but rather a mischievously thought-out crime[226]."

This Government report was clearly not intended to undermine the credibility of the question of satanic ritual abuses and its content is rather objective. he for example: "There is evidence that there are many cases of ritual abuse of children by individuals or children. small groups. Sometimes these people use Satanism or another religion, as well as "magical" practices in the context of abuses. what has not been corroborated is the multitude of testimonies of "survivors" saying have participated in human sacrifices, sexual abuse of young people children, torture or other atrocities committed by groups very well organized, affecting all levels of government, all strata social and all the states of the country. Lack of investigations and prosecutions in such complaints do not mean that these testimonials are false. The purpose of this report is to highlight in detail the issues associated with file investigations and assessments ritual crimes. The help and assistance of senior police officers, magistrates, therapists, etc., is greatly appreciated (...) In conclusion, cases of ritual crimes must be treated like any other case. Investigators are encouraged to keep open-mindedness when dealing with cases involving occultism, religious beliefs or ritual criminal activities (...) Training and education on the many facets of ritual crimes/abuses is necessary and should be of great use at all levels of the police force. the police officers should be instructed on the elements basic ritual crimes. This training should include the types organizations involved in covert activities, their purposes and the symbols used by their members (...) This training should include information on the bizarre nature of ritual abuse as well as the problems associated with the disorder multiple personality, repressed amnesia and memories, hypnosis, etc[227]."

Despite detailed evidence of ritual abuse from testimonies of children, families, adult survivors, police officers, therapists and associations working with victims; despite the remarkable coherence of these reports, both national and international; despite the similarities and overlaps between the different cases and testimonies; society as a whole still resists believing in this harsh reality of ritual abuse. There remains this mistaken belief that Satanism and other occult activities are isolated and rare (see totally non-existent). This is not a new problem, but the Society is only just beginning to recognize the seriousness and extent of this phenomenon. We all need to learn about this. A lot of professionals meet victims of these ritual abuses but do not grasp not necessarily the extent of the abuses that there are behind the mental disorders of their patients. The concept of ritual abuse, according to which groups of adults terrorize and torture children in order to control and control them exploit is terrifying and therefore very controversial (always this notion of paradigm to preserve).

A destructive sect practicing ritual abuse can be defined as a closed network, system or group, whose followers are manipulated and conditioned by the use of mind control techniques.

It is a system that is imposed without the consent of the person, it aims to change their personality and behaviour. The leader(s) are all-powerful, the ideology of the group is totalitarian and the will to the individual is totally subordinate to the group. The destructive sect creates its own values with little or no respect for ethics and morality. It is engaged in illegal activities such as the sexual exploitation of children and adults: prostitution and child pornography, the production of snuff-films, drug and gun trafficking, but also all sorts of shenanigans that allow money to flow. In this kind of networks, all members stand by the "barbichette" since they are all involved in highly criminal activities.

Most victims report being sexually abused and tortured by several people at the same time and in the company of others small victims. Testimonies report that women are just as active as men in this abuse ritualized. The word "ritual" does not necessarily mean "satanic" but rather protocol or methodical, but also repetitive. For example, the Juju cult in Africa of the west described by Isiah Oke practices ritual abuse with states of altered consciousness but without any particular belief in Satan. some groups of Gnostic occultists could certainly be mistaken for Satanic cults, however in some cases it would be more appropriate to label as Luciferian or Neo-Gnostic. There are many cults that incorporate rituals where Satan is invoked among other entities but he is not systematically considered the central and unique god of worship.

However, most survivors in our Western societies report that they were ritually abused as part of a satanic cult, the purpose being to indoctrinate them in Satanist beliefs and practices. Abuse ritual is rarely isolated, it is usually repeated over a long period of time, in a systematic way. Physical violence is extreme, torture, rape and murder (simulated or actual) are used to traumatize and create deep dissociative states in victims. Sadistic sexual abuse is aimed at to humiliate and make suffer. This practice aims to dominate, to create dissociation and submission of the victim. According to the psychotraumatologist Muriel Salmona, sexual violence is the worst thing about psychological trauma. The WHO also stated that sexual mutilation is the most traumatic abuse that can be inflicted on a human being. This type of barbarism is therefore used in such a way that recurrent in these hyper-violent sects. Harassment and violence psychological that are added to the physical violence are devastating, indoctrination involves the use of drugs, hypnosis and techniques mind control. Intimidation and extreme violence of sect deeply terrorize the victim, following the traumas, she himself finds himself in a state of dissociation and mental control (mental confusion and even traumatic amnesia), and communication to the outside is therefore extremely difficult. If contact with the network has not been broken and therapy has not been undertaken, victims are at risk of living under this control for very long. It is important to understand that ritual abuse and control

The traumatic memories constitute a real prison without walls.

This ritualized violence seems to have three purposes: 1-The rituals of certain groups are part of a religious belief in which the victim is indoctrinated.

2- Rituals are used to intimidate and silence victims.

3- The elements of the ritual (worship to the devil, satanic symbols, sacrifices of animals or humans...) seem so incredible that they undermine the credibility of the testimony and prosecute these very difficult crimes[228].

the

Belgian survivor, Regina Louf (witness X1 of the Dutroux case), reported in an interview given to Annemie Bulté and Douglas De Coninck (the authors of "Les dossiers X: Ce que la Belgique ne devait pas savoir sur l'affaire" it is important that she cannot tell anyone about what was happening to her. It's why they organized "ceremonies"... The sole purpose of these rituals was to totally disorient the victims[229].

In her book "Trauma and Recovery", Judith Lewis Herman writes: "Secrecy and silence are the first protection of Aggressors. If the secret is broken, the aggressor will attack the credibility of his victim. If he cannot silence her completely, he will try to make sure no one listens to him.'' Rituals participate in this the aim of undermining credibility, all the more so in a modern society that is increasingly in addition materialistic and totally hermetic to the existence of practices

A 218-page thesis entitled "L'abus rituel: le point de vue d'intervenantes en agression sexuelle" was submitted in 2008 at the Université du Québec en Outaouais. Here is the text of presentation of this thesis: "Ritual abuse remains a subject that is very little known to the various intervention circles. the lack of consensus on how to conceptualize ritual abuse and controversy surrounding it undermines its recognition. This research qualitative has three objectives: to document and analyze information about ritual abuse, advancing knowledge and understanding this type of abuse from the perspective of sexual assault that supported women who had suffered it from the smallest childhood, and contribute to the advancement of knowledge on the subject in the Francophone intervention community. Semi-structured interviews were conducted conducted with eight workers who practice in different departments of assistance to victims of sexual assault and who have admitted to having intervened with at least two survivors of ritual abuse. The results obtained are presented in three separate parts: the results describing the whole characteristics belonging to the concept of ritual abuse, those allowing to be aware of the consequences caused by this type of abuse and those who stem from the experiences of the participants in their interventions with the survivors of ritual abuse. This research makes it possible to recognize some of the problems relating to the conceptualization of ritual abuse including the use of of the word cult to deal with the subject. It is also hoped that the definition of ritual abuse developed as part of this research serves as a starting point when working with stakeholders who have practical experience with survivors of ritual abuse to agree on how to define this type of abuse. It is also recommended that more research is done on ritual abuse, particularly with respect to programming, a method of thought control, and in terms of dissociation in survivors of ritual abuse. Above all, it is necessary to develop more practical knowledge in intervention in this area. More research will also need to look at the links between ritual abuse and sexual sadism, as well as ritual abuse and networks sexual exploitation of children[230].''

En 2011 le journal “Trauma & Dissociation” (International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation) a publié un dossier Francophone entitled "Guidelines for the treatment of the disorder" dissociative of identity in adults''. This folder contains a chapter entitled ''Organized abuses'' showing that this subject of ritual abuse is totally linked to the pnenomene of the dissociams trouoies, here is an extract:

i * - i in the j* r

"A substantial minority of patients with Dissociative Identity Disorder (IDD) report sadistic abuse, exploitation, coercion at the hands of organized groups. This type of organized abuse victimizes individuals through extreme control of their environments in childhood and frequently involves multiple attackers. It can be organized around activities of child networks, child pornograpnia or in the child prostitution circles, various "religious" or religious groups, multi-generational family systems and trafficking and prostitution networks of humans. Organized abuse frequently incorporates activities that are sexually perverse, horrible and sadistic, which may involve coercion of the child as a witness or participant in the abuse of other children.

Survivors of organized abuse - particularly ongoing abuse - are those among the most traumatized of dissociative patients. They are most prone to self-destruct and serious suicide attempts. They appear very often caught up in very ambivalent attachments towards of their aggressors and often present complex forms of TDI. some of these highly traumatized patients have marked amnesia for a large the history of organized abuse only emerges in the course of treatment[231]."

Ritual abuse leading to deep trauma will develop a complex form of post-traumatic stress disorder that can lead to many symptoms in victims: panic attacks, crying uncontrollable, uncontrollable anger, eating disorders, trends suicidal, self-harm, hyper-alertness, somatic symptoms, obsessions, terrors, sleep disorders, nightmares, flashbacks, photographic memory, addictions: alcohol, drugs, sex, over-reaction to minor stress, violent or flight reactions, extreme mood swings, risky behaviour, shame and guilt, dehumanization, excessive preoccupation of relations with the aggressor, attribution of total power to the aggressor, idealization of the aggressor, gratitude to the aggressor, belief in a form of special or supernatural relationship with the aggressor, acceptance of beliefs and affirmations of the aggressor, repeated failures to protect himself, impotence and despair[232].

These ritual abuses are an integral part of the lives of some families where one or both parents participate or collaborate in a network. This type of practice is also applied by military groups or policies possessing the knowledge to program individuals, usually children. Children are therefore victims of sexual abuse with rituals and intimidation aimed at terrorizing and imposing them silence; but the goal is also to convert them and format them to a belief system, to a cult. In these Satanist or Luciferian groups, the Basic programming instilled in the child is loyalty and fidelity to the group as well as the law of silence. The child will be indoctrinated to believe that the Lifestyle of the group is the only way to go and that its leaders and the entities (deity and demons) must receive obedience and loyalty. Worship, the network, must represent his only "family" The child is conditioned for believing that abuse is done for one's own good is a military-type conditioning in which to think for oneself is not tolerated, children must obey without thinking. In these protocols of mental control, the executioners separate and isolate the victim from the rest of humanity by forcing it to practice despicable and unthinkable things for a normally constituted human. Very soon, children will have to participate in the rape and torture. It is a way of making them feel guilty and complicit so that they do not disclose criminal activities outside the public.

of the group. This means that the child will attend and participate in himself rape, animal sacrifices but also real human sacrifices or Simulated. These children are manipulated to make them believe that the abuse they may have committed on animals or on other children came from their own choice. They therefore feel guilty and ashamed, fearing revenge or even the police and the prison. This cements the law of silence as well as the atrocious and overwhelming feeling of being an executioner and a criminal yourself. all this combined with dissociative disorders will lead the child to isolate psychologically painful experiences and to continue his life ''as if nothing had happened'' and obviously without any disclosure to the outside world.

These practices therefore involve on the one hand the children of these Luciferian families, destined to occupy key positions within our society, and on the other, small victims destined to be tortured and sacrificed by the former. It is literally fresh flesh serving during rituals to program the young generation of elitist worship. some same way that there are two categories of MK-Monarch slaves: all first of all, those of the ''second zone'', used for prostitution, trafficking in drugs, etc., intended to be sacrificed; and then those who are part of the Luciferian blood lines that will be intended to serve the hierarchy while throughout their lives in strategic positions (we will come back to this in chapter 7 on MK-Monarch programming). This participation forced children to ritual abuse also aims to make them externalize their "inner rage" accumulated when they were themselves abused and tortured. The child develops a negative emotional load (traumatic memory) animals. The formation of these "children of rabies" is also done by forcing to kill a pet to which they have closely connected previously. Everything is done to "break" the child, to neutralize as soon as his first years all natural empathy and innocence by creating profound dissociative disorders in him. Ritual abuse is practiced in families who systematically repeat violence against their offspring. Families stuck in a transgenerational pathological continuity and loaded with demonic links because of the occultism in which they engage from generation to generation. Children of these blood lines are programmed to perpetuate the unfortunate tradition, the child victim will in turn become an executioner reproducing the abuse he has suffered himself if he was not taken care of and removed from the destructive sect. In the German documentary "Sexzwang" (forced sex), Dr. Jim Phillips (former forensic pathologist for the police British) states: "All Satanists have been abused, all! I cannot imagine that a normal human being can being able to do something so horrible, disgusting and repugnant... "

Clinical psychologist Ellen P. Lacter wrote: "All victims were forced to commit violence on others, often since early childhood. All assailants were themselves victims of serious abuses. It is essential to keep this in mind in the treatment of survivors. The 'White-Black' or 'Good-Bad' scheme is at proscribe because it will fuel the patient's fear that he could be irremediably bad[233]."

Living in such a chaotic environment will cause sudden changes in the chemistry of the child's body. This traumatic type of life results in high levels of adrenaline that can create a real addiction in children or adolescents. In adulthood (and even before) the victim will consciously or unconsciously cause situations to raise his adrenaline level. Violence is a very effective way of doing this. It is it is therefore important to take into account this phenomenon of addiction to violence and of its systematic repetition from one generation to the next in families violent or not related to ritual abuse. This violence against others triggers in the executioner a sudden production of endorphins during the passage to the act, it also allows him to dissociate himself and anesthetize his own traumatic memory ever more explosive, all this unconsciously.

The aggressor (himself a former victim) thus relieves his own pain interior by a "shoot" of endorphins. It is therefore a vicious circle and a real addiction to endorphins and violence (this will be returned to in more detail in Chapter 5). The book "Ritual Abuse and Mind Control: The Manipulation of Attachment Needs" contains the testimony of a survivor who illustrates this phenomenon of dissociative disorders that are repeated from generation to generation: "My first memory with X was when he walked into the room and grabbed me by the hair to get me spin by turning in circles. When he stopped, everyone had laughed because I was all disoriented. It could go from a state of a coldness and incredible cruelty to a state of extreme kindness.

Many times I tried to please her to access her kind side (...) she (editor's note: the mother) has also abused me since birth, not only in rituals, but also at home. There was a part of her that was losing control, she showed her teeth, her eyes lit up in a certain way, and she was going mad[234]..."

This dissociative phenomenon with alternations of totally immoral and violent behaviors with normal and affectionate behaviors goes create a kind of cognitive dissonance in the child's mind. The latter will unconsciously block the conflicting memories in which a parent who is supposed to love and care for him behaves in a totally abnormal and dangerous. This reinforces amnesia and dissociative states in children. Repetitive traumas will split the child into several personalities and he will respond in a different way depending on whether he has case to the "good" mother or to the "bad" mother. For example, when the "bad" mother inflicts torture, the child switches into a personality who knows how to react to this "bad" mother. If it's the "good" mother who takes care of him, the child is in another state of consciousness and has no no knowledge of the "bad" mother or her other alter related to the facet obscure from his mother. This phenomenon of dissociation and amnesia explains some testimonies of victims who say that there was "the child of the night" and "the child of the day", two personalities who had no awareness of the other and who allowed the child to lead a normal life, until the day when traumatic memories eventually date back to adulthood (see Chapter 5).

in her book entitled ''Unshackled'', Kathleen Sullivan, a survivor of ritual abuse and mind control, describes also the dissociative states in which his parents were when they abused their daughter: "Each time, she used a white sheet to hang me from a beam. When she did that, her voice became that of a little girl. She seemed to replay what someone had subjected her to when she was a child. Then strangely, its voice became that of an elderly person saying horrible things about me (...) On several occasions, she also locked me in a wooden crate in the basement. Sometimes I stayed for hours locked in pain inside this exigue box. When it came down to pick me up, she ''delivered me and saved me'' from this cashier wondering how I got there. It didn't seem to be

I could not tell her that she was the one in charge[235]. ''

The psychotraumatologist Muriel Salmona describes this process of dissociation of the personality as follows: "Moreover, women often say, they no longer recognize their aggressor, their companion, when he becomes violent. He begins to have another look, another expression, other ways of speaking, of shouting, another voice... Because often they reproduce identically the voice of their father for example. It's impressive because it is no longer the same person, the aggressors are blow colonized by someone else they do not control[236].

Many victims or executioners who have been under the influence of these extremely traumatic practices during childhood and adolescence therefore develop severe dissociative disorders; including a syndrome of multiple personality (Dissociative Identity Disorder, T.D.I.) which is the the most extreme level of psychic dissociation. The executioner can therefore be a second personality (an alter) of the individual who will not be aware of his functioning to Dr. Jekyll & Mr Hide due to the amnesic walls that partition the different personalities. It can be perfectly integrated into society and its public personality will not leave nothing glimpse of his occult and violent activities.

Alter personality

public perhaps that of a good sincere Christian while a personality alter much deeper will be the worst of satanists. Ritual abuse aimed at personality splitting is the cornerstone of control mental, the key element in subjugate, exploit and silence

Victims. This control is achieved by the deliberate creation of a disorder dissociative of identity through repetitive trauma, in combination with indoctrination, conditioning, hypnosis and various psychotropic drugs, all accompanied by programming whose effectiveness will depend on the level the network has instruction on this type of mind control.

Dr. Lawrence Pazder describes a certain omnipresence of executioners in our society who have a normal appearance and who lead a life just as normal at first glance. They are present in all layers of society that they have carefully infiltrated. Any position of power or influence over society must be regarded for them as a target for infiltration. Executioners have money available, a lot have impeccable situations: doctors, ministers, professions of all types[237]."

the

Dr. Catherine Gould, one of the founding members of the Los Angeles Study Group on ritual abuse (Task Force), is internationally recognized for its therapeutic work with children victims of Satanism. In the 1994 documentary "In Satan's Name" by Antony Thomas, she described the same thing as Dr. Pazder regarding infiltration and control.

of society by these cults: "There are certainly bankers, psychologists, people from the media, we have also heard about child protection services but also police officers, because they have an interest in being present in all these socio-professional environments. When I started this work, I thought that the motivations behind pedophilia were limited to sex and money, but I began to realize during my ten years of research that the motivations are even more sinister... Children are abused in a purpose of indoctrination. Ritual abuse of children is a protocol used to format humans for worship. It is about formatting children who have so much abused, so much subjected to mind control that they become very useful to the sect, at all levels. I think the purpose of all this is to obtain the maximum control, whether in that country or in a other."

the

British psychiatrist Vera Diamond, who also works with survivors of ritual abuse, states in the same documentary: "People are indoctrinated in a way that is very difficult to understand. I is currently working with people who have undergone this type of conditioning. It's what is called "Mental Control", they completely format the victim. According to our sources, this involves high-level organizations such as the CIA. I've even heard about the royal family's involvement, but also other equally high families.''

The American pastor Bob Larson also speaks of a systematic infiltration of institutions to establish their control: "He is it is perfectly possible that these activities are even above the Mafia and other criminal organizations. It is possible that it is the most great network and criminal organization of the world. They infiltrate the system the judiciary, the legislative and executive branches of government, the positions and professions of power and authority. Ains'ils may have a some control. They believe, as the Bible prophesys, that one day the Antichrist will rule over the whole world."

Le rapport gouvernemental “Ritual Crime in the State of Utah”

mentioned earlier in this chapter describes what he calls Satanism

Generational'': ''This type of group includes gender members male and female of all ages. They are usually born within the group and do not seem to be able to get out of it, except by death. They are very organized, very disciplined and extremely discreet. Local groups have strong ties with national and international groups (editor's note: extensive network). The rituals they practice are elaborate and completely Planned. They are worshippers of Satan and they do everything to move forward their cause (...) Their roots and practices go back hundreds of years. These people practice ritual abuse and the sacrifice of children (...) Women in these groups are used as ''pastoralists'' to provide babies in worship. These sects achieve perfect control over members who leave no evidence of their activities (...) Skeptics do not can not believe in the existence of such groups, arguing that no one can torture and sacrifice babies and children. However, in the past children were sacrificed to Satan but under other names like Moloch by example. There are also documented historical cases of child sacrifices. In our time, many people report the existence of this kind of Satanism. They are discredited by the skeptics as well as the many people who are undergoing therapy for dissociative disorders caused by severe psychological trauma, and physical[238]."

Dans le livre “Breaking the Circle of Satanic Ritual”, Daniel Ryder écrit que pour le sergent Jon Hinchcliff

(retired from the Mineapolis police), one of the factors that allows these Hidden activities to endure is the social status of the members of the network.

Hinchcliff reports that testimonies from victims show that some of these members are respected doctors, lawyers, businessmen, religious, magistrates, etc. The former policeman said: "It would seem that all their bases are covered and protected." By their façade of respectability and their placement strategic, these people can make very calculated counterattacks before that any public disclosure of criminal activity cannot be made.

in his book "The New Satanists", Linda Blood (Former member of the Temple of Set and former mistress of Michael Aquino) reports the testimony of a certain Bill Carmody who is the pseudonym of a senior intelligence instructor at the FLETC (Federal Law Enforcement Training Center): "Carmody investigated for some time the disappearances of children that seemed related to sectarian activities. As a member of a specialized team, he conducted an investigation into a network that operated in several states in the Southwestern United States. Carmody was thus able to infiltrate the total three criminal Satanist cults. Carmody said of these sects: "The ones that are the most serious are those that are the more concealed and covered, indeed these clans have very sophisticated while having the best means of communication, it is of an international network.'' Carmody states that these groups are engaged in the trafficking in drugs, arms and human beings, as well as trafficking in drugs, arms and human beings, child pornography (...) According to him, the best organized criminal cults are run by intelligent people and highly educated, these are people from the upper classes of the society where they hold important positions in their community, so-called "respectable" positions. These sectarian groups constitute a Very secretive subculture that belongs to the underworld in the broadest sense. they are generally composed of members of transgenerational families including Blood ties help to maintain silence and secrecy[239].

During his appearance on meta-TV in 2015, the formerFrench gendarme and activist Christian 'Stan'

Maillaud described in part this elitist network practicing the systematic ritual abuses of training the elite of tomorrow:

''At the moment when all key positions are not yet held by ''MK-

Ultra'', where the entire societal elite is not yet held by these mentally ill, there are still human beings in the camp of the armed forces and we must put all our energy in their direction (...) Because there has to be a split in their forces and they have to come to the camp of the sovereign people who must free themselves from this grip (...) I am talking about the bite of the vampire, that is to say that for me the act of sodomizing a child martyr corresponds to the vampire who bites a creature for the change to vampire. A child who is raped, tortured, martyred throughout the world his childhood, which finds neither justice nor protection and which reaches the age adult like that, kept in the networks that martyr him, becomes himself a predator. Especially when it is explained to him that if he in turn attacks other children who are tortured and raped, this will relieve him of his own suffering. This is the protocol they apply (...) It is some something recurring (...) the people who are placed in the societal elite are those which are selected by Freemasonry or rose-cross (...) It is necessary to know that in Freemasonry, to gain rank you must pass rituals, so this small pyramid is to be superimposed with the pyramid of your career. Do you want to move up in rank? So you have to go through rituals in the lodge of which you are a part. The more power hungry you are and of success, the more you will ask to pass the grades and you will then be caught in satanic rituals. The first practices are therefore rape collective of children, then killing, etc. What makes you have completely degenerate people who arrive at the head of the institutions and that in addition these people there afterwards bring their own children from an early age in rituals of this kind to make them the future societal elite. And that it is something that people do not yet understand at the moment.

We saw when we were investigating that there is a protocol where there are two types of victims: there are disadvantaged children, abducted children, children born under X, of rape, which serve as a "raw material" for the initiation of other children. That is to say that you have on one side the children who are taken by a Freemason father in these evenings, and on the other side, those children who come out of cages and who are put there so that the child of the elite ends up opening the belly of this unfortunate who was raped collectively and tortured by everyone... What for? Because it goes create the fragmentation of the personality or compartmentalization of memories (...)

You can imagine the monsters that are put on the market. So that's why that at present in all the small societal elite, all the places are being caught by these monsters following these formal protocols that have their real origin in Auschwitz."

Despite the total silence of the mainstream media on the subject, many people are working to disclose these inhumane practices. in 1996, un article intitulé “An Analysis of Ritualistic and Religion-Related Child Abuse Allegations" (an analysis of testimonies ritual and religious abuse of children! [240!)]was written by three university professors in psychology: Bette Bottoms, Phillip Shaver and Gail Goodman. The article contains a list that can be used to define cases of ritual abuse, these criteria were identified from the testimonies of victims and

Therapists:

- Abuse by one or more persons of a group in which members appear to be following the orders of one or more leaders.
- Abuse related to any practice or behaviour repeated in a well-defined manner (which may include prayers, songs, incantations, the wearing of particular clothes...)

- Abuses related to symbols (for example the 666, the inverted pentagram, inverted or broken crosses), invocations, outfits clothing with symbols, beliefs associated with Satan.

- Abuses related to a belief in the supernatural, the paranormal, occultism or special powers (e.g. "magic surgery" - detailed in chapter 7-, spiritualism, etc.)

- Rituals associated with activities involving tombs, crypts, bones...
- Rituals involving feces or animal or human blood.
- Rituals involving specific daggers, candles, altars...
- Rituals involving real or simulated torture and sacrifice of animals.
- Rituals involving sacrifices with real or simulated murders of humans.
- Rituals involving real or simulated acts of cannibalism.
- Rituals involving the obligation to attend or participate in sexual practices.
- Rituals involving child pornography.
- Rituals involving drugs.
- Rituals to bind a child to Satan or a demonic entity.
- Abuse perpetrated by a priest, rabbi or pastor.
- Abuse committed in a religious setting, a religious school or a religious centre.
- "Breeding" of newborns for rituals of sacrifices.
- Abuse causing periods of amnesia or disorders returning on certain dates.
- Abuse disclosed by an individual with a dissociative disorder or multiple personality caused by ritual or religious abuse.

This list is not exhaustive. In 1989, the document entitled Ritual

Abuse Task Force, "Report of a Working Group on Ritual Abuse and mental control" was published by the "Commission for Women of Los Angeles", chaired by Myra B. Riddell and attended by Dr. Catherine Gould and Dr. Lynn Laboriel. The study committee was composed of professionals in the medical, mental health, education, justice as well as members of victim support associations. This report mentions the types of physical and psychological violence described by the survivors and their therapists:

- Lock the victim in a cage, closet, cellar or any other confined place, telling him that he will die there. Some victims report being locked in a coffin and buried alive for simulate a death. One of the members of the group then comes "to the rescue" of the traumatized child who will establish a privileged link with his savior who will be perceived as a groin, n emermement can be iaire with aes insects or animals. This "game" of isolation and deliverance of the child will make him even more vulnerable to indoctrination and destructive practices of group.

- Humiliation through verbal violence, forced nudity in front of the group, forced ingestion of urine, stool, blood, human flesh or semen. Obligation to commit heinous acts such as mutilation, murders, rapes of a child or an infant.

- Guilt and threats of denunciation, the victim is deceived and she ends up believing that his participation in the atrocities was voluntary. This feeling of guilt and shame helps to show fidelity and loyalty to the sect and its doctrines. The victims are indoctrinated to believe that the hyper-violent group is the only refuge that can accept and protect them and that there is no point in asking for outside help. The child is indoctrinated to believe that God has reieted and abandoned him, that he is related to Satan, and that there is no way out of the group.

- Physical violence involving rape and sexual torture generally practised in groups, zoophilia, shocks electric, hangings by hands or feet, immersion in water until near drowning, deprivation of food, water and sleep. A victim in a state of exhaustion is much more open to control mental because fatigue will hinder his ability to judge. the painful tortures cause the child to dissociate himself, and just like a prisoner of war subjected to torture he becomes ready to do whatever he will be required to stop the pain. Physical pain is often associated with sexual arousal for which a child is not prepared to face. Pain and pleasure are combined to help establish an unhealthy relationship between anointed and the oourreaux. ne syndrome of Stockholm is being exploited to the full to create an attachment between victims and Aggressors.

- Make the victim feel that he is constantly monitored and controlled by the executioners and their spiritual allies (spirits, demons, deities). The child is manipulated to believe that the "walls have ears" and that an "eye that sees everything" constantly observes his actions. The child is subjected to all kinds of lies whose purpose is to reinforce the whole power and omnipresence of the executioners.
- Oath of Secrecy on pain of death if the victim discloses anything. Mental programming for the victim to commit suicide in the event of memories or disclosure of sectarian and criminal activities. Strong vulnerability to self-sabotage impulses and self-destruction impulses when the victim begins therapy and tries to leave the sectarian group.
- Use of psychotropic drugs altering and confusing the awareness of the victim, thus facilitating sexual assaults. the Psychotropic drugs can be injected, administered orally, in the form of suppositories or incorporated into food or drink. The effects hypnotics and paralytics cause in the victim of mental confusion, drowsiness but also impaired memory. The executioners bet on these alterations of consciousness caused by drugs to strengthen the illusion that they have absolute power to which the child must submit. the victims also lose the notion of the boundary between the group and the self, they come to identify with the group and feel like an extension of

This one. Loss of self-esteem contributes to the development of wickedness and inner rage.

Use of mind control, hypnosis, conditioning and programming with the use of "triggers" to manipulate the different personalities of the victim. Survivors of abuse report having undergone intense projections of lights in the eyes during the programming sessions. These lights seem to cause disorientation and induce a state of trance, thus decreasing the resistance of the victim and increasing their suggestibility to programming.

- Coercing the victim to work for the sect outside, engaging in prostitution, drug trafficking and other activities Illegal. Infiltration of social institutions (schools, churches, order, courts, psychiatry, politics...) in order to extend the sphere of the group's influence.

- Exploitation of repetitive pregnancies following the rape of some young girls in the group used as "reproductive". The goal is to regularly provide the cult with undeclared babies. These babies serve to fuel ritual sacrifices or the black market, while these pregnancies and these traumatic deliveries serve to "break" and control again more the victim. Young victims may be forced to follow a hormonal treatment in order to accelerate their puberty.

- Use of rituals such as "magic surgery" (we will return to this in chapter 7), various rituals "of passage" as the "ritual of rebirth" and the "ritual marriage", this in order to strengthen the subjugation to the sect. Spiritual indoctrination is a point essential in these groups. A ritual marriage can take place between a child and his executioner, between two children or between the child and Satan. These rituals of "rebirth" and "marriage" have the consequence of binding the victim psychologically but also spiritually to the group and the powers of the evil. "Non-biological" twinning is also used as a means of control mental. For example, two young children will be initiated during a ceremony with a magical union of their souls, they then become inseparable twins for eternity. they will each share half of the same mental programming making them interdependent with each other. These ritual alliances follow one another alter personalities created by extreme trauma, alter who will remain faithful to the cult as long as there has not been a distance from the sect with a work of deprogramming.

b/ Symbolic of death and rebirth

As we saw in chapter 2, the "rituals of rebirth" with a passage through a death and a rebirth symbolic were something widespread in religions at Mysteries.

This practice of symbolic "resurrection" is also present in shamanic traditions. Here, Lloyd deMause takes up the description of a shamanic ritual comparing it to real childbirth: "When the drum roll accelerates (heartbeat and contractions)...

the whole structure cracks like a cosmic wave on my head (break amniotic waters)... and in a supreme effort, I must continue to move forward, my legs are blocked (passage in the birth canal)... my skull is a drum, my veins will burst and pierce my skin (anoxia)... I AM SUCKED AND

spread both downwards and upwards (birth)... Finally, it's like if I came back from afar, from an infinite depth where I was well huddled.

Then suddenly the surface, suddenly the air, suddenly that dazzling white! [241]]."

This type of initiatory resurrection comes up frequently in the testimonies of survivors of modern ritual abuse. This death and this rebirth can be symbolized by a real burial in a coffin or vault in a cemetery. Some survivors even report have been placed in the carcass of a dead animal and in some cases in a human corpse. Dr. Judianne Densen-Gerber, lawyer and psychiatrist American, specialist in child abuse, speaks of a satanic ritual in which a child is placed in the gaping cavity of a woman's belly at who have just done a caesarean section to remove their baby. This ritual has £crn1fⁱmfⁱnt *é*ié H£rrit nnr tVi 1 F'F'n Snrpnsnn 1"=> rps^anp Paul

ONLY IF THEY

Bonacci (we will return to their testimonies later). Senator John De Camp Reports the words of Densen-Gerber in his book "The Franklin

Cover-up": "I've been in this field since long enough and I had to realize what these three patients me

Said. It was something so horrible for me to imagine.

Take a two-year-old child and place it in a woman's open uterus Dying. To have this child covered in blood. I use denial myself after all these years... According to Sorenson, this happened in Nebraska, today she is dead. But the same thing, the same ceremony, was described by Bonacci, also in Nebraska! [242]."

The ex-Satanist Stella Katz describes the rebirth ceremony in which the

The child's personality is split: "It can be a cow, large goat or sheep carcass. It is told to children that they will not be able to enter the realm of darkness are born from blood and beast. This is similar, but in an inverted way to the Christian beliefs that only those who are born by water and by the Holy Spirit will be able to enter the Kingdom of God. The child is drugged and placed naked in a carcass. He or she is sewn into the body (...) The hand of the "deliverer" is inserted and the child is dragged through the incision that has been made on the animal. During this experience, the child accustomed to splitting when terrorized, will create a new split (editor's note: new alter/personality). The child's alter is then usually identified with a demon name by the one who delivers it! [243]]."

Fritz Springmeier also describes the same type of rituals also used as satanic baptism: "This ceremony can vary in some details, but here is the ritual performed for a child intended for control Monarch mental: the child is undressed and made to put on a dress purple. It is placed inside a pentagram where there is a doing nffirp1 H'antF'l Hpvant 1^r'imù the child F>st nrpspntp TTn rViPval or a jackal with the inscription "Nebebka" on the neck or on the forehead is then sacrificed in the name of Satan (the name given to him may vary according to the groups, this can be "Set" or "Saman" for example). The abdomen of the beast is fully open and the liver is removed. The four guardian spirits of the four cardinal points, the watchtowers, are then invoked.

The Monarch child is then smeared with the fat of the dead animal. A spirit guardian, "gatekeeper", is then called with a bell, then the child is placed in the belly of the animal. Part of the raw liver is given to the child and the rest is consumed by the group. The child ends up being baptized with the blood of the sacrificed animal! [244]]."

Reconstruction of birth trauma (see even intrauterine regression) is a common feature of ritual abuse satanic (perhaps this is a practice unconsciously related to the initial trauma of twin pregnancies where the fetus experiences feel his or her twins die by her side in the womb...). It would seem that the anguish of the initiate who aims to remain permanently in union with the mother, and thus to avoid the repetition of the trauma of birth is illustrated in the ancient Gnostic cults. These religions in Mysteries expressed their refusal of God the Father by a desire for a return to the Mother Goddess.

The rituals of birth, or rebirth, come from the ancient cults of the fertility related to the Mother Goddess. The Mother and the incestuous was elevated to a status of divine ritual in opposition to "God the Father". In the ancient Mysteries, the initiate received the promise of divine omnipotence, a cosmic union with the "whole", thanks to the symbolic union with "The Mother". In the Mysteries of Eleusis, there was an initiation called the "Dark Descent" in the mother. The hierophant was accompanied in this obscure initiation by a priestess who represented the Mother Goddess, the descent into his uterus. In the Phrygian Mysteries cult, the initiate descends in a pit and the blood of an animal is poured on him, as a result of this rebirth he receives the "nourishing milk". As we saw in chapter 2, the Phibionite sect aimed to gather the seed men and female menstruation in a kind of "sperm cult" where even human fetuses were consumed. All these rites revolve around fertility, mixing both fertility of "mother earth" and human fertility, often resulting in totally depraved and criminal practices.

For the psycho-historian Loyd deMause, the only way to give meaning to certain elements present in ritual abuses is to consider that they symbolically and even physically revive the trauma of the birth. We find the confinement in symbolic bellies (cages, boxes, coffins, but also real organic bellies), hanging the upside down that reproduces the sensation that the fetus experiences in the belly of its reproduced the experience of amniotic fluid while suffocation reproduces anoxia that all babies live during childbirth. The victim is forced to drink blood and urine, just as the fetus "drinks" placental blood and "bathes" in his urine. Rituals are often performed in tunnels or cellars, dark and damp underground places symbolizing the confinement of the vaginal canal or the womb of mother earth.

The sixteen elements characteristic of ritual abuses that researchers Jean Goodwin and David Finkelhor have listed are all related to the reconstruction of birth trauma. Without a symbolic "birth", all these acts would make no sense. Some researchers have asked themselves a question to about these systematic protocols in ritual abuse: "Why rape in such a complicated way?" Because this process represents the fetal drama that must be reproduced and relived, this in a way that is certainly unconscious.

Dans le livre “The Witches’ Way : Principles, Rituals and Beliefs of Modem Witchcraft” (la voie des witches: principles, rites and beliefs of modern witchcraft),

Janet and Stewart Fenar report the testimony of a victim who describes that naked and in a state of trance, she was tied up and transported to a cave by a group of women who are also completely naked. Once in the cave, the women made her pass under their legs gesticulating and screaming, as if it were a childbirth. Then a symbolic umbilical cord was cut off and the victim was sprayed with water. In his book entitled "Symbolic Wounds", Bruno Bettelheim also describes rites related to puberty during which young boys have to crawl under the legs of older men, in a symbolism of rebirth. In the book "Michelle Remembers", the survivor Michelle Smith remembers her ritual of "birth". A baby was first stabbed, then it was placed between Michelle's legs and her blood spread out on her, as if he possessed "power". Then we painted red symbols on her body and she had to put her head between a woman's legs and crawl as if this woman were giving birth to her. It also describes a another ritual where she was placed inside a plaster statue at the effigy of the devil and covered with blood. She says she felt like she was in a "tube of toothpaste" at the time she was expelled: "I am being born, I have something thick wrapped around my neck but a man cuts this rope so that I do not choke! [245!.]"

The Skull and Bones secret society practices a symbolic death ritual where the initiate is placed naked in a coffin, he must undergo various traumatic stages in order to rebirth and a transformation of his life. In this coffin, he must also confess his darkest sexual activities. For the Skull and Bones, during the night of the ritual the initiate "dies in the world to be reborn in the Order (...) While he is in the coffin for a symbolic journey through the underworld for his rebirth, which will take place in room n°322, the Order then puts on the "newborn" knight with special clothes, indicating that from now on he will have to adapt to the mission of the Order! [245]]." The oath taken by the initiate during this ritual of rebirth swears an allegiance to the secret Order that surpasses all that concerns the world layman. It's a total allegiance to the group...

that

Ritual type is something common in Satanism. In his book "The Satanic Rituals: Companion to the Satanic Bible", Anton Lavey, the founder of the Church of Satan, wrote: "The ceremony of rebirth takes place in a large coffin, in a similar way this symbolism of the coffin is found in most of the lodge rituals! [247]]."

The ex-illuminati "Svali", survivor of ritual abuse and mind control who has some way deserted the cult to deliver her testimony, claimed that one of the oldest of their rituals is the "resurrection ceremony". The Phoenix is one of the symbols they appreciate the most, death and rebirth to a new life is very present in the rituals of the Luciferian elite. We'il see in chapter 6 what does this ritual of "resurrection" (and MK programming), which goes so far as to cause a near-death experience (NDE) in the small victim.

c/ Blood sacrifice

"The hardest Satanist groups believe that the best way to raise energy is either through the sexual act or through sacrifice, that it's an animal or a human... A huge amount of energy is then liberated, especially with a human being. If you want to raise this ultimate power, you sacrifice someone. It is with a baby that there will be the greater amount of energy, then with a virgin." - Bill Schnoebelen

A sacrifice may be an object that serves as an offering to a god, entity, or deity for the purpose of establishing, restoring, or maintaining a good man's relationship with the sacred. It is also a question of getting help, material favors or spiritual power as powers psychic and magical. Cremation is a way to put directly the offering at the disposal of the gods. Blood rituals (sacrifices or bleeding) are based on the belief that the life force of humans or ranimai resiae aans son sang, born sacrmces follow a certain calendar religious that varies according to the cults, they can also be carried out punctually for an anniversary date for example. formerly the offering of a human life to a god (demon) was usually used as a ritual for terrestrial fertility and harvests, nowadays sacrifices serve as an advantage for obtaining personal powers and favors. the cannibalism is often combined with human sacrifice due to the belief that the ingestion of blood and human flesh can absorb the vital energy of the victim. Adults and children survivors of ritual abuse report that the purpose of such practices is to obtain certain powers Magic. Survivors explain that blood use and cannibalism are a way for the executioner(s) to take possession of the spiritual power of the victim. Wallis Budge wrote about the acts cannibals reported in the Egyptian Book of the Dead: "The notion that by eating flesh, or more particularly by drinking the blood of another living being, man absorbs the life of the victim in one's own life, is something that appears in primitive cultures in various forms! [248]]."

These testimonies of human sacrifices always raise a question of credibility in the eyes of the public. Where do the sacrificed victims come from and where are leftovers? Some testimonies report that the victims often come from within the sect itself, i.e.

they are babies born of rape to be sacrificed. But it can also be of homeless people, missing adults or children. There is a deafening silence from the media as well as a lack of official figures on the annual number of Disappearances... The explanation for the absence of remains perhaps also the cannibalism, access to morgues and crematoriums by the sect, the freezing of flesh, preservation of bones for practices

Magic... etc. In 2000, on a television set of France 3 (Rapes of Children, the End of Silence?), the former deputy prosecutor of Bobigny Martine Bouillon said that several mass graves of children had been discovered in the Paris region and that an investigation was in progress at the time...

The victim, adult or child, who was tortured and terrorized during the ritual before his killing, will have his blood loaded with endorphins

(endogenous morphine). These endorphins are secreted naturally by the body during intense stress or during intense physical activity, it is a natural opiate that acts as a painkiller. In the athletes, the release of endorphins allows to maintain efforts they often develop an addiction to this sensation that hormones provide, this is what is called the "runner's high" (the drunkenness of the runner). A victim of rape and torture, including the pain will have been pushed to its climax, will have a level of endorphins extremely high in his blood. This blood will be consumed as a drug by participants in the ritual, themselves already in a dissociative state. A form of addiction can therefore develop through blood consumption numain or animal loaded with endorphins.

The ex-Luciferian Svali reports that "The Celtic branch (of the "illuminati" sect) believes that power is transmitted at the time of the passage of life to death. They do initiation rituals with children or with older followers. The initiate is tied up and an animal is bled to death above him. The belief is that the person then receives the power of the mind which comes out of the body, this power "enters" into the initiate (...) These people believe that there are other spiritual dimensions, and that for y access, a great sacrifice must be made to "open a portal", usually by the sacrifice of several animals. I have also seen animal sacrifices performed for protection, blood is used for

"close the circle" so that some demonic entities cannot enter it." We still find this notion of baptism by blood, the animal bled above the initiate to cover it with hemoglobin, just as in the Mystery cult of Mithras.

for

the Satanist Aleister Crowley, the "best blood" is the menstrual blood of the woman, then the "fresh blood of a child" and finally that of the "enemies! [249]]" In his book "Magick in Theory and Practice," Crowley wrote: "Blood is life. This simple statement is explained by the Hindus for whom the blood is the main vehicle of vital 'Prana'... This is the theory of ancient Magicians, for whom every living being is a varying reserve of energy in quantity according to the size and health of the animal, and in quality according to its mental and its moral character. At the death of the animal, this energy is abruptly released. (For magical purposes) The animal must be killed before that in a circle, or a triangle as the case may be, so that the energy cannot

To get away. The nature of the selected animal must be consistent with that of the ceremony. For the highest spiritual work, it is therefore necessary to choose the purest victim and one that contains the most strength. A male child, of a pariah innocence and has a granae intelligence is ia victim ia more appropriate and most desirable. Some magicians who refuse the use of blood have tried to replace it with incense... But the blood sacrifice, although more dangerous, is the most effective, and in almost all cases, human sacrifice is the best! [250]!."

Fritz Springmeier explains that sex and blood sacrifices are used to interact with demons. Black masses with Blood sacrifices also involve orgies. Depravity and magic sexual are ways to interact with demons, this also allows to sexual are ways to interact with demons, this also allows to release the tension present during the deadly ceremony. Some entities Particularly powerful can only be invoked if there are Sacrifices. Demons do not come for free and the price to pay is the blood. Satan demands a sacrifice and the child is the greatest offering because the purer, add torture and sexual abuse and you get the ultimate offering. Just as with human sacrifice, where the purity of the child is sacrificed and vampirized, satanic sexual magic also requires this innocence and purity to be the most effective possible. The combination of the two is the ultimate defilement and therefore the ultimate offering. The executioner will terrorize the child to raise his maximum fear, his energy... Then he rapes him, and kills him at moment of orgasm in order to vampirize the totality of the vital energy. In the black mass is the sacrifice of blood (red magic) and then the element orgiastic (sexual magic) that will constitute the "Vibration" sought by satanists. Blood, when it spreads, attracts some demonic powers more or less hierarchically high, but also the teeming larvae that populate the astral bottom.

The serial-killer Ottis Tool said he had been involved in extreme satanic ceremonies, here is what he confided to Stéphane Bourgoin who interviewed him in prison for his documentary "Lyrics of Serial-Killers” :

- The initiate, who cut the throat of the person, "fuck" first the person, and the animals "fuck" him too. Then they "fuck" the animals and then kill them. They cooked the person and the animals and they were having a great feast.

- Was it when you were part of the satanic sect?
- Yes... They were doing that... There were a lot of them. We couldn't... it was difficult to recognize them, most often they had a mask or a hood covering their face. In some cases, we knew who was member, but... the main obligations cannot be waived, because this would be hell, worse than it already is... The words of pass and this...

Whether in luciferian/satanist cults, the goal is to prove that Satan or Lucifer are more powerful than God the Creator.

Some strictly Satanist groups use a system based on the inversion of the Christian tradition, both in ceremonies and in symbols. The cross will be turned over, marriage to God is replaced by the marriage to Satan. The baptism of water and the Holy Spirit is replaced by the baptism of animal or human blood. The Black Mass reverses the Catholic Mass in the sense that participants actually eat from the sacrificed pulpit (human or animal) and drink the blood of the victim, for example, Satanists practice a kind of communion with their Master, a reverse sanctification. As we will see now, there are also a "living sacrifice", which is also a diversion and a total inversion of the Christic teachings.

d/ Living sacrifice

Therapist Patricia Baird Clarke, in her book "Sanctification in Reverse: The Essence of Satanic Ritual Abuse" satanic ritual abuse) described how the "living sacrifice" of a child works among Satanists:

- Persons involved in occult activities have a certain degree of separation between the soul and the mind allowing them to see, hear and feel the entities living on another plane. These people are all, without exception, deceived and in mental confusion. Many think, between other, that they can communicate with the dead, although the Bible states clearly this is impossible. Demonic spirits can appear or take any form, including the human form and thus deceive humans by making them believe that they can give glory, fortune, and even blessing and eternal life.

Spiritual power can only come from two sources: Jesus Christ or Satan. God gives the power to overcome all sin and all temptation by giving His Holy Ghost to those who believe in sacrifice

Atonement of His Son Jesus Christ. Those involved in the darkness of occultism are fed by demons. In the satanic baked world, demons are powers. If someone were to say that he had the power of extrasensory perception, he could also say that it has the demon of extrasensory perception. Human beings have no supernatural powers, these powers come from spiritual entities. The more one has demons, the more powers one has available to realize one's own selfish interests. The great powers (the demons) must go through the despicable practice of satanic ritual abuse.

In satanic ritual abuse, an infant or child will be "elected" and chosen as a "special" individual through which followers will be able to receive energy. To receive energy, there must always be have a sacrifice; it is a principle of the Kingdom. Jesus Christ was the perfect sacrifice that gave itself once and for all, and by believing in Him, the Christians receive the power to overcome evil and live a life Victorious Christian. However, this power is only available to Christians if they are willing to live according to God's instructions, including Romans 12:1 where we are told: "to offer your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy, pleasing to God, which will be on your part a cult reasonable.". Most people who know a little about Satanic worship have heard of baby murders as a sacrifice for Satan. however few people have heard of the notion of living sacrifice required by Satan.

God commands Christians to become a living sacrifice for Him. A Satan worshipper would only be willing to be a living sacrifice for no one, for the very essence of Satanism is based on selfishness and greed; but in order to gain access to power and power, there must be have a living sacrifice. Therefore, a helpless baby or a child will be chosen to be the living sacrifice to Satan. The child is then subject to many painful and terrifying rituals in which demons are called upon to possess denial, thus aiisant ae him or had a "tank" or a "battery" used to store satanic powers that can be used at will by members of the cult. The most common way by which these powers are accessible is by sexual perversion on the child. The child will of course grow and mature to become an adult, but in because of the seriousness of the abuse and psychological programming, it does not will never realize that he possesses these powers. He will suffer throughout his life as much of the harassment of the demons as of its mental programming and the executioners themselves. This person has become a living sacrifice to Satan and his life is hell.

This is a diversion and odious perversion of a glorious scriptural truth given by God to bring his people into a relationship close and loving with Him and thus fill their lives with blessings!

It is now becoming clear that these consequences of abuse Satanic rituals require spiritual ministry. The best techniques or Psychological expertise known to man will never be able to deliver a no one in a turmoil caused by demonic spirits. Only the Christians empowered by the Holy Spirit have discernment and power to deliver people tortured by demons. Our power over these entities is directly proportional to the extent to which we have been prepared to die to ourselves to allow Christ to fill us with Himself. if we are willing to be a living sacrifice to God, we have the love and power to deliver those who, against their will, have been sacrifices alive for Satan! 25.

When Patricia Baird Clarke writes "The most common way in which these powers are accessed is through sexual perversion on the child", this is a real sexual magic.

e/ Children of rabies

"... the sudden emergence, in a docile and kind child, of a personality who delusions, who screams, who laughs out loud, who utters appalling blasphemy and that seems to be invaded by a foreign being." " Witchcraft in England " - Barbara Rosen

"We therapists identify much more with the pain and suffering of our patients, more than with the other side of the division, i.e. rage, revenge, perpetration... These feelings, as all the others are difficult, but they need to be treated in une thérapie." - "Multiple Personality and Dissociation : Understanding Incest, Abuse, and MPD" - David Calof

Because of the extreme violence they involve, ritual abuse causes the child enormous inner tension. This rage internalized is exploited by the group to indoctrinate the child in a a system where violence and fury are valued and even encouraged.

The child who has been repeatedly raped and tortured in a group is not allowed to express anger, this violence (or negative charge) which he has to evacuate can only be done by torture of other children and sometimes even murder. These hyper-violent behaviors are therefore encouraged and rewarded by adults who use this to make people feel to the child that he is already as violent as them and that it is proof that he becomes truly a member of the group, and as a result, equally guilty than the others...

"Very violent behaviour originates in the first two years of life; the same is true of the feeling of

It is a precious thing because it is the only means of preventing violent acts from happening.

Repeat. When this feeling is not constituted at this early period, it is difficult to acquire it afterwards; behind violent gestures of "primitive" appearance, summary, are held complex processes whose Main characteristics are the indistinguishable between oneself and others, the disorders of the body pattern and muscle tone, the inability to do semblant, and neurological dysfunctions due to very inadequate mothering care." Maurice Berger, "Caring for violent children" (2012)

For groups practicing ritual abuse and mind control, the child's mind must be broken as soon as the most young age. For this the extremely traumatic experiences will be multiply, the goal is to corrupt innocence and create states dissociative. Children who normally have empathy and joie de vivre natural, become "soldiers" or "priests" capable of hurting and even to kill without feeling any empathy. The only way to achieve such behavior is through the unbundling process. Fracking of the child in several dissociated personalities is a phenomenon of protection against severe trauma. It is the deep dissociative disorders that allow to torture and kill in a robotic way without there really being awareness of the seriousness of the acts. For these groups hyper-violent, compassion is not acceptable and must be neutralized from the first years of the child's life; who very quickly under the weight of traumas will develop multiple dehumanized personalities.

Child victims of physical, psychological and sexual abuse develop an internal negative burden proportional to the suffering and repetition of trauma. This negative charge is a latent traumatic memory, but it is still present in the child who will have to survive the psychotrauma consequences of the violence.

To be able to manage the awakening of this traumatic memory, the child will have use of dissociating conduct to create anesthetic disjunction this intolerable tension, this negative emotional charge. this disjunction will occur during dissociating conducts in two ways:

either by extreme stress that will cause a sudden production of hormones, or by using drugs. In a young child, these behaviors dissociating behaviours can result in self-destructive behaviours such as self-harm, scarification, hitting, biting, burn; but still endangerments with risky games or violent conduct against others, the other then serving as a fuse during a balance of power to be disjunct and anesthetize. Destructive sects encourage this chain of violence by pushing the child (already traumatized) to become himself a executioner and to understand very quickly that this dissociating conduct that is violence against others relieves him and anesthetizes his own traumatic memory: it is a vicious circle. (We will return in more detail to these notions of dissociation and traumatic memory in the next chapter).

Jean Cartry, author and special educator, wrote about Maurice Berger's book "Do we want barbarian children?":

"For about ten years, we welcomed four brothers, both seniors who have lived for one year with their mother an alternation of relationships eroticized or very violent. On the other hand, the two youngest benefited early judicial protection, especially the last one we welcomed at the age of five months. The judge did not tremble and withdrew it at the maternity itself. The first two boys, thirty and nineteen months old, were the the most violent and dangerous little children we have ever known. On the other hand, their younger brothers were never violent."

In 1990, a documentary entitled "Child of rage" was broadcast by HBO in its series "America Undercover".

This disturbing documentary reveals how a six-year-old girl, Beth Thomas, tortured animals and sexually raped his little brother

Jonathan. This is a compilation of video recordings that Dr. Ken Magid, a clinical psychologist specializing in the treatment of children severely abused, performed during therapy sessions with little Beth. These children were so traumatized in their first months or first months years of life that they develop no connection with other children or adults. These are children who cannot love or accept ae receiving love. They don't even know they can hurt or even kill (without remorse).

Beth's mother died when she was one year old, so she and her little brother Jonathan were left at the mercy of their father, a pedophile sadistic. The children were severely neglected and Beth was sexually abused up to the age of 19 months, when social services took them away from the father and placed them for adoption. In 1984, the two children were given to a couple, Tim and Julie, who received no information as for the traumatic past of the little ones. At the time of adoption, Jonathan was seven months old, he did not hold his head and could not ride on the side. He had greatly lacked stimulation but also food. at after a few months, Tim and Julie began to observe the behaviors strange children and to learn certain things about their past.

They then thought that Beth had probably been sexually abused and he did not it did not take long for her to show the signs. She was doing a recurring nightmare in which "a man was lying on top of her hurting her."

The rapes committed by her biological father led Beth to behave violently and sexually, especially with her little brother Jonathan. She also had tendencies to masturbate in a way that repetitive, to the point of having an infection and having to be Hospitalized. Julie caught her one day sexually assaulting her Jonathan, he was crying and his pants were down. When Julie asked him what had happened, she replied that she had pinched his penis and put a finger in his buttocks, which he had begged her to stop but that she had continued. Sometimes Beth would plant needles in his brother and in pets. When it was a little more aged, she even smashed Jonathan's head on the cement floor of the garage, parents adoptives had to lock him up in his room. Beth's intention was not not just to hurt her brother, but she wanted to kill him... On the video recordings, she expresses in a very calm and above all very very way cold his desire to kill his brother, but also his parents. The most important aspect worrying about Beth's behavior was her total lack of remorse and embarrassment about his destructive behaviors. She had good aware that his actions were bad and dangerous, but this had no importance to her.

Beth was diagnosed with an "attachment disorder", characterized by emotional disorders, behavioural and social. This may take the form of an inability to establish appropriate social interactions. The child may show a excessive detachment or on the contrary excessive familiarity with strangers. Beth's case involved a total inability to develop empathy and an inability to form normal emotional bonds with a human. Beth's behavior was so extreme that in April 1989 she was removed from the home of the adoptive parents to be placed in intensive therapy with therapist Connell Watkins. Despite the very dangerous behavior of Beth, this therapist was convinced that she could help him like her had done so with other children, sometimes murderers who had not yet Ten years... Little by little, during the course of therapy, Beth Thomas began to develop empathy, as well as remorse. She learned what the good and evil. Sometimes she would cry openly when she got recalled his violent behaviour towards his little brother. It was necessary to several years to rebalance Beth, but like all child victims serious abuse, the brands will remain for life. As an adult, Beth graduated with a degree in nursing. She wrote a book called "More Than a Thread of Hope".

Another famous case of a hyper-violent child, and even a murderer, is that of the British Mary Flora Bell. At the age of eleven, she was tried guilty of the murder of two boys aged three and four. In her early childhood, Mary was severely sexually and physically abused. His mother, who was a sado-masochistic prostitute, used her daughter during the sessions with her customers, the little one was therefore suffering atrocities. Growing up, Mary a developed a significant rage that manifested itself in torture on animals and by attempts to strangangle other children. For her, it it was simply "massages", she had not not aware of the mortal danger of such practices. It is likely that it will had learned about strangulation during HM sessions with his mother. Just like

Beth Thomas, Mary has not developed any emotional bond with her parents, she has not not known his father and father-in-law was an alcoholic criminal, so chaos reigned constantly in the house.

In May 1968, Mary strangled four-year-old Martin Brown. A few months later, in the company of her friend Norma, she strangled another boy, three-year-old Brian Howe. Mary signed her initial "M" with a razor blade on the abdomen of the little victim, the girls also allegedly sexually mutilated the body with scissors. Mary was convicted of manslaughter for a reduced liability but was sentenced to life imprisonment even though she was still a child at the time of the events: she will spend twelve years in prison. While incarcerated, Mary received behavioural therapy thanks to which she developed a sense of good and evil. It showed signs of remorse for the violence and murders she had committed.

Dr. Robert Orton, the first to interview Mary Bell during her incarceration, said of her that she was showing symptoms classics of a psychopathic personality due to its total lack of feelings towards others. "She did not show the slightest remorse, tear or anxiety. She was completely impassive and without resentment for his actions or detention." the psychiatrist also stated that he had seen many psychopathic children, but that he had never before encountered a case like Mary, also intelligent, as manipulative and as dangerous. Another psychiatrist, the Dr. Westbury, said: "The manipulation of people is its main objective." A biography based on interviews with Mary Bell was written in 1998 by Gitta Sereny under the title "Cries Unheard: Why Children Kill, The Story of Mary Bell." (The crying not heard, why the child kills, the story of Mary Bell)

In 1998 the book "The Magic Castle" was published, it is the story of a mother who adopted the young Alex, a multiple and hyper-violent child. In 1984, at the age of 10, Alex was came to live with Carole and Sam Smith. He then had a file in his luggage containing a lot of information about its past. Alex had lived with his mother and stepfather until the age of 5 when he was placed in the custody of his biological father due to the fact that his mother was an alcoholic. Then following of serious abuse and neglect, Alex was placed in a home until the age

Years. He then spent 3 years in a host family before arriving at Carole Smith When Carole went to get him for the first time, she saw young Alex sitting on the lawn with two large garbage bags containing his belongings next to him. She later said: "I kept it for two weeks and it was the two longest weeks of my life!"

Trouble started for Carole and Sam as soon as Alex arrived at their house. He was constantly angry and closed in on himself. In addition, it had reactions from a 2-year-old child. His behavior was out of control and he broke things several times. Carole even feared to release it in public, "The races became missiles and the supermarket shopping cart a destructive tank," she said. It did not take long for Carole to realize the serious psychological repercussions of the abuses he had suffered and that they as a result, they would need a lot of help and support.

The social worker in charge of her file did not provide much help, So Carole and Sam finally turned to psychiatrists and government social workers for help.

As Alex grew up, his problems grew, but Carole perseved in her care of the boy, who was now became a member of his family. The problems caused by Alex intensifying, Carole felt that these behavioral disorders could have something even deeper. A therapist then thought that maybe he could do it having several personalities at home, Alex was then 14 years old. At that time he saw a therapist who used hypnosis as a form of treatment. to the Carole's surprise, Alex could be hypnotized, that's when the other personalities began to reveal themselves. The next three years were a constant upheaval for Carole and Sam. They never knew what personality would emerge and they learned more and more about the horrors that Alex had suffered in his early childhood. Thanks to the therapy, Alex has learned how to build a "Magic Castle" for help them manage their personality splitting. That's a total of eight personalities that have been discovered, personalities that have been created in childhood to help him cope with the immense stress of repetitive abuse.

In the book's conclusion, Carole quotes a statement by Alex: "Being multiple is a means of survival and not a sign of insanity." When writing this book, in 1998, Alex was still living with Carole and Sam, working alongside her adoptive father[252!].

Take a 7-year-old child raised in ritual abuse who is given during an initiation the dagger of the high priest to sacrifice a baby... imagine what will become of this child at the age of thirty if he has not left

f/ Snuff-films

Georges Glatz is a Swiss politician, he is the founder of the CIDE: International Committee for the Dignity of the Child. This Lausanne-based NGO produced an explosive report in 2012 showing the extent of the phenomenon of network paedocriminality. This report seeks to explain why a leaden screed covers all these cases. In 2000, on the television set of France 3, George Glatz declared in front of Élise Lucet that films showing the real death of children had been found in Belgium:

- Georges Glatz: Snuff-movies cassettes sell for between ten and twenty thousand Swiss francs...

- Élise Lucet: What do you mean by ''snuff- movies'' ?...

- Georges Glatz: Cassettes with real deaths of children.

- Élise Lucet : .... ?!?!! ...

- Georges Glatz: Yes, these cassettes exist, we discovered them a few years ago in Belgium, but we actually talk about them quite little in the media."

''Viols d'enfants : La fin du silence'', France 3 - 2000.

A rather shocking statement that left the journalist Élise Lucet speechless...

In 2008, Father François Brune, in a video interview[253] devoted to his book "God and Satan, the fight continues", said:

- It is the story of a young boy who was dragged in spite of himself by a friend into satanic circles. but really satanic, that is to say that no one knows, not even journalists or specialized investigators (.) but who can reach people with official positions in the administration of very high level (...) When I speak of Satanism myself as a priest, I am not very credible; but on the other hand you have specialized investigators, particularly on pornography and child pornography, who will reveal to you that there are indeed people who film children who are being tortured. and that it sells for gold.

- This is called snuff-movies..

- There you go.

- So for you, behind that is Satan?

- Of course! It exists. When it is said by psychologists, police people or intelligence, we take them seriously, but it is the same thing, it is the same phenomenon.

- It is the destruction of God's Creation.

- Of course. and in its purest and most fragile. as soon as Satan can dirty him...

A snuff-movie or snuff-film (To Snuff meaning murder in English slang), is an authentic video of torture and murder of children or adults, there is no rigging, it is the direct capture on film of criminal acts. These productions are sold on the black market several thousand euros and therefore reach a rather high audience in the social scale.

Many testimonies of survivors of ritual abuse report the presence of cameras during abuse and sacrifice, this is a fairly common feature. The goal is to immortalize sadistic and criminal acts but also to have evidence so that all participants (when they do not have their faces masked) are held by secrecy. But these recordings make it possible above all to bring in a maximum of money, whether through blackmail or through trade in specialized networks.

Officially, snuff-films are just an "urban legend", a kind of "old fantasy". In 1978, Roman Polanski stated in the documentary "Confessions of a Blue Movie Star":

"All the sexual taboos have been shown on the screen and we can ask ourselves what the next step will be? It could be the murder of someone without rigging..."

The production of "snuff" is, however, an appalling reality. Such trafficking was dismantled in Britain, where Dimitri Vladimirovich Kuznetsov, a 30-year-old Russian, had settled. This monster was arrested by the British police in 2000, he was producing videos for a list of Italian, English, American and German customers. During the investigation, more than 600 homes were searched and 1500 people were subjected to police investigation, including businessmen and civil servants. The Italian police seized about 3000 videos produced by Kuznetsov. Investigators told reporters at the time that the audio-visual material included footage of children dying as a result of torture and rape. The Naples public prosecutor's office then considered charges against the clients for complicity in murder, some of whom specifically demanded recordings with the killing of children. A senior customs officer said, "We've seen very, very violent things, sadistic abuse involving very young children, but the actual deaths take us to a whole new level."

The Naples newspaper ''Il Mattino'' published the transcript of an exchange between an Italian customer and the Russian supplier, it is a recording of MI5:

- Promise me that you will not scam me, tell me the truth, ask the Italian.

- Relax, I can assure you that this one really dies, answers the Russian.

- The last time I paid, I didn't get what I wanted.

- What do you want?

- See them die...

- That is why I am here.

The price of a single video varied from 340 to 6,000 Euro, the price was set according to the type of content. Films with young naked children were called ''snipe video''. The most appalling category in which children are raped and tortured to death was codenamed ''necros pedo[254]''.

In 1997, the "Draguignan Trial" was opened. For the first time in France, the law against sex tourism could be applied and the investigations made it possible to uncover a vast network of paedophiles organized both in France and abroad. During this trial there was the broadcasting of the snuff-films that had been seized by the police. The screening will be stopped after 20 minutes and the prosecutor Etienne Ceccaldi then declared in front of the cameras of Canal +: "The vision of children tortured to death, and all this for commercial purposes, is truly unbearable."

Also in 1997, the English channel ITV broadcast a documentary entitled "The Boy Business" about the production of child pornography in Amsterdam. Film productions in which children are raped, tortured and killed. In this English documentary, three British women who lived in Amsterdam in the early 90s testify independently of one another. They describe these snuff shoots that they attended as children or teenagers.

In the documentary ""Dutsh Injustice: When Child traffickers rule a nation." (Dutch injustice: when child traffickers run the nation), which deals with the Rolodex case, a victim of the Dutch network testifies: "I also met individuals who were making snuff-movies. The snuff-movies are videos where several children, or only one, are sexually abused and then murdered at the end of the film. I was asked to participate in one of these films in exchange for a lot of money but I refused because I knew, from what other boys had told me, that it was very dangerous because we did not survive it. "

The 2012 CIDE report mentioned above, confirms the existence of the snuff-films through Michel Thirion, a private detective who was in charge of investigating the disappearance of Julie Lejeune and Mélissa Russo in the Dutroux case. His investigations led him to a snuff channel in the Netherlands (the same network mentioned by the witnesses of the documentary "The Boy Business"). He told Jean Nicolas and Frédéric Lavachery about his meeting with an Englishman who owned a barge in Amsterdam: "The Englishman then offers me the best he has: the killing of children. It is a question of embarking several on his barge, of going to sea and of being sexually satisfied with a kid before the latter is thrown into the water, explains the Englishman[255]to me.

In Belgium too, the production of snuff-films seems to have gone beyond the simple "fantasy"... In 1997, a case of paedophilia and child pornography broke out in parallel with the Dutroux case. On January 22, 1997, the Nouvelle Gazette de Charleroi published an article that mentioned the existence of this type of film: "It is at Michel's (and at home alone, the investigators would like to emphasize) that the gendarmes will make the horrible discovery. They have indeed seized a dozen snuff movies, video cassettes that stage absolute horror. The children you can see there (little Europeans, the youngest of whom appear to be between 7 and 8 years old and the oldest between 16 and 17 years old) are not only raped by unknown adults. They are also tortured by sa.diqu.es: modestly, the investigators evoke sado-maso hard scenes. And, the height of the filth, these infernal scenes *are a.chèvent by the killing (real or simulated) of the small victims. It is not known whether these children really died, investigators admit. It would take to be sure to find their corpses. But if they are stagings, they are of absolute realism. According to the investigators, it was suspected that such horrors were circulating, even in our own homes. However, we have never seized snuff-movies in our country. I had seen a cassette of this kind, seized in France, says an investigator. It showed a pedophile strangling a child. But what I have seen here exceeds anything one can imagine*l256].."

In the document containing the minutes and hearings recorded in the Dutroux case, it states that in 1997, a letter relating to paedophilia was intercepted at the Ixelles post office referring to tapes with killing and/or rape. It talks about a "Baroness and Dutroux". (PV 150.123/97)

In 2004, the Belgian deputy Albert Mahieu wrote a letter to the President of the Assize Court of Arlon, Stéphane Goux, in which he mentions the existence of a videotape of the murder of Julie Lejeune and Mélissa Russo. These are the two little victims found dead in marc Dutroux's cellar. Officially, they died of starvation locked in marc Dutroux's cellar while he was in prison. Deputy Mahieu began his letter by saying that they had not died of hunger but of rape, abuse and torture. He indicates according to his sources that "the recording, in color and sound, attests to the ordeal endured by Julie and Melissa before being put to death, in atrocious circumstances, by a masked executioner who officiates in the presence of a group of ten to twelve people." According to the MP (now deceased), there are several copies of this video recording.

Also in the Dutroux case, witness X1 (Régina Louf) described a world of sexual violence, torture but also murder. Her testimony showed that she knew some details of unsolved murders, which was impossible without access to police files. Régina Louf quoted the Belgian company ASCO in her testimony. She names this place: "the video recording factory", and she gives the names of those who participated in the torture and murder of children on the site of the factory, all recorded on video cassettes[257].

In the book "The child sacrificed to Satan", which recounts the ordeal experienced by Samir Aouchiche, Bruno Fouchereau notes that INTERPOL has repeatedly issued alerts at European level regarding satanic crimes, here is what he writes in his book: "Scotland Yard held a conference recently, in January 1996 in Lyon, at interpol premises, aimed at alerting European police to the multiplication of ritual crimes. Judge Sengelin, the senior investigating judge in Mulhouse investigating the abduction of a little girl in 1990, was informed by the same Scotland Yard police officers that they had seized a batch of snuff movies in which children were murdered. These children, at least fifteen of whom are of European origin, were killed in front of the camera after being raped and tortured. "

g/ Some figures

In 1984, the first meeting of the *Isstd (International Society for Study of Trauma and Dissociation)was held inChicago. Following this meeting, Naomi Mattis (who later becameco-chair of the Utah Legislative Satanic Ritual Abuse Committee), told the Deseret News: "Ofthe 420 therapists present, about 75% raised their hands when asked if they had ever had to deal with victims of ritual abuse."

Psychiatrist Roland Summit, who specializes in child sexual abuse, said of ritual abuse that it is the most serious threat to the child and to the society we face. Dr. Summit points out that he has had to deal with less than 1000 children who have shown involvement in ritual abuse[258\.

While obtaining true figures for the prevalence of ritual trauma is a difficult task given the secrecy and criminality surrounding the phenomenon, there is nevertheless growing evidence that the problem of ritual trauma is considerably more widespread than ever before. Dr. Kathleen Coulborn Faller of the University of Michigan conducted empirical analysis and research on ritual abuse. She notes that there is a great similarity in the reports of abuse made by individual children or adults, and that studies independently demonstrate confirmation of such allegations. Of the 2709 members of the American Psychological Association (APA) who responded to a survey, 30% responded that they had dealt with cases of ritual or religion-related abuse. In this group, 93% responded that they thought ritual-related damage had indeed taken place. In a 1995 article entitled "Cultural and Economic Barriers to Protecting Children from Ritual Abuse and Mind Control," Dr. Catherine Gould states that in 1992 alone, Childhelp USA recorded 1741 calls related to ritual abuse, Monarch Resources in Los Angeles recorded approximately 5000, Real Active Survivors recorded almost 3600, Justus Unlimited in Colorado received nearly 7000, and Looking Up in Maine handled approximately 6000. This indicates a very alarming number of requests by telephone support.

One of the first studies on the existence of ritual abuse was conducted by Deborah Cole in 1992. The survey was entitled "The Incidence of Ritual Abuse: A Preliminary Survey". Out of 250 therapists, 46% indicated that they had already had patients who had reported ritual abuse or who met at least one of the criteria on cole's list[259].

In 1995, a study on ritual abuse was done by British psychologists (Andrews, Morton, Bekerian, Brewin, Davies, Mollon). These researchers collected data from 810 members of the British Psychological Society who had dealt with cases of sexual abuse. 50% of therapists said they had worked with patients who reported experiencing satanic ritual abuse. 80% of therapists who had one or more patients with a history of ritual abuse believed in his statements. In a more recent UK study from 2013, Ost, Wright, Easton, Hope and French, collected data from an online study involving 183 clinical psychologists and 119 hypnotherapists. Among psychologists, 38% of them had already dealt with one or more cases of ritual abuse. The study showed that 25% of hypnotherapists had already had one or more cases of ritual abuse[260].

In Australia, Schmuttermaier and Veno published a study in the Journal of Child Sexual Abuse in 1999 entitled "Counselor's belief about ritual abuse: An Australian study". The study involved workers from 74 Center Against Sexual Assault (CASA), 48 psychologists and 27 psychiatrists from victorian were interviewed. 70% of therapists validated the definition of ritual abuse and 26 of them reported 153 cases of ritual abuse identified between 1985 and 1995. Schmuttermaier and Veno conclude their study by saying that the identification and diagnosis of ritual abuse by professionals is always similar, whether in Australia, the USA or the United Kingdom[261].

In South Africa, studies on child abuse, including ritual abuse, have been conducted on adolescents and young adults. The study conducted by Madu S.N. and Peltze K. Was published in 1998 in the Southern African Journal of Child and Adolescent Mental Health. 414 high school students were asked about the abuses they had experienced before the age of 17, 8% of them reported experiences of ritual abuse. In another study of 559 students from three high schools in Mpumalanga province, Madu noted that 10% had reported ritual abuse before the age of 17. Out of 722 university students, 6% reported this type of abuse before the age of 17[262].

In the article "Ritual Abuse: A review of research" (1994), Kathleen Faller cites a study by Susan Kelley on transgenerational ritual abuse. This study entitled "Ritualistic Abuse: Recognition, Impact, and Current Controversy" was presented by Kelley in 1992 at a conference in San Diego on the theme of child abuse. Kelley investigated the testimonies of 26 children from 14 families. The perpetrators were parents, grandparents, great-grandparents, uncles, aunts, cousins and siblings. Similar to other reports, a significant number of abusers were women (45%) and 61% of children were abused by the previous two generations. Reported abuses included threats and acts of terror (89%), death threats (77%), production of childpornography (81%), threats with magic (89%), satanic references (92%), animals killed (54%), drug ingestions (92%), songs and songs (69%), ingestions or contact with excrement (85%[263]).

An international study on ritual abuse and mind control was conducted by German and American researchers: Carol Rutz, Thorsten Becker, Bettina Overcamp and Wanda Karriker. This study, launched in 2007, available in English and German, is entitled "Extreme Abuse Survey" (EAS). All the questionnaires and results of this study are available on the extreme-abuse-survey.net website. It includes a professional-only part, the ''Professional Extreme Abuse Survey'' (P-EAS), which is a questionnaire comprising 215 questions. 451 professionals from 20 different countries responded to this study which shows that 86% of professionals who worked with at least one survivor of extreme trauma report having had at least one case of satanic ritual abuse:

- 61% of them had patients reporting ritual abuse in the clergy.
- 85% reported that the majority of adult survivors of Ritual Abuse (RA)/Mind Control (CM) had a diagnosis of Dissociative Identity Disorder.
- 65% reported that their patients testifying to AR/CM relied on continuous, unbundled memories.
- 89% reported that AR/CM memories had a logical articulation with other aspects of the patient's life, which formed a rather coherent whole.
- 86% reported that the dissociated personalities observed reported AR/CM

- 79% reported that the content of their patients' drawings, paintings and poems had content related to RAs/MCs.
- 75% report that some medical and physical sequelae of their patients can be explained by AR/CM.
- 47% report that some of their patients' memories have been confirmed and validated by others.

The study also includes a section dedicated to survivors, here are some results on a sample of 1000 people who responded to the questionnaire:

- 79% report gang rapes.
- 53% report cage confinement.
- 44% report cannibalism.
- 52% report zoophilia.
- 45% report being buried alive.
- 50% report having received electroshocks.
- 52% report having participated in child pornography.
- 46% report child prostitution.
- 65% report having been diagnosed with Dissociative Identity Disorder.
- 63% report that the executioner(s) deliberately created dissociative states (alter personality) to perform programming on them.
- 41% report having been programmed as a sex slave.
- 18% report having been programmed to be a murderer.
- 21% report having been programmed to develop psychic powers.
- 57% report having been programmed to self-destruction when they begin to remember abuse and programming.
- 34% report that one or more of their alter personalities have an access code.
- 28% report having an alter robot personality.

- 53% report that the executioners made them believe that entities, spirits or demons have taken control of their bodies.
- 15% report time travel experiences.
- 26% report having been a victim of government experiments on mind control.

Traumatic ritual abuse has been or is still practiced in many cultures, with victims testifying to altered states of consciousness such as dissociation, amnesia and alteration of their personality. It has been found that this list of symptoms specific to psychological trauma is found almost systematically in individuals who report testimonies of ritual abuse. In the West, these testimonies come from people who claim to be "survivors", many of them have the typical symptoms related to severe dissociation, and many of their memories are recovered during therapy. However, it should be noted that these memories of ritual abuse also return in the form of flashbacks outside of therapies, an important point to emphasize because therapists are sometimes accused of inducing 'false memories' in their patients (see chapter 10). Given that there are historical accounts of ritual abuse dating back centuries and that children from the age of two and adults around the age of ninety continue to make accounts of traumatic abuse throughout the world during rituals, it is time to sound the alarm about the little that has been done to increase awareness of the problem by professionals and institutions! Although completely unable to stop or eradicate the problem, we must overcome denial and begin to understand the dynamics of these abuses so that our investigative paradigms can change accordingly.

In a predominantly Christian society, satanic symbols can convey a powerful archetypal message to victims, especially if used in conjunction with torture and severe trauma. It is therefore not necessary for those responsible to have any system of spiritual belief behind their practices or activities. In other words, regardless of motivation, religious belief, sexual drive, power or mind control, these groups systematically use a ritualized framework to mistreat, exploit and manipulate children or adults. Their structures operate to provide a constant supply of children and to protect network members from possible legal proceedings[264].

3 - Some testimonials

a/ Introduction

The testimonies of ritual abuse all describe the same thing: rapes in meetings, tortures, occult rituals, drugs, hypnosis, states of trance and dissociation, sacrifices (real or simulated), video recordings, etc. and we find these testimonies on all continents.

Many of the testimonies are English-speaking, including: Cathy O'Brien, Mark Philips, ''Svali'', Jeannie Riseman, Kathleen Sullivan, Kim Campbell, Brice Taylor, Jay Parker, Fritz Springmeier, Cisco Wheeler, Ted Gunderson, Paul Bonacci, John DeCamp, David Shurter, Dejoly Labrier, Anne A. Johnson Davis, Vicki Polin, Linda Wiegand, Jenny Hill, Lynn Moss Sharman, Kristin Constance, Kim Noble , Lynn Schirmer, Bill Schnoebelen, Neil Brick, Carol Rutz, Caryn Stardancer, Kathleen Sorenson, Patricia Baird Clarke, Ruth Zandstra, Glenn Hobbs, etc... Most of these testimonies of ritual abuse also involve trauma-based mind control, with the two things being completely intertwined. But we will see in more detail the aspect "MK programming" in chapter 7.

The content of these testimonies is particularly atrocious and shocking. The rest of this chapter may sometimes contain morbid repetitions as some testimonies may resemble each other. I apologise for these burdens, but this is a matter of exposing the words of child victims and adult survivors. A word that must be heard and taken into account despite its obviously very disturbing aspect. It is also about showing how similar satanic ritual abuse practices are from one country to another and from one continent to another.

b/ United States

In 1989, Lieutenant Larry Jones of the Boise Police and director of the Cult Crime Impact Network (CCIN) stated that those who discredited testimonies about ritual abuse were "garbage! We found babies ritually sacrificed in Connecticut, Bend, Oregon and Los Angeles... When you add to this the credible testimonies of survivors that can be verified in a circumstantial way, there are no more questions to ask! 265! ."

In the documentary "Devil Worship: The Rise of Satanism", Kurt Jackson of the Beaumont police said: "Are human beings beings sacrificed? Yes! They are! There are many things I observe to determine whether this is a ritual crime. It can be something like a pentagram, it can be an inverted cross, the number 666, the body emptied of its blood, some parts of the body removed in a certain way, etc."

In the same documentary, Sergeant Randy Emon states: "One problem we face is that senior officials in public agencies do not want to acknowledge that this is a reality. We must lift this veil of misunderstanding and say to them: Hey! These are crimes that we must deal with!"

- Ted Gunderson

Ted Gunderson headed the FBI office in Memphis (1973) and the Dallas office (1975) and was appointed head of the Los Angeles FBI in 1977. He is one of the few senior (if not the only) American officials to have denounced the paedocriminality of a network that clandestinely controls the judicial system. He took a close interest in the Mc Martin School case and the Franklin case.

In 1988, Ted Gunderson participated in a television show hosted by Geraldo Rivera entitled "Devil Worship: Exposing Satan's Underground". The debate focused on the scale of the crimes satanic in the United States, here is an excerpt:

- Ted Gunderson, retired FBI agent, former los Angeles division chief. Is there really a network responsible for all these satanic murders in your opinion?

- What I can say, based on information provided to me by confidential sources, informants, I have also interviewed dozens of survivors of satanic cults in recent years: I say that there is a network of individuals who are very active in the country.

- Do you think that these terrible accusations about sacrificed babies are true?

- I am sure there is no doubt about that. This is according to the information I have gathered all over the country, thanks to several survivors and many informants.

In 1987, Ted Gunderson gave a lecture entitled "Satanism and international trafficking of children by the CIA". During this conference, he returned in detail to the case of the Mc Martin Kindergarten, located in Manhattan Beach in the suburbs of Los Angeles, a case that made a lot of noise at the time. Indeed, some children claimed to have been forced to participate in the sacrifice of animals, but also of babies and other children. They said they were forced to drink blood and subjected to necrophilic, zoophile and scatological practices. Here are some excerpts from this conference:

"Let's talk a little bit about the Mc Martin case. In April 1985, the authorities investigated the case and searched for tunnels under the school. The children said they had been taken to tunnels under the school, including a room in the basement. There they were sexually assaulted, they described ceremonies with adults in dresses, candles, religious songs (...) The adults were naked under their dresses. They were taken into a tunnel, through a hatch in the bathroom of a triplex. They were taken by car... we are talking about children of 2, 3 and 4 years old who were prostitutes in this network (...)

In the spring of 1993, I heard that the Mc Martin School property had been sold by the Mc Martin family to defence counsel, as agreed. He sold it to a contractor who was to build an office building instead of the school. So I contacted him immediately and said, "Dear sir, I would like to have access to the property." He then gave me two weeks. I signed a paper to take on the responsibilities, and then with a few parents we hired a UCLA archaeologist, Dr. Gary Stickel, knowing full well that I was not qualified to validate the existence of these tunnels even though I had found them myself. So we started the excavations (...) Dr. Stickel told us: "I can now say without the slightest doubt that there were many tunnels under the school and that they have been filled (...) I have a 186-page scientific report available on that. We found a large underground entrance 2.70 meters below the west wall (...) We found these tunnels while Ray Buckey's second trial was going on, so it could have been used to convict him. We informed the prosecutor who sent his investigator (...) This investigator, who is not qualified in archaeology, simply said: "There are no tunnels here." And of course the archaeologist made the round back. Be that as it may, they did not use this evidence, solid evidence for this second trial, which they ignored (...)

In this tunnel we found a Disney plastic bag dating from 1982 about 1.40 meters below the concrete floor of the class, 1 or 2 meters from the entrance to the foundations (...) The tunnel is oriented to the south for 14 meters below classes n°3 and 4 (...) A chamber 2.70 meters wide was discovered along the tunnel under class No. 4, the ceiling of the chamber and the top of the tunnel sections had layers of plywood covered with tarpaper and consolidated by cinder block. The characteristics of the tunnels confirmed that they had been dug by hand (...) The children have described well the entrance and exit of the tunnels and this fits exactly with the tunnels discovered with the archaeologist (...) Another significant fact was the discovery by this archaeologist of a small plastic plate with three pentagrams drawn by hand (...) More than 2000 artifacts have been found under the floor of the school, including a hundred animal bones (...)

The team of archaeologist Gary E. Stickel found under the school exactly what the children had described. The tunnels had been backfilled with different types of earth. In the Mc Martin case, IIC director and member of the Molested Children's Professional Preschool-Age Group, Kee MacFarlane, was appointed in 1983 by the prosecutor's office. She received about 400 children who had all gone through Mc Martin School, including former students, and she estimated that 80% of them had been sexually abused. Of these hundreds of children, only 11 were heard at the trial. Private detective Paul Bynum, recruited at the time by lawyers for the parents of small victims, also came to the conclusion that children had indeed been abused in the school. He committed suicide just before he could testify before the jury about the animal bones he had found in the tunnels. His entourage strongly denied that he was suicidal.

We find this same system of tunnels in the case of the "Haut de la Garenne" orphanage in Jersey, where children were also tortured and raped during the night. A stifled affair just like that of the Mc Martin school. In 2012, American investigative journalist Leah MacGrath Goodman was banned from English soil for wanting to investigate the case in Jersey, which dates back to 2008. Children in this orphanage were reportedly tortured, raped and even murdered, and many small victims testified but were completely ignored. According to the journalist, all those who sought to investigate the case were expelled from the island or dismissed from their jobs. Everything seems to indicate that this is a big deal to be stifled. Just like the discovery of a mass grave of children in late 2011 on the grounds of the Mohawk Institute in Brantford, Ontario, Canada. These were Native American children from residential schools.

The case of mc martin nursery school is therefore not isolated. In 1988, a study entitled ''Sexual Abuse in Day Care: a National Study'' looked at 270 cases of sexual abuse in nurseries and kindergartens, involving 1639 victims. According to the specialists who wrote the study, ritual abuse is mentioned in 13% of cases, which may be true satanic rituals or pseudo rituals intended to intimidate children[266].

Subsequently, Ted Gunderson also worked on the Franklin case, one of the largest networked paedocriminality scandals in U.S. history, a case that was stifled by every possible means, including assassinations. The Franklin case concerned a network that prostituted children mainly from Boys Town (a kind of orphan village founded in 1917, about 5000 children lived there in the 80s). The clients of this network, the rapists designated by the children, were among the richest and most influential citizens of the state of Nebraska, they were great businessmen, politicians, journalists and even police officers. In the Franklin case, there were also testimonies of ritual abuse with child sacrifices.

- John de Camp and Paul Bonacci

John de Camp was a Republican senator from Nebraska from 1971 to 1987, and was also a lawyer. In franklin, he was in charge of the case to prove that these extremely serious accusations were unfounded. But as a result of his investigations, he came into possession of indisputable evidence proving that paedocriminality was practiced by some American politicians, including in the White House. He could therefore no longer fulfil his mission of covering up the affair. In order to protect himself and his family, John De Camp wrote a book on this issue entitled "The Franklin Cover-up: Child Abuse, Satanism and Murder in Nebraska", a book that provides evidence of the existence and functioning of this paedocriminal and satanic network. This publication also makes the important connection between network paedocriminality and government experiences of mind control over citizens, especially children.

There is also a journalistic report entitled "Conspiracy of Silence", which describes in detail the whole affair. A documentary that was originally to be broadcast by the Discovery channel, which retracted a few days before following pressure or threats. The rights were bought back in order to keep the material in the boxes. However, a copy had been sent anonymously to Senator John de Camp who then gave it to Ted Gunderson. Today, this important video archive is online on the internet.

In this documentary, Senator John de Camp states that this network extended back to the highest authorities in the United States: "Obviously, the FBI was protecting something much more important than a bunch of old pedophiles who had questionable relationships with little boys. They were protecting something far more important than a bunch of drug dealers. In my opinion, they looked after the interests of some high-profile politicians. Very wealthy and powerful people were associated with these politicians and with the political system in general, including the highest authorities in the country."

We can also see in this documentary one of the survivors of the network, Paul Bonacci, who reports to Senator John de Camp the existence of parties organized in the house of Larry King (Lawrence E. King), rented $ 5000 per month, but also his escapades at the White House:

- I was about 14 years old in 1981. At first there were 3 or 4 evenings in the year, then it was about one per month (...) Some of the children were kept in rooms on the floor below, in case they got agitated or panicked because of the drugs, because they were drugged. They locked them in a room so that they would not escape.

- What kind of drug?

- Everything you can imagine, cocaine, heroin, speed...

- You tell me that all this was happening on those parties, in the same place where you saw Larry King and other prominent politicians?

- Yes.

(•••)

- Did you also go to the White House?

- Yes.

- And how did you get access to it?

- I went there with Larry King, but Craig Spencer was one of the people who organized this for us. It was a kind of gift for the "services" that we rendered him.

- How many times have you done these kinds of parties there?

- I have participated twice.

- And have you been a prostitute on these occasions?

- Yes, after leaving the White House, late at night. It was really weird to be in the White House at that time, during the night and especially to go to places where the guy was telling us that no one ever went there.

Paul Bonacci also testified that he witnessed much bloody scenes during satanic rituals in which babies or very young children could be murdered after being raped. The ritual then continued with acts of cannibalism. According to Bonacci, Larry King had been participating in a satanic cult since at least December 1980. In his written testimony, he reports that he was brought by King in December 80 to a "Triangle" located in a wooded area towards Sarpy County, Nebraska. There, he witnessed the sacrifice of a baby. The boy's blood was recovered to be mixed with urine and consumed by the congregation. He himself was forced to drink it from the chalice. Still according to Bonacci, the participants all sang making strange sounds, terrified, he knew that it was not necessary to say a word of what he had seen, fearing to be himself the next victim sacrificed.

Bonacci was diagnosed with a dissociative identity disorder caused by the multiple traumas he experienced in early childhood. Senator John DeCamp reports some things about this in his book "The Franklin Cover-up":

Dr. Judianne Densen-Gerber, a psychiatrist and lawyer already mentioned above, is also a member of the International Society of Multiple Personnality and Dissociative States. She confirmed that Paul Bonacci suffered from Multiple Personality Disorder (now renamed Dissociative Identity Disorder, T.D.I.). It is not a psychosis, she says, but a neurosis resulting from the defense mechanism of a child's mind, a function aimed at protecting him from "unimaginable atrocity". A total of three psychiatrists examined
Paul Bonacci and who all validated the diagnosis of multiple personality disorder.

On December 29, 1990, Dr. Densen-Gerber testified before the Franklin de Omaha Legislative Committee. She was asked by Robert Creager about Paul Bonacci:

- Doctor, I believe the grand jury came to the conclusion that Mr. Bonacci was not capable of lying. Do you have a comment on this?

- I think it would be very difficult for Mr Bonacci to lie... When you have a multiple personality, you do not need to lie, you change (editor's note: personality). There is nothing that Mr. Bonacci did not tell me that I had not already heard from other patients or individuals. These are not elucidations and he often admits himself that he does not know. He hasn't fabricated anything and he's not trying to give answers like most people who want to please do. He does not even want to give you the impression that he wants to please[267].

Dr. Densen-Gerber wrote following Bonacci's visit to prison (he was indeed convicted of perjury):

1) He has an extraordinary memory of details, making him a precious witness.

2) He doesn't lie.

3) He accurately described satanic rituals practiced internationally by sects, something that was impossible for him to know without having participated in them himself.

He describes one of his personalities as a computer chip in his head that allows him to maintain an obsessive attention to detail. It can give you dates and times of extreme accuracy. I have never seen a child capable of doing that. He is therefore a valuable witness. He does not invent, he will rather say "I do not know" if he really does not know[268].

In October 1990, shortly before the opening of the Franklin committee, a police psychiatrist, Dr. Beverly Mead, answered Senator Schmit's questions about the witness Bonacci:

- Senator De Camp: Doctor, now do you believe it following these interviews that we have heard here and those that we have listened to together earlier?

- Dr. Beverly Mead: I personally think that these details that he gave us come from experiences that he actually had...

- Senator Schmit: We have heard the testimony of several of his personalities (alter) who named names like Larry King, Robert Wadman, etc. Based on your professional experience, do you think these descriptions are accurate?

- Mead: I'd like to see them confirmed by other sources, that's for sure. But currently, my impression is that Paul or Alexandrew (editor's note: one of Bonacci's alter personalities) reports things honestly, as he remembers.

- Schmit: Could he have imagined that or dreamed of it and then tell us about it here today? Would that be possible?

- Mead: It would be pretty phenomenal to do such a thing. I do not think that is possible. I think he's talking about things that he actually remembers (...) There may be some details that are not very precise, but I think the story went as he says[269].

- he actually remembers (...) There may be some details that are not very precise, but I think the story went as he says[269].

Despite several reports from psychiatrists explaining the phenomenon of severe dissociative disorder, Paul Bonacci, as well as Alisha Owen, another survivor of the Franklin network, were both sentenced to prison for perjury. It was ruled that Bonacci's split psychological state with its inconsistencies and contradictions, undermined his testimony and that this required his indictment for perjury! It is classic in this type of case to highlight the psychological state of the dissociated victim in order to discredit his testimony. The diagnosis of dissociative identity disorder should, on the contrary, be one more piece to put in the file to support the fact that the victim has indeed experienced severe trauma, or even mental control, and that the investigation must be thorough rather than automatically closed. The victims must be listened to and cared for rather than condemned. But in this kind of case, the sad logic is rather to stifle the file to protect a network of untouchables.

John De Camp says he spoke with several of Paul Bonacci's alter personalities. He described how his writing style varies depending on the alter that is in control and how memories can also vary from one alter to another. Bonacci even has a personality who speaks and writes German, while he has hardly studied. Psychiatrists who worked with him reported that his various personalities were incapable of lying and that they had a high-performance photographic memory. It would seem that Bonacci has been subjected to a trauma-based mind control program since childhood in order to make him a Monarch slave. Investigators reported that the network that had plunged him into Satanism was centered at the Offutt military base next to Omaha, a major air force base. This is where he was transported to be sexually abused when he was only three years old, in the early 70s. In Offutt, and later in other military installations, the network "trained" him through torture, drugs and sexual violence in order to train him militarily, including for assassinations. It was therefore a question of splitting his personality by trauma, and then programming it[270].

Paul Bonacci is one of the many victims, prey of the Network, who have been subjected to MK programs.
The outbreak of the Franklin case in the courts has made it possible to publicly reveal his testimony, but how many other victims remain prisoners, whose word will never be heard?

In 2004, Senator John de Camp gave a radio interview to Alex Jones. Here are some excerpts about a testimony of Paul Bonacci who reports a snuff-film shoot in which he participated: "Isimply tookPaul Bonacci's diary and I published a good part of it in my book, a passage concerns a trip he made in 1984. He says he was taken to a place near Sa.cramento "with tall trees". Then they went to a place there was an owl, a kind of large carved owl or something like that (...) I didn't know pa.s while there was a place called "Bohemian Grove" that matched the description, I didn't write pa.s written "Bohemian Grove" in the book because I didn't know pa.s what it was at the time. (Editor's note: The "Bohemian Grove" or "Bohemian Club" is a group reserved for the world elite (mainly Americans), it is one of the most closed in the world. Members meet once a year on private property in a Sequoia forest in Monte Rio, California. Ceremonies of pagan, druidic and Babylonian inspiration take place there by a lake, at the foot of a giant owl statue representing Moloch, a Babylonian deity who is the symbol of this elitist club) Anyway, that's for sure, he was brought there for a ceremony in which they committed horrible things on another boy. There were a total of three boys, and they filmed. I just wrote down his words with the names he heard there (...) Remember that I didn't know pa.s what Bohemian Grove was at that time, the kid who wrote it didn't know pa.s either. All he knew was that he was brought there. Let me read the passage to you, it was Paul Bonacci who wrote that. Here is word for word what is written in his diary:

"I went there in January 1984. I was paid by the men who frequented King for the stories of prostitution. During the summer, in 1984, I went to Dallas, Texas several times and had sex with different men king knew, it was in a hotel. I traveled with the airline YNR (private charter) and the airline Cam (another private company), which King commonly used. I never really had to deal with King personally, other than when he told me where I should go. On July 26, I went to Sacramento, California. King put me on a private plane from an airfield in Omaha to Denver, there we picked up Nicolas. A boy who was about 12 or 13 years old, then we flew to Las Vegas where we were taken to ranches to get equipment. Then we went back to Sacramento. We were taken by a white limousine that took us to a hotel. We (Nicolas and I) were then taken to an area where there were large trees, it took about an hour to get there. There was a cage with a naked boy inside. Nicolas and I had to dress up with a panoply of Tarzan and stuff like that. They told me about  the boy (I won't use the word). At first I refused and one of them brandished a gun on my genitals (I will use that word) telling me done the or you will lose them. I started to  the boy. Nicolas underwent anal sex and other stuff. We were told that he was a virgin and that we had to let off steam on him. I did everything I could not to harm him. We were told to put our  in his mouth and other stuff... they filmed everything. We did these things to the boy for about 30 minutes or an hour when a man came in and started hitting us on the genitals. He grabbed the boy and started to  him and do other things to him (...) Then he put the boy next to me, one of them took a gun and blew up the boy's head. I had a lot of blood on me. I started screaming and crying, then the men grabbed Nicolas and I, they forced us to lie down. They put the dead boy on nicolas who was crying and they put his hands on the sex of the boy. They put the boy on me too and they forced me to do the same. They then forced me to  with the dead child. They put a gun on our heads to force us, I had blood everywhere. They made us kiss the boy on the mouth. Then they made me do something else but I don't even want to write it down. After that, the men grabbed Nicolas and drugged him while he screamed. They put me against a tree and pointed a gun at my head, but they shot in the air. I heard another shot, and then I saw the man who had killed the boy, dragging him to the ground like a toy. All these things, including when the men put the boy in a trunk, everything was filmed (...) Later, we were taken to a house where men were gathered, they had the movie and they watched it. While the men looked at him, Nicolas and I passed through their hands as if we were toys[271].

Paul Bonacci will describe precisely this same scene of snuff-film shooting, crying, in an interview filmed in prison with Gary Caradori, the main private investigator of this Franklin case. In 1990, Caradori died suddenly in the crash of his small private plane when he was about to disclose some damning evidence.

- Kathleen Sorenson

Kathleen Sorenson was a social worker, she and her husband Ron were a foster family for children in great difficulty. In total, the couple collected about thirty testimonies from children that they had in custody from a few months to several years. Kathleen Sorenson decided to talk about what she had learned from some of her dependent children. With her eldest adopted daughter, a survivor of ritual abuse, she testified publicly at forums and conferences throughout Nebraska. She has given interviews on radio and television.

In 1988, she appeared in a show by Geraldo Rivera, devoted to Satanism. Kathleen Sorenson was very aware of the danger of speaking publicly about these things. She died in a car accident in October 1989, shortly after testifying in a Christian television program broadcast in Nebraska. It was Senator John De Camp who published his testimony in his book "The Franklin Cover-Up". Here is the transcript of part of what she denounced at the time:

We learned about this because we were a foster family and worked with a number of children. A few years ago, several children started talking after a period of confidence building. They reported very strange things that had happened in their lives, it was scary and at the same time very confusing. I really didn't know what to make of it. We first went to the police and then we went to social services but there was really nothing else we could do. These children we worked with have now been adopted into safe families. They probably would never have spoken if they hadn't trusted the people they lived with.

There are certain similarities in children's stories when it comes to satanic cults. There are identical things that come up in every testimony, such as candles for example. They all talk about rape. Sex is undoubtedly an important part of all this, all kinds of perverse sexual practices. That's the first thing you'll hear, sex, rape, incest, so it's hard to believe. But once this is accepted, we can continue to ask softly to find out more. We then learn that it is child pornography, it is a systematic practice. This serves them, among other things, to threaten the children: "We have pictures, we will show them to the police if you speak." The children then feel a great danger, a great fear of the police. They talk about weird makeup that the people in the band wear, they talk about songs they didn't understand. These were obviously songs, it's still something that comes up in each of the stories, but none of the children called it "singing". There were also dances. Most of the time, this involves sexual practices. There is always a group leader that the children are very afraid of.

These children, from a very young age, I am talking about young children, were born into families to worship the devil. That is all I can testify to, and I do not pretend to be an expert in the field. All I can tell you is what the children told me. My husband and I are now aware of some things that we shouldn't know, that's true. That's why I thought about it a lot before I got involved in this show, we heard things so ugly and so scary that we hesitated to reveal it publicly. It's a very heavy thing and I don't want to scare people away, turn their lives upside down or give them certain ideas. I do not want them to think that if a child starts talking about things like that, it is probably because they have seen this television show in which I am talking about it. But we hear more and more of it, and it is becoming very, very clear. I think it's time for people to know that this is not fun or play, it's not something we can ignore or laugh at.

The children I spoke to all had to kill at a very young age. It was something that was beyond anything I could understand. In a way, with the help of an adult's hand and by having them participate in the ceremony, they make the child commit an assassination. And what's serious is that the children truly believe that they wanted to do it of their own free will. They want to replicate what adults do and they are encouraged to do so. This becomes their goal, to become like adults. There is always a small part in them that keeps this natural notion of good and evil that is given to us by God, but with the excitement of the group, they want to do it. They also love sex, I didn't know that children could love sex. Why would they fight against this? A child will eat a whole bag of sweets if you leave it to him. They will take part in these things voluntarily. When they come out of it and they start talking about it, it's very difficult for them to realize. At first, we ourselves did not realize that they were "volunteers" to do so.

They are told that they will not be able to cope, that no one will ever want to believe them, that there is no freedom possible. They are hopeless until the day they meet someone who is willing to listen to them. They are systematically threatened with death. Every time a child is killed in the group, they are told, "If you talk, this is what will happen to you." And they have every reason to believe it... So even when they arrive at a host family and start to feel a little safe, they still expect one of the worship members to come to the door one day to attack them. They believe that these people know everything they do and everything they say. A teenage girl told me that she had been told that if she ever married and her husband cheated on her, it would be with one of them. They are deting them to failure in all areas. These practices appear to be very present in Iowa, Nebraska and Missouri. Some people have recently suggested that these states could be a kind of headquarters.

While you listen to me talk about these things, there will certainly be a part in you that will naturally refuse much of what you hear there, and believe me, we too refused it at first. I would like to share with you some of what children have revealed to us, things that no child can know or invent. This is what finally convinced me with deep emotion. There is this evil and this pain that comes out when these skinned people start talking.

The children I am talking about are the ones I have personally known at home. They are now between 5 and 17 years old. When they first spoke, they were between 5 and 15 years old and when these things happened, they were still babies, we are talking about very young children... We are talking about children whose awareness and learning of good and evil is then in full formation. These children do not know, they cannot know what is right. They are in total confusion. The monstrosities they have made before, for which they have been rewarded, are so horrified that they will be systematically rejected by others when they talk about them. Generally, they have been placed several times. When they arrive with a family, they will fly, they will harm the animals, etc. The kid can, for example, cut his pencils to try to stab people. Obviously, families refuse this kind of behaviour in their homes, but they don't have a clue what's behind it, they're just going to say, "We've got a very weird child there." Many of these little ones are sent to psychiatric hospitals where they will be labeled "psychotic" or "schizophrenic", who would want them afterwards? I praise the Lord who has brought many of them into my life, into our families. There are other families like ours, it's just a way for the Holy Spirit. That is the only way I can explain it.

I'm going to start with the first stories we've heard. This one will seem horrible to you, but it is rather "soft" for me, because we had to deal with much more difficult testimonies. The first is that of two little boys who were 7 and 9 years old when they started talking about sexual violence, they had a lot of sadness in them. One afternoon when we were talking about various personal things, both negative and positive, the little one began to cry. Since we couldn't get an explanation, his older brother confessed to us: ''He is surely crying because he was in the room when they killed his friend.'' That was the first case we heard. They started describing the scene to us, they talked about this little victim whose hands were tied and his mouth gagged. There were crosses marked on his body, located in the places of the vital organs. It was very unhealthy... A few weeks later, we learned that it was not adults who had killed this child, but that it was this older boy, the one who had told us about it.

The next case we are going to talk about is that of a little boy who was very limited mentally. He had language problems, it was very difficult for him to express himself orally. When he started talking about these things, everyone was surprised at the way he was expressing himself. We were sure of it, we knew he hadn't been able to hear that from other kids. But we started to wonder, there was indeed something strange with these children who were coming to dump all these atrocities on us. The thing that made me believe in the veracity of this child's story is that he talked about several babies who were killed, but once he curled up in the fetal position while he told the story of the stabbed infant, he was then 9 years old. He was in the fetal position while his eyes became glassy and he said, "They cook the baby on the grill. it smells like rotten chicken or rotten deer.'' He then told us how they cut out the heart and genitals to keep them in the refrigerator. A typical thing that keeps coming up in the testimonies is their interest in the genitals. I asked him where the remains of the bodies were put, I did not get an answer from this child. But the other two boys I talked about just before later told me that "babies were being thrown into the fire." I asked them if they were dead when they were set on fire, the little one said to me, "No, no, they were alive." At that time we were really panicked by all these things! What were we going to do?! How could we help these children? Where to find a therapist who can treat this problem?... But God has set up a support system. Other families helped us and it really supported us a lot.

The next child is a little girl who was 9 years old when she spoke. It was very painful when she first started testifying to sexual abuse. Sexual abuse is so harmful to children... They're embarrassed to talk about it, it's so intimate. She started by drawing cats... All these cats had their tails drawn at the other end of the page, or it was their legs that were separated from their bodies. As we started chatting with her, she told us that she had to kill a cat who was waiting for cubs.

She confessed to us that it was she who had to kill the cat: "With a knife, I put it in her butt and I turned it." Now you will tell me can a child invent such things?! If I ask a child how he could kill a cat, do you think he will answer that way?! These are the kinds of horrible details that the children were reporting to us. Then the little one told us that they ended up opening and cutting the cat, that's how she knew she was expecting the little ones. According to her, they ate parts of the animal, as well as feces. They also drank blood. This was just the beginning, she also had to kill a baby, in the same way, "put the knife in the back and turn". The baby was alive and screaming. This child to this day still has terrible nightmares as well as violent flashbacks. She told us that they cut up the baby and ate it. The remains were burned and the bones crushed. The little one talked about gasoline that was poured on the remains to burn them in the backyard. I often thought I was crazy, but I heard this so many times that now I know it has to be that way. We know that there are morgues involved in the cremation of victims.

The most horrific cremation story I have to tell, something very disturbing, comes from a victim who was a teenager at the time she told it to me. She described a rally in front of a barn where people were singing. Then when they entered the barn, they divided into two groups. She was never with her whole family, they were systematically separated to go to different places. I then asked her where she should go and she said, ''I've always been in the cremation chamber.'' As she described this cremation chamber to me, I was thinking in myself "how could she get out of it by keeping all her mental health", I don't know. She was then a very small child.

This young girl told us that these groups kidnap young children and tie them up. There may be 5 or even 10 of them hanging in a row. In the ritual she told me, they were fully dressed, which is unusual since usually they are naked. Other children, including this teenager, who was a child at the time of the events, were given candles. The candles were lit, and then the adults poured liquid on the clothes of the attached children, liquid that was obviously gasoline. They then gave a signal to the children who had to come forward with the candles to set fire to the little victims. Once this was over, some of them were shot. The first child this girl had to kill was one of her little cousins. She says that she could not oppose it, because those who oppose it are also killed (...) Two years ago, this girl collapsed at Christmas time. Everyone thinks that Christmas is a wonderful time. She confessed to us that she hated Christmas, that she couldn't stand this party because all she could hear were crying babies. For her, Christmas is the time when most babies die. She covered her ears and cried for hours shouting, "Stop! Stop it! Talk to God and tell Him to stop this!" All she could hear were screams and crying babies... Christmas for the children I spoke to, is one of the worst times. Three children told me about a very similar ceremony. They were taken to a church where all the children were gathered, it was apparently very festive. A young child is highlighted, two of them talked about babies on an altar. The adults are all celebrating, singing and dancing. The children are drawn into this euphoria and a circle is formed around the one who has been put forward, of course it represents the child Jesus. The adults then begin to make fun of him, spit on him, insult him and then encourage the other children to do the same. You can imagine how it quickly gets out of control. At some point, they give all the children a knife and then stab and cut out the child or baby until he or she dies. Then they celebrate the death of the child Jesus[272]...

- Sandi Gallant

In 1988, Sandi Gallant was a police officer in San Francisco when she wrote a report identifying numerous cases of ritual abuse throughout the United States, but also in Canada where the phenomenon is also present. Here's what she wrote for the victims' relatives:

"In recent years, police officers have been confronted with investigations that involve a change in vocabulary. This vocabulary must be adapted to crimes now identified as cases of "ritual sexual abuse" or "ritual abuse against children" (...) Until recently, the laws were applied in these cases in the same way as for the usual abuse of children. This was not done to deny the existence of ritual abuses, but because these cases were never categorized before that. In other words, these cases were handled in the way that all the files were handled because no one knew that they corresponded to a particular crime scenario then developing in the country. However, this has posed problems in terms of the success of the investigations (...) The allegations concern types of abuse that are as intolerable as they are unbelievable. Investigators believe the victims, but they are unable to find evidence that could lead them to legal action. In the maze of problems that have arisen, investigators have found themselves, in many cases, faced with cases for which they were unable to prove the truth. The parents of the victims, now totally frustrated by these failures of the system, need answers and, in fact, have the right to have answers and to know why their children who have been abused do not have the right to justice. That is why this article was written. You, the parents, are worthy of seeing the laws enforced. At the same time, we need you to understand the situation.

Why are laws like this? As an investigator of ritual crimes over the last few years, I can honestly tell you that we are making progress and that this area of crime is recognised as specific and real. I say this because not a day goes by without me being in contact with other police services across the United States and Canada, which are seeking information about the modus operandi and how ritual abuses take place. In that regard, we are making progress. Where previously officers were not aware of what they saw, they are now able to identify things more easily, whereas previously investigators had no training on how to identify these crimes when they face them. They are now receiving training. All this is all very well, but parents still do not see the desired results. In many cases, suspects do not even go to trial, let alone are found guilty. At the time of writing, there have been only a few lawsuits that have resulted in

United States (...)

In her report Sandi Gallant wrote to her superiors:

"The information contained in this document is unpleasant and strange, to such a degree that one might choose to discredit it. However, my research in this area has revealed that many such cases are emerging in the country and in Canada. The similarities in the stories of each child victim used in these crimes tend to give credibility to the information revealed by others. In addition, psychiatrists and therapists who followed the victims, say that the consistency of the stories and the explicit details revealed lead them to believe that the children are telling the truth. Every police officer who submitted information for this report believes that the victims are telling the truth and that, in fact, the children would be unable to develop such stories.

During my research, similarities began to surface, indicating the high probability that there is a network of people in this country, involved in sexual abuse and probable homicides of young children. These cases appear to differ from isolated cases of child abuse because the crimes mentioned here are committed with a deliberate intent to maim and massacre children for ritual or sacrificial purposes. Many of the reported cases also reveal child pornography that goes beyond the normal type of child pornography because children are photographed during rituals in which some people wear dresses, costumes and candles, also the presence of snakes, swords, altars, but there are still other types of ritual material."

This report was never forwarded to the FBI, and the Department of Justice also refused to review it[273].

- Elder Glenn Pace

On July 19, 1990, Glenn Pace, then Bishop Mormon, sent an internal memo to his Church denouncing ritual abuse. Indeed, Glenn Pace had conducted an investigation into satanic ritual abuses within the Latter-day Saint Church (Mormons) in order to denounce the systematic and widespread proliferation of mind control. He had thus collected about sixty testimonies concerning traumatic rituals and human sacrifices. At the time, this memorandum caused a lot of noise to the point that a government investigation into ritual abuse in Utah was launched the following year (leading to a report cited earlier in this chapter: "Ritual Crime in the State of Utah"). It should be noted that in his book entitled The Darker Side of Evil, Corruption, Scandal and the Mormon Empire, Anson Shupe reports on page 109 of his book that in the Hadfield case, children talked about stories of sexual during which participants wore costumes and adults took pictures.

Here is the translation of the memorandum of this bishop who had the courage to denounce these horrors:

In accordance with the Committee's request, I am writing this note to convey to you what I have learned about the ritualized abuse of children. Hoping that this has some value and allows you to continue monitoring this issue. You have already received the "LDS Social Services" report on Satanism dated May 24, 1989, a report from Brent Ward, and a memorandum from myself dated October 20, 1989 in response to Brother Ward's report. Therefore, I will limit this letter by sending you only the information that was not in these documents.

I met sixty victims. This number could be multiplied by two or by three if I did not limit myself to only one session per week. Initially I did not want to get involved in this issue which could become a handicap for my position of responsibility. But afterwards, I felt that we had to pay the price in order to obtain an intellectual and spiritual conviction in the face of the seriousness of this problem within the Church.

Of the sixty or so victims I met,there are fifty-three women and seven men, eight of whom are still children. This violence took place in the following places: Utah (37), Idaho (3), California (5), Mexico (2), as well as other places (14). Fifty-three victims reported that they had witnessed or participated in human sacrifices. The majority were abused by relatives, often by their own parents. All developed psychological problems and most were diagnosed with multiple personality disorder or other forms of dissociative disorder.

This ritualized child abuse is the most despicable of all child abuse. The fundamental and premeditated aim is to torture and terrorize these children until they are forced to dissociate themselves systematically and methodically. These tortures are not the consequence of "anger", they are the execution of perfectly thought out and well-planned rituals, often performed by close relatives. The only way out for these children is to dissociate themselves. They will then develop a new personality to allow them to endure the various forms of abuse. When the traumatic episode is over, the basic personality regains control of the individual who is not aware of what has just happened to him. Dissociation also serves to hide all these things, over time children no longer remember these atrocities. They arrive in adolescence and adulthood without having any active memory of what is happening (or what has happened). Generally, they continue to be involved in rituals throughout their adolescence and early adulthood, without being fully aware of their participation in these occult activities. Many of the people I spoke to were used for certain missions and it was only much later that they began to remember them. An individual may have memories of his or her participation in rituals, while still serving full-time worship.

The victims lead a relatively normal life, the memories are locked up and compartmentalized in their minds. They don't know how to deal with some of their emotions because they can't find the source. When they become adults and end up in another environment, certain things can then trigger memories and flashbacks or nightmares can also happen. These people will live a completely normal life, and overnight they will find themselves hospitalized in a psychiatric hospital in a fetal position. The memories of their childhood go back in such detail that the victims again feel the pain that caused this initial dissociation.

There are two reasons why adults can remember such events in every detail about their past: first, the terror they experienced was so intense that it was indelibly marked in their minds. Secondly, memory has been compartmentalized so that part of the mind is not subjected to trauma. When these memories resurface, they are as fresh as if it had happened yesterday.

The memories seem to go back in layers. For example, the first memory may concern incest, and then re-emerge memories of dresses and candles. Then, the victims realize that their father or mother (or both) were present at the time of the abuse. Another layer will contain the memory of seeing other people tortured and even killed, including babies, only to finally realize that the person himself has participated in sacrifices. One of the most painful memories is sometimes the fact that they had to sacrifice their own baby themselves. With each layer of memory comes up new problems that victims have to face.

Some people claim that witnesses denouncing this type of treatment cannot be reliable because of the unstable condition of the victim and because almost all of them suffer from dissociative disorders. In fact, these stories are so bizarre that they do indeed raise the question of credibility. The irony is that one of the objectives of these sects is precisely to create multiple personalities in these children, in order to keep the "secrets". They thus live in society without it having the slightest idea that something is wrong, since these children and adolescents do not even realise for themselves that they have another life in the shadows and in secrecy. However, when sixty victims come to testify to the same type of torture and sacrifice, it becomes personally impossible for me not to believe them (...)

The spiritual doctrine that is linked to this physical violence is particularly difficult to overcome. In addition to pain and terror, children are also taught in satanic doctrine. Everything is completely reversed: white is black, black becomes white, good becomes evil and evil becomes good, etc.

Children are put in situations where they actually believe they are going to die, such as being buried alive or immersed in water for example. Before doing this, the executioner tells the child to pray to Jesus Christ to see if he will come and save him. Imagine a seven-year-old girl who was told that she was going to die and that she had to pray to Jesus. and that for her, nothing comes to save her until the last moment when she is finally rescued by a person claiming to be a representative of Satan. She becomes a child of Satan and is likely to become faithful to him.

Just before or shortly after their baptism in the Church, children are baptized by blood in the satanic order that is intended to cancel their Christian baptism (...) All these things are done with the personality that came into being in order to endure the physical, mental and spiritual pain. Therefore, a kind of "civil war" develops within these people. When memories begin to resurface, there are personalities who feel themselves doomed to Satan, with no hope of forgiveness, while the basic personality is an active member of the Church. When integration (fusion of alter) takes place, this is where the "civil war" breaks out. Sometimes, during an interview, the personality of the dark side emerges, it may be petrified or filled with hatred towards me and what I represent. These personalities must be treated both spiritually and psychologically.

Most of the victims are suicidal. They have been indoctrinated using drugs, hypnosis and other technical means to make them suicidal as soon as they begin to reveal secrets. The victim is threatened with death, his relatives are also threatened, etc. The victim has every reason to believe these threats because he has already seen people being killed (...)

The purpose of this memorandum is to emphasize the complexity of psychological and spiritual therapy for these people. Our priests, when confronted with such cases, naturally find themselves destitute, not knowing how to respond to them. As for the judiciary, is totally ineffective. For example, some victims sometimes claim that all these things are a thing of the past and that they need to put them aside by focusing on their present lives. This is simply not possible. Part of spiritual therapy is to convert personalities who have been indoctrinated into Satanism. Victims must integrate all their personalities so that they can function in a coherent whole that allows them to face the problems and then devote themselves fully to their lives (...)

The authors live a double life, many are recognized members of the temple (Mormon), which is why the Church needs to consider the seriousness of this problem (...) I refused to give me the names of the assailants. I told them that my responsibility was to help them in their spiritual healing and that the names of the perpetrators should be entrusted to therapists and police officers (...) I do not claim to say that this problem is widespread, all I know is that I have met sixty victims. When sixty victims testify to the same types of torture and murder, personally it becomes impossible for me not to believe them (...) Obviously, I only met those who were looking for help. For the most part they were in their twenties or thirties. I can only assume, and I am horrified by this, the number of children and adolescents currently involved in these occult practices (...)

- Jenny Hill

In October 2012, the American television channel ABC4 broadcast a short report by Kimberley Nelson devoted to the testimony of Jenny Hill, a woman survivor of ritual abuse who was diagnosed with 22 different personalities. Jenny Hill's story is reported in "22 Faces", a book written by her therapist, Judy Byington, who told the journalist:

''She was sexually assaulted during rituals when she was very young, she developed these multiple personalities whenever she was in a traumatic situation.''

Her first alter personality was "born" when she was 4 years old. Just as his father, a devout Mormon, began to do the unthinkable...

''He told me that he loved me more than my mother and that this was our secret.''

It was a few years later, when the ritual abuses began, that his personality split again to face rape and torture. Jenny didn't remember the abuse, all she knew was that she had serious memory loss. Until the day she woke up confused in a psychiatric hospital. Dr. Weston Whatcott then took care of her. He told the reporter that he had met several of Jenny Hill's alter personalities:

''If it was cinema, then it deserves to receive several Oscars (...) She had a completely different voice! I mean a real change of voice, a change of accent, but also a change of behavior, of mimics, all this changed radically.''

Dr. Whatcott also discovered that his various alter personalities stand out in Jenny's writings. Whether in the diary she wrote as a child but also in the diary she kept as an adult. In this newspaper, alter personalities reveal what happened in his past. Jenny herself wasn't convinced that she could have all these different personalities, until the day Dr. Whatcott made a video recording of one of the therapy sessions: "She was fascinated by what she saw there, she was like a little child, she got on her knees and got closer to the screen. She couldn't believe she was the one on that video.'' Dr. Whatcott says that this discovery of the recordings was a real turning point for Jenny. Memories then began to resurface, including memories of human sacrifices: "I was tied up and they threatened to do the same to me as the victim. At one point during the ceremony, the pain was so intense that the victim was crying hysterically... and I didn't cry, I didn't make a single noise... as if I had been programmed for it.''

Jenny claims that on June 21, 1965, she saw this little girl being murdered. She says she probably would have been the next victim but was saved by divine intervention.

Judy Byington: ''Jenny says she saw a man's feet in a white light, she was lying on the altar and he was right above her, and that broke the ceremony.''

Jenny thought she was really alone in her memories, but her mother, before her death, admitted in a phone conversation that she had been involved in satanic rituals. She also confirmed and validated Jenny's memory of this saving white light. The telephone conversation between Mercy Hill (Jenny's mother), and Judy Byington, was recorded and broadcast during this ABC4 report:

- Reporter: You talked about this white light, can you tell us more about it?

- Mercy Hill: I don't know, I don't remember much about it, but it seems to me that there was a white light. She was a little far away from us and she was going down.

- Reporter: Did you see anything in the light?
- Mercy Hill: No, she was so brilliant you know. she was blinding.

- Vicki Polin

In 1989, Oprah Winfrey devoted one of her shows "The Oprah Winfrey Show" to satanic ritual abuse. The show was titled "Mexican Satanic Cult Murders". During that evening, a woman testified to the horrors she had suffered, she said that her family had been involved in rituals for generations and generations. At the time of her testimony, she was undergoing intense therapy because of her multiple personality disorder or dissociative identity disorder. Here is the transcript of her interview with Oprah Winfrey:

- Oprah Winfrey: Have you also experienced ritual abuse in your family?
- Vicki Polin: Yes, my family descends from a long line that repeats abuses, it goes back to the sixteenth century.
- OW: And so they abused you?
- VP: I come from a family that believes in this...
- OW: And from the outside, everyone thought it was a respectable Jewish family?
- VP: That's exactly right.
- OW: While there was a cult to Satan inside the house itself.
- VP: Yes. There are many Jewish families across the country,not just mine.
- OW: Really? And who is aware of these things?... A lot of people now. (laughs)
- VP: I talked to a Chicago police investigator about it, and many of my friends know that. I have also spoken about this publicly before.

- many of my friends know that. I have also spoken about this publicly before.

- OW: So you were brought up in the middle of all this horror. Did you think it was normal?

- VP: I buried a lot of my memories in me because of my multiple personality disorder, but yes. when you grow up with something, you think it's normal. I've always believed that.

- OW: But what kind of thing? You don't have to give us gore details, but what kind of things were going on in your family?

- VP: Well there were rituals in which babies were sacrificed and you had to...

- OW: The babies of whom?

- VP: There were people bringing babies back to our family. No one realized it, many women were obese, we didn't see if they were pregnant or not. And if there were any suspicions, they would leave for a while and then they would come back. Another thing I want to say is that not all Jews sacrifice babies, it is not something traditional.

- OW: So you witnessed a sacrifice?

- VP: Yes, when I was very young, I was forced to participate in this and I had to sacrifice a child.

- OW: What is the purpose of these sacrifices, what does it bring you?

- VP: It's for Power, Power.

- OW: Have you been used yourself?

- VP: I have been sexually assaulted, raped several times.

- OW: What was your mother doing? What was its role?

- VP: I'm not sure what role she could have, I haven't recovered all my memories yet, but my family was extremely involved in it. You know, it led me to that, both my parents led me there.

- OW: And where is it now?

- VP: She lives in the Metropolis of Chicago, she works at the Human Relations Commission of the city where she resides. She is a model citizen, no one would suspect her.

- OW: Were you raised with the notion of good and evil?

- VP: Yes... I had both of those notions. What I mean is that for the outside world, everything we were doing was good and respectable, and then there were some nights when things were different. where what was wrong became good, and what was right was something wrong. All this with the aim of developing multiple personality disorders.

- OW: In your family, it was really called "a cult of the devil" or it was just the things you were doing that were diabolical?

- VP: No, I don't know. Finally, I said it was wrong, and they said it was good. There's a book I came across called "The Cave of Lilith," a book about Jewish mysticism and the supernatural. There's a lot in there related to what I experienced as a child.''

• Linda Weegan

Linda Weegan is a mother whose two children have been the victims of ritual abuse. She testified during a conference with Ted Gunderson. Here, she describes the systematic protocol of injustice of judicially attacking and harassing the protective parent (usually the mother) to protect the alleged executioners and networks instead of conducting a proper investigation. Here is the transcript of his testimony:

I'm here to tell you about a real-life example of what happens when a satanic cult abuses your children. About 10 years ago, for me the devil was something. I go to the Church, I am Catholic. I went to church and yet the devil was something external that was not talked about and that was even hidden. It was something downright science fiction. My children started talking about sexual abuse in 1993. They masturbated, they tried things with the dog like introducing a pencil or brush into his rectum. These behaviors have worsened and have gone crescendo (...) I knew I had a very big problem there but I had no idea what it really was. I then sought help throughout the country. I passed my children's drawings on to the police. So I had all these drawings with circles, people, black candles in the middle of tables, representations of sodomy, etc. I went to the Church and said, "I don't know what it is but these drawings look very significant. There are symbols that I don't understand, devil's heads, ghosts.'' At that time, I had no idea what satanic ritual abuse was. The only answer was that the Church asked me if I had ever done a psychiatric examination... Today, I can say, I know what the symbols of these drawings correspond to.

Despite the fact that the father was charged with sodomy and oral sex about his children, no one wanted to help me. Even though there are lawsuits going on, they say you invented these stories of satanic ritual abuse. Your credibility is zero, it just doesn't exist, "nothing like that happens in the United States." Just focus on the "simple" pedophilia that your children have suffered.

So I took my boys to an institute specializing in child sexual abuse. Moms could also be admitted and I had legal custody of my two sons. My husband, his lawyers and the judge discovered that my children were in a specialized institute... They then confiscated my house, everything I had, from the pictures of my babies to my clothes, I only had one suitcase with me. They took my car, my mail, my income, my assets. I lost everything for introducing my children to a sexual abuse specialist! They were trying to stop me because of what my children might eventually disclose. They tried to break me up financially so that my children would no longer have any therapeutic help in this institute. It has been clearly acknowledged that my sons have been sexually abused and I can prove this by documents.

One day, the therapist who was taking care of them invited me to her office, and there she told me that it was a classic case of S.R.A. (Satanic Ritual Abuse = Abu Rituel Satanique)... I had no idea what she was talking about, S.R.A. ?? ... She then explained to me what satanic ritual abuse was. She showed me the drawings that the children had made in her office. There was the depiction of a blood sacrifice, where people cut off their arms and collected blood in a chalice. The chalice had a devil's head shape. etc. This includes orgies, child sacrifices. It was a huge shock, I didn't know what to do, I didn't know where to go.

I called all the child protection associations and organizations in the country to ask for help, no one admitted the existence of satanic ritual abuses. In addition, all the child protection associations are simply proclaiming "that they love children". but they don't actually help anyone. So my fight to save my children has taken me this far, and I can tell you now that there are other moms here today who have asked me for help because their children are also victims of ritual abuse. This is very hard for me, my life has been destroyed but I must say that it has been rebuilt for the better. John and Ben, who are 11 and 8 years old, lived for 15 and 16 months in the home of a Satanist who is a member of a group of 25 people located in Turney, Connecticut. They are actively involved in ritual sexual abuse. Neither the governor nor anyone protected my children. So I wonder: How far will it go? (.)

- Glenn Hobbs

In 1988, Jeremiah Films produced a documentary entitled "Halloween, Trick or Treat?'' (Halloween, fun or threat?) in which Caryl Matrisciana interviews an ex-Satanist, Glenn Hobbs, born in a cult practicing ritual abuse. Here is the transcript of this interview:

- Caryl Matrisciana: Glenn Hobbs was initiated by his grandfather into a Satanist sect as a child and he continued to participate in these activities for years. I recently asked Glenn about his involvement and the importance of Halloween to these occultists.

- Glenn Hobbs: My involvement in satanic worship began in childhood because I was a generational Satanist... That is, my family and its previous generations were involved in these occult practices. Today, my earliest memories of Halloween and everything related to it remind me that it was a very dark period of my childhood...

- CM: Glenn, can you tell us about the Halloween rituals you were involved in as a child?

- GH: There was another little girl involved in that with me. Her name was Becky. Becky was not like me, she was destined to be sacrificed. I was destined to become a high priest. She was born in this sect to be destined for a human sacrifice. She and I were married together in a ritual. It was a wedding offered to "the Beast". When I and this little girl were married, there was a lot of sexual abuse, a lot of blood flowed, all in order to unite us.

- CM: When does the Halloween ritual begin? What is the real purpose of Halloween?

- GH: The rituals I remember most clearly start at the end of September. Me and the little girl I just mentioned, Becky... The abuse was very repetitive during this time of year. We were taken to several rooms where we were undressed. We spent the next two weeks in sorts of huts in which a lot of rituals happened, a lot of animals were sacrificed. Incantations to Lucifer and his demons were made for them to come and take possession of me. I was destined to become a high priest when the time came. On Halloween night they took me and the little girl to the back of a van. The road seemed long, again we were drugged... Finally we stopped, they took the little girl out and they left me in the van. I heard a lot of hustle and bustle outside, people were screaming and screaming with this kind of whisper in the background... a kind of song. So I was aware that a ritual was going on because I had heard this stuff many times before. It was something usual for me to see people lying on the ground and taking convulsions during these rituals, always with this demonic presence that we feel all around... Finally a woman came to tell me that it was time for me to go... So she got me out of the van and there I could see that there were a lot of people present. Some people were dressed in sorts of dark dresses with large hoods. They took me to a stone altar. I remember seeing the little girl, she was on the altar... I first wondered what was going to happen, because you never know, they can use the altar for many things, it can be animal sacrifice, sexual abuse by the high priest on a victim, it's hard to know in advance... They finally directed me in front of this altar, there I saw that they had tied her feet and that she was attached to the altar. His arms were also tied to the altar with sorts of hooks. She was very white... I remember that she was incredibly white... They had made incisions on his feet and wrists. They had collected the blood that was flowing from the wounds into a chalice, and then they passed this container to the people who were present. Then the high priest took the ritual dagger... He pointed it at the little victim, he then took my hand to put it on the dagger and forced me to stab my chest...

So when it comes to Halloween... You know, it was a peak time of year, halloween night when they killed this innocent little girl. It's something that happens every Halloween night, it's not just an isolated event. There are children all over the world who are sacrificed on Halloween night, and in our societies we celebrate it by going from door to door to ask for sweets, it is a "big party" for us. But I think it's very ironic, some people think it's something fun, while others take human lives during that time... And yet no one wants to face what is really happening (...)

- Anne A. Johnson Davis

Anne A. Johnson Davis is the author of "Hell Minus One", an autobiographical book published in 2008 in which she recounts her childhood traumatized by ritual abuse from the age of 3 until 17 when she finally fled. Anne, real name Rachel Hopkins took a long time before giving her public testimony and coming out of anonymity, writing her autobiography took 7 1/2 years.

The book contains a foreword by Lieutenant Inspector Matt Jacobson of the Utah Attorney General's Office (Jacobson was one of the editors of the report "Ritual Crime in the State of Utah" mentioned earlier in this chapter). In this foreword, Jacobson validates the testimony contained in the book, stating that he himself personally met and questioned the aggressors who confessed in his presence. Later, Anne even received written confessions from her executioners, who were none other than her mother and stepfather.

Here is an interview with Anne Johnson Davis that was conducted and put online by the group S.M.A.R.T. (Stop Mind-control And Ritual abuse Today! [274]!)

- What is the subject of the book 'Hell Minus One'?

- This book is all about hope and freedom, it is a biography, a segment of my life. As the subtitle of my book states, it is "my account of a deliverance from satanic ritual abuse and my return to freedom".

This book reveals that there are actually people who practice satanic ritual abuse. This is not a myth, as some claim. From the age of 3, my parents used me as an object during rituals until I left home at the age of 17. This book reports the abuses I have suffered, as well as the different steps taken to regain my freedom, to heal myself and to finally forgive my executioners. This book is about the choices I made, some miracles, and crucial help I received. A help that allowed me to triumph over this tragic past. It also concerns the commitment I have made to live a new life in love, determination and positive resolutions.

- Why did you write this book?

- When I was in the healing phase, I began to understand that my life and mental health would not improve just because of me. I then felt a vocation to bring freedom and hope to others. My husband, Bruce, was also convinced of this vocation and he always encouraged me to write this book. He felt that my experience could make a contribution. At first, I resisted because I wasn't ready to engage in something that required immense and painful effort. But as I healed, this desire to inspire courage in others grew in me. From my experience, I wanted victims of abuse to regain some hope of being able to get by, of being able to overcome the obstacles that seem totally insurmountable. What we have to face, we can overcome - and even do even better. The doors will then open and help will come when we give everything of ourselves for the GOOD.

I have evidence regarding satanic ritual abuse. I also have memories that have come back to me and I have noted all this clearly in letters. These letters were returned from the written confessions of my executioners, who were my own mother and father-in-law. My half-brothers also sent letters to the authorities confirming my accusations. Two inspectors linked to the Attorney-General's Office subsequently obtained verbal and written confessions from the assailants.

- Who should read your book?

- The story in my book is intended to bring hope to the victims. Hope for those who are still captive. Hope that they know that there are other options and that they have a choice. It is also a call for those who are able to help them, such as politicians, mental health professionals, the Church, and even those who open up to the testimonies that are sometimes entrusted to them. This book is also intended for those who wish to read a biography where goodness and light have overcome evil and darkness.

- What are the most important message(s) in your book?

- That our adversity is not our identity. What we have done, or what we have been done, is not what we are. No matter what has been inflicted on us – or the mistakes we have made – we can overcome this and be true to our authenticity, our true self. Goodness and light always overcome evil and darkness. Our God-given ability to direct our own lives is never lost, ever!

This book is intended for those who need encouragement, or who are in a professional or personal situation where they need to support and encourage someone. The subtitle of my book is: "My account of the deliverance of satanic ritual abuse and my return to freedom". I say "deliverance" rather than "escape" because I could not have done this on my own. I received the help of a higher power. I do not think that anyone can get out of this enslavement completely on their own. The message of this book goes beyond that simply overcoming satanic ritual abuses, it is also valid for everyone, individuals, associations, companies, because it deals with the issue of overcoming obstacles that seem insurmountable. We all have Goliaths to face and overcome. This process of confrontation to overcome the obstacle is never easy and it requires commitment and hard work. But the result of this work changes your life forever. The only way out is through it.

- How long did it take you to write this book?

- Let's see... How old am I?... It took me a lifetime! 47 years first to live it, then it was necessary to "relive" it and treat all this. Then it took 6 years of writing and finally 18 months for the work of proofreading and editing the final manuscript. The book was published in December 2008.

- What research have you done?

- Research? I didn't have to do any research. I lived it, and then I remembered it. The memories came back with crystal clear clarity, one by one, day after day, week after week, month after month. It pieced together a shocking jigsaw puzzle that I was totally unaware of. I wrote explicit letters about the acts committed and finally received written confessions from my parents: my mother and father-in-law. These written confessions were supplemented for oral confessions before the Utah Attorney General.

- What was the most difficult thing, or challenge, in writing your book "Hell Minus One"?

- Find the determination and courage to stay on this project for more than seven years, with the writing and proofreading of a manuscript telling horrific and painful details. But the dark side of my story was rebalanced by the bright side which is ultimately the most important. These sources of positivity are my faith and spiritual experiences, as well as wonderful circumstances and people who have gone through my life.

- In the first chapters of the book, you describe many detailed memories when you were 3 years old. How did you remember all this? Was it always present, or did it come back to you as you wrote?

- Most memories are reassembled during therapy. The additional details emerged over the years as I tried to put my story in writing. My editor and I worked together to finalize the manuscript. At one point, he asked me if I knew more. In order to preserve authenticity and accuracy, I took all my time, calmly, to simply let the details emerge.

- Have your brothers and sisters been victims like you? Or were they Satanists like your parents?

- My half-brothers wrote letters to the ecclesiastical authorities supporting and confirming my testimony. I respect their privacy and I don't want to speak for them. They were not victims as I was, I was "a piece brought back" in the family, considered a "bastard" and used as a sacrificial object.

- How did you get these letters of confession from your parents?

- At the beginning of my therapy, when I still had contact with them, I called them and asked them if they could write to the ecclesiastical authorities to confirm my accusations. And they did.

- Your parents' letters of confession are published in detail in your book. You used ellipses in several paragraphs. What did you leave behind and why?

- These are paragraphs that were too insane and too violent to be published. Above all, this book conveys a message of hope and encouragement, deliverance and healing. My intention in including these confession letters was to give the reader enough information so that he would know how unhealthy it was. But I didn't want the content to be offensive and shocking to the point that the reader closes the book.

There were also references to my half-siblings, and out of respect for their privacy, I removed these passages.

- Where are your parents' confession letters today?

- The originals are safe in a safe.

- Are they available to the public? If not, why not?

- They are not accessible to the public. They were made available to the Utah Attorney General during his investigation. They were also made available to the publishing house during the writing of the final manuscript. But due to the nature of the content of these letters with often shocking pictorial details, as well as for a defamatory question, because names are mentioned there, they are not available to the public.

- Your parents began subjecting you to ritual abuse as early as the age of 3 and this continued until you left home at the age of 17. Afterwards, you started having rabies attacks in your thirties... By the end of the '90s, you had finished your therapy and you were on the road to recovery. That was more than a decade ago and today you are in your fifties. You say it took 7 years to write "Hell Minus One". Why didn't you write your book earlier? Was it an emotional question, did you have to feel ready before revealing these memories?

- Before 2001, I didn't feel the need to write a book that could possibly help others. Writing "Hell Minus One" took a lot longer than I had anticipated. But I wanted the manuscript to be authentic in every detail and also to be of a good quality of writing. It took 18 months to re-work and edit the manuscript, after 7 years of writing.

- Your parents were doing horrible and sadistic things about you. After these episodes, you didn't remember anything, you didn't even have hostile feelings towards them. What is the medical or psychological definition of this phenomenon? How and why does the brain work in this way? Can certain things experienced fade away?

- The definitions of professionals I have heard are not convincing. I tend to rely on my own experience rather than using labels that can be contradictory and misunderstood. In my case, my psyche prevented me from becoming aware of the abuse until I was mature enough to react. Before that, the threats of my executioners saying that I would be destroyed if I talked about anything kept these memories of abuse in a compartmentalization, a psychological silence.

- What exactly is satanic ritual abuse?

- For me, it is a criminal, inhumane and perverse form to worship the devil. These crimes include physical, sexual, mental and spiritual torture of innocent victims.

- What is its origin? Its history?

- First of all, I am not an expert on satanic ritual abuse and I do not wish to be. Sometimes, during the abuses, I heard my parents and their accomplices talk about returning to a distant time, so everything that was done during those nights did not refer to the present time. There are several sources on the internet describing in detail the origin of ritual abuses. Unfortunately, there are also many sources claiming that all this is false and that it is an urban legend born in the 80s and discredited in the late 90s. Mainly due to statements without evidence or basis.

What happened to me - my parents' letters of confession - is yet another argument to put in the balance. In fact, my parents' letters, their verbal confessions to the police, and their excommunication from the Church, provide new evidence that researchers and skeptics about satanic ritual abuse did not have before. Without evidence, I can understand that this subject has not received more support in the past. One of my hopes is that "Hell Minus One" will receive good reviews, from the judiciary, mental health professionals and even the media. This is in order to reconsider this issue of ritual abuse.

- Why do these people engage in such behaviors? What do they get out of it?

- From my point of view, this is a way to satisfy an addiction to sexual violence and perversion. I have seen them behave completely insanely - determined to appeal to the powers of darkness and evil - believing that this would give them power and power superior to other people, as well as an extraordinary way to get money.

- The ritual abuses you experienced took place in the 50s and 60s. If you do a search on the internet with "Satanic Ritual Abuse", hundreds of sites are listed. Some offer help, some describe troubling details about today's practices. What comparison can we give us on what you have experienced and what is being done today?

- More than a year ago, after a few hours of research on this subject on the internet, I decided that I would never submit to the sight or reading of these things again. What I understand is that the purpose and intentions of ritual abuse do not seem to have changed, even though the techniques have developed considerably. This is becoming more and more bizarre, more and more brutal and inhumane.

- For readers who are victims of ritual abuse, what do you recommend to them?

- Above all, I would like them to know that they have a choice. I would like to urge them to show courage and ask for help in any way, to get out and stay away from this evil, this bondage. If your family is toxic and completely ill, and they are involved in criminal activity, you should not turn to them again. You can't save them, but you can save yourself. I would like them to realize that they have a right to their identity and their life given to them by God. They have and will have inner signs and an intuition that will guide them in the best possible way.

- For readers worshiping Satan, or practicing ritual abuse, what do you recommend?

- For those who practice Satanism, they have the right to do what they want as soon as it is not a question of criminal acts. After experiencing the satanic practices of these foul-smelling souls, I advise them to get out of it, whatever the cost, before it is too late.

- What is the goal you hope to accomplish with your book "Hell Minus One"?

- My hope and prayer is that this book will be a beacon, a light in the midst of darkness. A message of hope and encouragement. We can all overcome seemingly insurmountable obstacles. The epigraph of my book recalls that we have all been endowed by the Creator with an inalienable right to our life, a right to freedom and happiness.

- In your book, you explain why you and your husband chose not to file a complaint against your parents for their criminal acts. Now that several years have passed since that decision, do you regret it? Why did you take such a decision?

- No, I do not regret it. At the time, with the "false memories syndrome", the trial would not have succeeded in my favour. Whether I tell the truth or not, it is my person who would have been put in the media spotlight rather than my parents; even though they have made written and verbal confessions and have been excommunicated from their church. A force in me had then warned me that it would have led to a media explosion that would have torn my own little family and me apart.

- Manon and Josée

In 1995, the Canadian newspaper La Presse published an article by journalist Marie-Claude Lortie entitled: "The SQ has opened an investigation into a mysterious satanic sect in the Eastern Townships" (SQ stands for Sûreté du Québec, the Quebec national police). A publication that is still available in the archives of the www.lapresse.casite.

The article reports the testimonies of two young women, 'Manon' and 'Josée', born in a satanic sect and who came out of it anyway. At the age of 28, Manon decided to speak to Luc Grégoire, an investigator with the Sûreté du Québec's major crimes squad. The woman then described black masses, gang rapes, physical abuse and sacrifices. Marie-Claude Lortie introduces her article with these few words of Manon:

- I was born into a satanic sect. In a family where all members had to worship Satan, bring him unconditional love, do everything to obey him. I was abused from the age of three and a half, tortured, martyred and raped. I have seen animal sacrifices, but also human sacrifices...

- Human?

- Yes, humans...

Manon recounts that she underwent initiatory and traumatic rituals such as being buried alive in a coffin. She speaks of gang rapes and tortures, sacrifices during which she was forced to drink the blood and eat the flesh of the sacrificed offerings. As in many testimonies, she recounts that her family had been involved in these satanic activities for generations and generations: "It is a cult that is transmitted through blood. And it is also with their blood that the followers must sign the obligatory pact before entering any black mass, a pact by which they undertake never to say anything of what they have seen or heard during the ceremonies."

The young woman explained to the investigator that every full moon, dozens of people pile up in basements to attend rituals led by satanic priests. She talks about ceremonies that usually bring together a hundred people. The group to which she belonged often travelled long distances to attend black masses and she talks about certain ceremonies in Quebec gathering no less than 500 followers. She says she participated in a ritual in the United States where there must have been 1500 people, according to her "many people had to be there simply out of voyeurism, for sensationalism, and to enjoy the sexual orgies that took place after black masses".

The young women both claim that they have been forced into prostitution and that this is the fate of all the girls who are members of the network. The rapes took place during the ceremonies, but they were also sexually abused in their families, "Most of the atrocities were not spared to any young woman of the sect", explains Josée. It was a priest of the Brothers of the Sacred Heart in Bromptonville, Guy Roux, who helped Manon through prayer in order to "free" her from what she had experienced. The priest claims that the young woman was struggling with the demon. His psychotherapist also helped him a lot to overcome these traumatic experiences.

- Pierre Antoine Cotnareanu

Another testimony is that of the psychoanalyst Pierre Antoine Cotnareanu. He described a troubling case of one of his Canadian patients. His testimony was filmed and broadcast on the internet, here is the transcript:

- He was a person who came from a Satanist sect, what she told us was quite atrocious, I didn't think it existed near my house. She said she was part of a family that practiced a Satanist cult from generation to generation. When she was little, she was educated, hypnotized, to be a kind of priestess, an altar for ceremonies of black magic.

- Who practiced these things?
- She said that they were important people (...)
- As a therapist, have you been destabilized by this discovery?
- That's right. it was very destabilizing.
- What are the details that have destabilized you?

- The fact that it served as an altar, that there was some sexual magic around it all and that there were child sacrifices. I think that is enough to destabilise someone.

- Sacrifices of children of what age?

- Young children, very young.

- Babies?

- Yes, babies especially. It was the altar on which sacrifices were made (...) She was a person in great distress when I met her and we could detect that she had undergone hypnosis, that's why we worked to get her out of this kind of "circle"......

- Did she give any figures on the number of people?

- There had to be 15 or 20 people during the ceremonies, sometimes less. They were families, and around those families, there were other people of varying importance who gravitated.

- Was there an important genetic side to them?

- Yes, they've been like this for generations, so parents raise their children that way and so on... There is not so much tenderness in that.

- Have they ever sacrificed one of their children?

- I don't know. But already, this patient is just like a sacrifice, because to make her live this, it is rather demonic.

- How often were these rituals?

- It happened quite regularly, it started with a phone call, and then I think the person's voice made her go into a trance and after that she was available to do what she had to do.

- Can we get out of such a trauma?

- Yes, I think she got away with it. It takes a lot of work, it takes someone who knows well the mechanisms of hypnosis to be able to decode and defuse the process. I saw her some times when she was crying, she was crying. when she noticed it. when there was this clash of the different personalities who met inside her: it was quite intense. Intense enough to destabilize me and that I tell myself that there are people more qualified than me for this. It is really a special qualification this work with these victims of sects who have undergone hypnosis (editor's note: mental control).

- Véronique Liaigre

On 5 July 2001, tf1's Newscast broadcast the testimony of Véronique Liaigre, who stated in no uncertain terms that she had been raped and prostituted by her parents from the age of 5. She clearly described a Satanist Martinist sect in the Agen region that practiced sacrifices of children born of rape and undeclared or foreign children. She says she was forced to participate in blood rituals under threats. Here is the transcript of this report broadcast at a great hour listening:

- Patrick Poivre d'Arvor: Here is now a terrible file on which Alain Ammar and his team have been working for several weeks. The accusations made in her investigation by a young woman who was a minor at the time of the events are extremely serious, some of them are hard to believe, but that is her word. The names she mentions have been covered with a "beep" so as not to reach the presumption of innocence.

- Voiceover: Véronique is 20 years old, since the age of 5 she has lived hell. Raped, prostituted by her parents whom she has denounced and who are waiting to appear before the Assize Court, she has managed to escape those whom she designates as her executioners. His story is not ordinary and may even seem invented. However, if it is legitimate to doubt, what this young woman spontaneously told and repeated to us is cause for revolt. In particular when she claims, despite the threats that weigh on her, she says, to have frequented a Satanist sect, Martinists, and to have been tortured and tortured herself.

- Véronique Liaigre: We get beaten, we get objects put in the orifices, there are sometimes sacrifices of children to give thanks to Satan, there are many things like that... We kill an animal, we are poured blood on our heads and the rest in a cupola that we put on the altar.

- Reporter: So actually, your parents, like all the parents of these kids you're talking about, were selling their kids?

- VL: Exactly, since it brings in a certain percentage of money. A child under the age of 8 is worth 22,000 francs.

- J: Where do these children come from?

- VL: Children who are sacrificed are not declared, or are foreign children. Especially when I was on Agen, they were little Africans, they were black. On Jallais I saw some also,on Nanterre too, but they were little whites, French, but they were children born of rape.

- J: Children born of rape?

- VL: Yes, that had not been reported. These are deliveries that are made at the parents' homes in abominable conditions.

- J: So to the extent that they weren't declared, they were sacrificed?

- VL: That's it...

- J: Not only were you part of the sect, but you participated in these rituals.

- VL: Yes. In 1994, I had to sacrifice at gunpoint, with two of my friends, a child in Jallais. And all three of us had to assassinate him. At gunpoint, if we didn't, we would have done it. They would have done it with even more violence and they would have hurt us even more. So we had to do it.

- J: And who was threatening you with a gun?

- VL: "beep" the one who heads the gendarmerie of "beep".

- J: And these corpses, what do they do with them afterwards?

- VL: The one that impressed me the most was the one I participated in. They took him to a cellar that was in Cholet, transported in a black bag with an overturned white cross. And they had a big can, they put something in. I don't know if it was gasoline or acid or something like that, but Cécile, Sophie and I all ran away.

- J: So they actually burn the corpses.

- VL: They have to burn them yes.

- J: You think it's all a kind of network, people who stand a little bit so as not to fall...

- VL: That's it, and then it's to protect yourself as well, because given that there are men of law who are in it, it's true that it would be a funny fuss if we learned that there were judges and all that are part of that network.

- J: Have you seen any personally?

- VL: I saw an email from "beep", from mr. "beep" but I didn't know who it was.

- J: Who said what?

- VL: It was for a transfer of funds.

- J: And you think that these people are part of the sects themselves? This elite you're talking about?

- VL: They cover them... I won't necessarily say they're part of it, but they cover them, that's for sure.

- Voiceover: Jean-Claude Disses is Véronique's lawyer in Agen. City where she was transferred from Maine-et-Loire to a home frequented by paedophiles. Initially skeptical of his client's accusations, he is now convinced that she is telling the truth.

- Jean-Claude Disses (Véronique Liaigre's lawyer): I believe her when she tells me that she was raped in her family. I believe her when she says that she was prostituted by some members of her family. I believe her when she explains that this prostitution has necessarily and necessarily passed through many adult people who have come to abuse her for money. I believe her when she says at the same time that she was photographed during these scenes and I believe her all the more because we apparently find, this is the point that must be checked, these photos on a CD-Rom in Amsterdan (editor's note: Zandvoort affair).

- Reporter: So it's her, she recognized herself and said ,'that's me.''

- JCD: That's it, that's right. She says 'it's me'', she says it in front of a police inspector and at the same time as she identifies herself, she also identifies five of her childhood friends. This means that if this is true, it is necessary that these children were subjected to pornographic scenes, that these scenes were filmed, and that these photos were sent to Amsterdam to land on a paedophile CD-ROM that was seized by the Dutch police as part of a procedure in Holland. And so it necessarily requires that there is an organization that takes photos, that broadcasts them, so there is an organization and a network!

- Voiceover: Véronique led us to one of the many places where, according to her, satanic ceremonies took place on the 21st of each month.

Véronique Liaigre (at the foot of a downtown building in front of a porte cochère): That's where I came here several times. In particular, I remember well once in 1994, when I found myself at a satanic ritual with a child murder. We went up to the second floor. There, there were rapes, we had to be 5 or 6 children, it was not a very big meeting. There was "beep", "beep", there were many people, including notables whose names I do not necessarily know.

- Reporter: And you yourself have suffered...

- VL: Yes I was there and I suffered. There was my father, my mother was not there that time.

- Voiceover: Her incredible memory also allows Véronique to remember a phone call where she hears about little Marion Wagon, who disappeared on November 14, 1996.

- Véronique Liaigre: I was at the home of one of the pedophiles, "beep", and so there the phone rang. She started screaming, she was upstairs, I was in her room downstairs. So I picked up the phone in his room and heard a man I knew, Walter, asking for more money or he was going to report everything to the police. He said himself: "Anyway, I will not go to prison, it was not me who killed him, I only housed him under your orders, and only six days. And now I want the money, I'm not going to go to jail.'' And there I heard Jean-Marc who said: "Anyway, where the 'macabres' are buried, they are not about to find them. ''

- Reporter: And you know where they're buried?

- VL: I think they are buried in Granges sur Lot in the backyard.

- J: Marion's corpse would eventually be there...

- VL: Yes, I think so.

- Voiceover: Searches have reportedly been carried out recently, to no avail. Would Véronique have panicked? In any case, her statement leaves the father of the disappeared woman incredulous.

- Reporter: When we talk about cult, you never thought about it?

- Michel Wagon: Of course it is. We have received a lot of letters, hundreds and hundreds of letters. But this is the side that we do not want to think about, on which we refuse. Now it is true that the events of the time, with the Dutroux affair, have made us. We said to ourselves, well it only happens in Belgium but in the end, it can happen in France. That's the side we don't think about.

- Voiceover: A former gendarmerie commander at the time in charge of the Marion case remembers the phone call that Véronique is talking about:

- Michel Louvet: We were not able to know where the call came from, the call came to an individual. We weren't able to reassemble the call, so we don't know who made it. Uh. It is true that I have heard that there was a young girl who had made statements, but I do not know them because I am no longer in the gendarmerie. What I mean is that I trust my former collaborators to check all the leads.

- Jean-Claude Disses: How is it that these five children raped in Angers, we find their photos in Amsterdam ten years later... That is the question! And this question, you understand that it is too serious for us to have fun not asking it!!

- Véronique Liaigre: It's very hard, it comes back in nightmares every night. Every second, when a child screams or a child cries. On the street, at any time when you see a child, you think that maybe now he would be as big as that one.

- Voice-over: Police and justice have taken Véronique's statements seriously and are working to verify them one by one as implausible as they seem. The eradication of certain paedophile and criminal networks may depend on these checks.

- Patrick Poivre d'Arvor: Extremely serious accusations, therefore, that the gendarmerie and the justice system are now working to verify.

This was a 10-minute report explicitly addressing satanic ritual abuses and the paedocriminal network that is rampant in France. A relatively long report that was broadcast at prime time in patrick Poivre d'Arvor's diary, something unthinkable today! Just like the broadcast on March 27, 2000 by France 3 of the report "Rapes of children, the end of silence?", which was followed by a debate where a certain unease was palpable on the set, and for good reason. Two children "Pierre and Marie" denounce the unthinkable.

unthinkable today! Just like the broadcast on March 27, 2000 by France 3 of the report "Rapes of children, the end of silence?", which was followed by a debate where a certain unease was palpable on the set, and for good reason. Two children "Pierre and Marie" denounce the unthinkable.

- Peter and Mary

In 2000, the report "Rape of children, the end of silence?" showed the testimony of two children (10 and 13 years old) saying that they had been brought by their father into ceremonies with men and women in gables. These children described, face down, in front of the cameras of France 3: hypnosis sessions, drugs, torture, rape and ritual murders of children. Little Marie describes the basements of a large mansion, sort of catacombs under a chic building in Paris or its region, where the abominations took place. During the debate following the report, Martine Bouillon, former deputy prosecutor of Bobigny, said that she had been aware of mass graves for children in the Paris region and that an investigation was underway! Georges

Glatz, also present on the set, will also confirm the existence of children's mass graves, by adding a layer on the reality of snuff-movies. Martine Bouillon will be transferred within 24 hours following this shocking statement. She also said on this program: "We just realized that paedophilia existed... We cannot yet understand that there is even worse than pedophilia, I would say ''simple''.'. Strangely, this documentary is not available in the archives of France 3, but it was at the time recorded on VHS, then digitized. It is now very widely distributed on the Internet. It is a reference documentary about testimonies of ritual abuse. Here are some excerpts:

- Voiceover: Of the two children, it is mainly the eldest, Marie (pseudonym) who tells. Here, she tells us about her father and the places where he would have taken them.

- Marie (drawing): There was a place in Paris, of which he was the head. He said that he was a great mage and that his name was "Bouknoubour". In this place they wore large white dresses with golden edges (here she draws a figure wearing a toga with on the bust a triangle in a circle). Then they would pray, they would rape the children, they would scare them. There were several other people who raped us, they put us to sleep with species of porridge. They would also tie us up on tables and then hit us or put needles near our eyes to make us believe that they wanted to puncture our eyes.

- Reporter: Were they really hurting you? Were they beating you?

- M: Yes, they were hitting us...

- J: What did you draw us Pierre (pseudonym)?

- Pierre (who draws while crying): ... There were monsters. It was horrible. They raped me.

- J: They raped you? What is it to rape Peter?

- P: It was touching the zizi. play with it. make of. I was 6 years old, I didn't understand yet what they were doing.

(.)

Mary (who also draws in tears): They were killing them.

- J: They were killing the children?

- M : ... oui.

- J: How do you know that?

- M: Because I saw it. They were little kids who were a little Arab or things like that.. They cut off their heads.

- J: When you saw that they were cutting off a child's head, that was the truth, it was happening in front of you or it could have been a movie?

- M: No, it was for real, because the kids were screaming. And then they would tell us that they were going to cut off our heads too, so they would put us the same on that. And then we were very scared and we thought we were dead.

- J: But why were these people doing that?

- M: I don't know,because they're mean, they're crazy! I don't know why they were doing that, they're mean! We have not nothing done, we were children (Mary is crying).

- Voiceover: As early as July 1996, at the first revelations, the mother entrusted the children to a child psychiatrist who had already dealt with similar cases. For three years, it was with drawings that Dr. Sabourin collected their testimony. Dozens of drawings, dozens of hours of listening that have forged his conviction: he believes children.

- Dr. Sabourin: Of course, I think they have experienced incredible things, very difficult for them to synthesize and stage. They both have a personal ability to draw them, which is not always the case...

- Voiceover: Mary drew a huge statue planted, she says, in the middle of the ceremonial room. Then she drew the pendulum and the wheel that would have been used for hypnosis sessions on the children, and always the disguises, large red or white capes, and crucifixes. We submitted to Dr. Sabourin the last drawing that Marie made to us.

- Dr. Sabourin: In his recent drawings, I find several themes. 4 themes that already existed, where we have a ceremony with people who are visibly disguised, with crosses on their shoulders, which we find here (showing other drawings), we have three here. and the crucifix here is a very special crucifix. She said it was a crucifix surrounded by grass. So where did she get that from?! I don't know... Is it her imagination, is it a child who is delirious? I don't believe it. That is to say, in the face of this type of extremely precise and surprising things, I tend to say that it is an element of memory that reappears. Always when it comes to a child and of course when it comes to a teenager or an adult, these memories of early trauma are in a thousand pieces. And it is with a lot of difficulty, with a lot of emotions, a lot of inner tensions and fears - these are children who are afraid, they are under terror - that they manage to deliver a small passage, a small piece of memory, which leaves everyone amazed. We say to ourselves but finally, how come they did not speak earlier? How come they can't describe this just like an adult who would describe a scenario, that's the big job of therapists and police officers (•••)

- Voiceover: It's a real organization involving many adults that these children describe; and if they are unable to indicate the place of the ceremonies, on the other hand Marie drew us a very precise plan of the building and its basements.

- Marie (describing her drawing): So we arrive by car here... We were turning at a roundabout. There was a groom who came to open the door for us. Then we would go back to a place that seemed to be a pretty chic hotel. He would pick up the keys and then we would continue down a hallway to an elevator. Then we would go down into a maze where it was cold, it was dark, and it looked like a basement. Here, there was a locker room where we went to dress with the white and red clothes, then we went here: a room where they raped the children. Here it was the part where there were mostly girls who raped boys and my little brother, and then here it was men who raped girls. Then here it was a big room, like a big cave in the shape of a cathedral or crib and there were a lot of people. There was also a very, very large statue here of an African or black god, and when he growl, people put money in large baskets that circulated. Around this statue there were ashes, with children's heads on pikes in these ashes.

- Voiceover: Children's heads at the end of spades. Heads of children that Mary tells us would have been beheaded before her eyes, and that we find in several of her drawings. To access these basements, Marie describes on the surface a building, a kind of large hotel with red carpet facing a roundabout in Paris or its region. A chic building decorated with a rounded porch (...)

- Marie (speaking of her father): Since he was also raping us at home, there was someone coming home and he was undressing. They would put their zizi in our mouths and film us, or, with my brother, they would tell us to do things.

- Reporter: And all that they were filming it?

- M: Yes they were filming... and then they would take the tapes to a place that was I think in Paris, where there were lots of books about sex and all that. and they would put the tapes there.

- Voiceover: So are the sectarian framework and the facts described by the children credible or unimaginable as the investigating judge wrote? We put the question to Paul Ariès, a sociologist specializing in cults and child abuse, who conducted studies for the Ministry of Health. We submitted to him all the statements of Peter and Mary:

- Recording of Mary: They made prayers, they said that they were "pure women", they said that one day all the people of this planet had scattered on the earth and that now they had to gather them, the people. in fact there was a kind of god, a messenger of the gods. who came to tell them that they had to go to their planet soon or something like that.

- Paul Ariès: I would tend to say that what is told to us here is completely unimaginable, that is to say that a child cannot imagine it, a child cannot invent it. The first element is these elements of doctrine. That is to say, we are part - if we look at it from the point of view of the followers of this group - we are part of an elite that comes from another planet and that is currently on earth and that will soon be called to leave. It's basically part of the common core of all kinds of networks today. The need to kill someone to save them or to save humanity. There are also all kinds of rites where we are told at some point about these men saying that they are "pure women". So this is something that we find relatively frequently in the literature, the woman is the one who fertilizes, what we have to do here is actually get to fertilize what we call 'Homonculus', that is to say the over-man. It seems to me that we are finally at a crossroads here between two types of networks: on the one hand, saucer networks - which believe in aliens - and then on the other hand networks of sexual magic, and we know that these connections are becoming more and more established.

This "saucer" belief is also found in the case of Samir Aouchiche with the sect "Alliance Kripten", as we will see below. In chapter 2, we saw that Gnostics, in this case the sect of Phibionites (or Barbotians) practiced orgiastic ceremonies in relation to the vision that the followers have of the cosmos and the way to free themselves from it. In addition to satisfying the requirements of archones (demons), these "manners" meet the need to gather the divine seed implanted in the world, which is currently scattered in male seed and female blood.

- Mary's recording: There were people who had species of... not diving masks, but species of glasses with something on the mouth (gas masks?) ... dressed with blouses. And there was a table with cut-out children's hands on top, a child's head and then species of. I don't know if it was guts. stuff like that. And they would put these things, their hands and all that, in jars.

- Paul Ariès: These hands cut in jars, it's something that exists... So again, there are several possible interpretations. One can simply have practices of the cannibalism type, the objective being to succeed in increasing one's own power, also learning to suffer, I was going to say learn to make suffer to become more powerful.

This investigation of France 3 also makes the connection between the case of Pierre and Marie and another case of incest in the east of France with little Sylvie who also describes rapes in meetings practiced by her father and grandfather, she also speaks of a child murder. The most disturbing thing is that little Sylvie recognized in photos the progenitor-executioner of Pierre and Marie, and they also recognized in photos the progenitor-executioner of Sylvie. Just like Pierre and Marie's mother, Sylvie's mother filed a complaint, she also gave the police the recording of a telephone message left on her ex-partner's personal answering machine by one of her friends, here is the transcript whose audio is broadcast in the report:

''Hi, ''beep'' to the device, it's Saturday, 12:40, I call back because you called me several times telling me that it was urgent, we haven't had it since. What I would like to know above all. we must already prepare for the diabolical weekends and the groups we want to do. You would have to tell me how much you are going to come to. Hi.''

The court will establish a dismissal by declaring that there was no link between the two cases and it will even decide to take away from the mother the custody of Sylvie and her sister to entrust it to the father, a classic procedure of the French "justice" in cases of paedocriminality. The mother then took refuge abroad with her children to prevent them from being handed over to their executioner. This same "justice" will not prosecute the father of Peter and Mary and will therefore leave him his right of custody and no thorough investigation will be conducted to determine if the children were telling the truth, despite the extreme seriousness of the testimonies! The mother also went abroad to take refuge with her two children...

There are many similar cases in France where the mother literally has to flee the country to protect her children, who in such cases are systematically handed over to the custody of the alleged paedocriminal by the courts. The protective parent is usually harassed, overwhelmed, even imprisoned or interned, while the aggressor parent is fully protected by a well-oiled institutional system.

It is important to note here that in 2003, a survey was conducted in France by the UN rapporteur Juan Miguel Petit on paedocriminality. A report that was presented to the 59th session of the UN Commission on Human Rights. This official report recommended that an independent body should urgently conduct an investigation into the shortcomings of justice for child victims of sexual abuse and those trying to protect them (...) In view of the number of cases that reveal a serious denial of justice for child victims of sexual abuse and those who try to protect them, it would be appropriate for an independent body, preferably the National Advisory Commission on Human Rights, to conduct an urgent investigation into the current situation.

For example, it is noted on page 14 of this report: "The Special Rapporteur referred to the enormous difficulties faced by persons, in particular mothers, who file complaints against those whom they suspect of abusing their children knowing that they are exposed to possible measures for false accusations, measures which in some cases may lead to the loss of custody of their child(s). Some of these mothers use legal remedies until they can no longer afford to pay the costs of legal aid; only then do they have the choice between continuing to hand over the child to the person they believe is abusing him or her, or seeking refuge with the child abroad. It would even appear that some judges and lawyers, aware of the weaknesses of the judicial system, have informally advised some parents to do so. These parents face criminal prosecution for such acts in France and often in the country to which they are travelling."

- Deborah, Noémie and Pierre

In the early 2000s, the German channel N24 broadcast a documentary that shows the testimonies of several child victims of a paedo-Satanist network in France. The report subtitled in French is entitled "Snuff-Movies et Messes Noires en France". As usual, these children come from families that practice these atrocities from generation to generation. In front of the cameras, they recount satanic evenings with ritual crimes, cannibalism and the shooting of snuff-films. Pierre testifies to having participated from the age of 5 in black masses and having at the age of 7 been initiated to become a high priest, he then had to sacrifice a baby during a ceremony. Some of these testimonies are related to the Dutroux case, but they were never taken into account. Here are some excerpts from this documentary:

- The mother of a small victim: I have always ignored the problems of pedophilia, like most people. I think you have to experience that before you can understand what paedophilia is. Little by little, Robert began to tell us things... What was disconcerting was that Robert would tell me about parties where he went with his father and other adults dressed up in dresses and masks. What particularly appealed to me about his story was that he said, "Dad disguised himself, but I still recognized his voice." And he also mentioned animal sacrifices as well as child sacrifices. He explained many things by imitating them with gestures. He didn't literally say 'sacrifices of children', he said they bleed them and then they buried them.

- Voiceover: Like many other children, Robert mentions that there were also cameras. We found photos of Robert on zandvoort's paedo-pornographic CD-ROM. The mother clearly recognized her son in the photos. But even this is not sufficient evidence to prosecute rapists. (...)

On the sawmill road to Lake Geneva, there is a house that Deborah calls "the green house". According to her, there was more to it than just sexual abuse of children here. Deborah, who is now 15 years old, says that there were satanic rituals.

- Deborah: There was a table with candles. There were some on the table and all around and there were my attackers.

- Reporter: You say they put two of the other kids who were there on the table? What happened? Without going into details.

- D:... They cut out the child. parts of the body.

- J: What did they do that with?

- D: With an electric knife.

- J: The child was alive?

- D:... Yes.

- J: They would kill him next?

- D: No, they let him suffer. He ended up dying.

- J: They cut out a finger for example?

- D: One foot. and they raped him at the same time.
- J: They raped him and the others had to watch?
- D:... Yes.

- Voiceover: Noémie is 18 years old, she is a young woman trying to rebuild her life. A seemingly normal life, except for the fact that she will never be able to forget the horrors she experienced.

- Noémie: The main thing I am here today is obviously to cooperate with this report, but it is mainly because people need to hear about these things. So that people know that this is true, that children are raped and murdered on a daily basis. It's a reality! I have experienced it, I have seen it with my own eyes and that is why I want to convey this message. This is necessary to ensure that these things cannot happen to other children, so that children stop being raped. People need to wake up and become aware of what is going on, and stop saying that children are lumists or fabulators. This is not true, children tell the truth, but you must be willing to hear it.

- Voiceover: Noémie was initiated by her father and other criminals, men from all kinds of backgrounds, to the barbaric practices that took place in front of a camera (...) Noémie was 5 years old at the time of the first abuses, she lost her virginity at the age of 8.

- Noémie: It went very fast and brutally. They just did it for me and my cousin Camille. One day my father took me to my cousin's house, I liked to go there because I loved him very much. My uncle André was there as well as cousins Camille and Marie. And then it was done (...)

- Voiceover: Noémie's father filled her with tender words, he reassured her by telling her that touching was perfectly normal; she believed it. And then he revealed to her his great secret: a complex, an underground cellar where he kept children in cages. Noémie thus became her father's accomplice.

- Noémie: The children locked in these cages never stayed alive for long, between torture and rape, the children were finally murdered. They were all alone there, they could not escape, because they were too beaten, too raped or too drugged… or dead (…)

My father and other men had already raped the little girl. When I walked in, I was a little jealous because I knew my dad had also been involved in that. But then I was satisfied, probably because I could attend the ceremony and of all the children who belonged to this paedophile network and who were raped by these men, I was the only one who was allowed to watch the rapes. So, instead of just being abused, I could participate in the abuse. They ordered me to boil water and pour it on the child. Meanwhile, they hit her, first with a belt, then with a piece of wood. They put cigarettes on his body and cut his hair. They ordered me to cut off the little girl's clitoris. I didn't know what it was, they showed me saying "cut here!". My father told me I had to do it, and then he showed me where to cut.

- Voiceover: Noémie talks about a dozen child murders in one year. It shows the entrances to underground on a map. Justice continues to deny that such underground complexes, catacombs, exist in Saint-Victor (Ardèche).

- Jacques Berthelot: I've been to Saint-Victor, there are underground tunnels there. I was lucky enough to be able to take pictures of them. I gave these pictures to the police of Privas, to Mr Marron. He promised that he would put my testimony in the police reports. I was interviewed by the police in April 1999. But today, the case seems to have been suddenly lost. My photos and my statements to the police are nowhere to be found.

- Voiceover: Why are the alleged perpetrators not brought to justice? After several years of investigation, I come to a conclusion. Among the culprits, many are those who exercise in high positions, they have the power to cover each other and moreover there is a lot of money involved. Noémie says of the children that they are mistreated, tortured, raped and sacrificed in front of a camera. These snuff-films would sell for up to 20,000 euros each.

- Noémie: When I came back, the curtains were closed, it was dark. There were carpets on the floor, I was told to sit down, I sat at a table.

The priests were standing with candles... They wore dark red dresses,almost black. They were singing around the table. It lasted a long time. There was something that was covered with a fabric of the same color as their dresses. There was a child, my grandfather took him in his arms, my brother Pierre was next to me. My grandfather then showed my brother how to kill the child. And then obviously the child started screaming... then they said a few prayers, and we went out. After 45 minutes or an hour, I don't remember exactly, they came out. Ceremonies always end in the same way. The first black mass I saw,it was pretty much the same, there was the sacrifice of the child and at the end on the terrace there were two large plates. with flesh. meat, now I know it was human flesh.

- Reporter: Are you sure it was human flesh?

- N: Yes, I'm sure, it was part of the cult. You are part of this cult without noticing it, all you have to do is attend a ceremony and perform certain rituals. But I wasn't aware of it when it happened. Now in hindsight, I think about all these things that I was made to do on other kids during the rituals, like cutting parts of their genders. (...)

- J: The culmination of these rituals once completed is nothing but cannibalism?

- N:. hmm .
- J: Is it cannibalism?

- N: Yes.

- Voiceover: After talking to the psychologist, I realize that Noémie's father had to program her at an early age. Noémie could not bear the atrocities she endured split into different personalities. One of these personalities is a robot that follows her father mechanically and then there is the girl who plays with her dolls at home.

- The psychologist: There are multiple factors in her story that make her absolutely credible for me. The first is the fact that today, at the age of 18, she told the same story in the same way as she did at the age of 11. The second point is that it describes all the details and it never contradicts itself. It never gives two different versions of everything that has happened. In addition, she gave me the same impression as other traumatized people I met,i.e. the same detachment in the way she spoke about her traumatic experiences. It sounds paradoxical, but it's exactly what makes me think that what she's saying is the truth... She seems perfectly normal despite her past, she needs to keep that distance, otherwise she would collapse. I have no doubt whats about its history at all.

- Pierre (Noémie's brother): The windows are closed, everything is closed, the curtains drawn and the blinds lowered. The children are tied up in chairs with their hands behind their backs. They are gagged so as not to speak or shout. In this room there was my father, Christian N. the owner of the place, André D. and André L. All of them were present at the two sessions in which I was forced to participate. What happens: first the children are raped, the child is almost dead, he lies on the ground. My father takes his belt and hits the child, everywhere, on the face and on the body. Everyone goes there. They hit the child with a broomstick and then they tell me that now it's my turn. I don't want to... because it's as if I were there, without being there (editor's note: dissociation). They take me and tell me go do it! Do it! There was nothing I could do, there was no escape. I had to do it, they ordered it to me. I hit him what. 10 seconds and then I left.

- Voiceover: Pierre was not only sexually abused by his father but even worse. His paternal grandfather, a high priest of a sect, also raped him. Since the age of 5, Pierre has been programmed by his grandfather.

- Pierre: He tells me that I am the chosen one, that one day I will succeed him and that I will join a circle of important people who will be my new family. He tells me that one day I too will be a high priest and that this is a great opportunity for me. Naturally I believed in it as a small child of 5 years. Then ceremonies actually happen, they really exist and people participate in them. They explained to me rituals, masses, prayers (...)

- Pierre describes the initiation ceremony he experienced at the age of 7: The ceremony began as always with songs and prayers. We prayed on red carpets, a red carpet for each of the participants. I was always next to my grandfather, the other priests together. There was a certain chronology between the songs and the dances. We did that for about 20 minutes. Then my grandmother, who is not really part of the sect, who never participates in major ceremonies, brought a baby that she carried in her arms. She gave the baby to my godmother Collette. Collette then walked up to us and gave the baby to my grandfather. He made some signs that I didn't understand, then they passed the baby to each other from hand to hand, until it came back into my grandfather's hands. My grandfather gave the baby back to my godmother, after he pulled out a rather long knife, with symbols and pictograms engraved on the handle. Here too the knife went from hand to hand... And there I had the knife in my hand, my godfathers were holding the baby. My grandfather took my hand, we approached the newborn and we cut his throat. The baby did not make any noise, he did not even scream. He emptied himself of his blood and the blood was recovered with a cup, a kind of big cup ....

- Voiceover: The initiation of a new member always takes place according to the same ritual. Each time the new members are ordered to kill. This must make them stronger and they must swear to remain silent. We thought we had reached the abomination. But Peter described to us another ritual practiced by this sect: cannibalism.

- Pierre: My grandmother brought a large tray, there were the seven priests, there were ten of us all around the table. Afterwards we were served with a piece of meat from the baby. We had to eat it to celebrate my arrival as the new priest of the sect. There was also a glass where there was blood. We had to eat and drink, we drank the blood. My grandfather recited a prayer at the beginning and another at the end. He congratulated me by telling me that I had been very good, he flattered me by telling me that I was the best etc.

- The children of Judge Roche

In the Allègre case that took place in the Toulouse region, certain ritual abuse practices with murders were revealed in private by Judge Pierre Roche himself. Shortly before his death, haunted by the idea that he knew too much (and remorse?), the high magistrate delivered to his two children, Diane and Charles-Louis, the testimony of what he attended during surreal evenings between people of power (in the words of the son Roche). The Roche children testified in front of the camera in September 2005 about what they call "the secret part of the Allègre affair". In their testimony, we still find this extreme depravity where there seems to be no limit and where torture and murder of children seem to be something commonplace. According to the Roche children, these evenings of ritual abuse were filmed and these recordings were trafficked for a very lucrative purpose. Here are some excerpts from Charles-Louis' testimony:

Our father came to Toulouse to reveal to us the existence of a secret group, people of power from all types of backgrounds, politics, finance... He told us about people in the medical community, even academic ones. This secret group recruited a lot from the judiciary and even senior police officers were highly regarded. It would therefore be a secret group whose activities consist in conducting sorts of ceremonies in the greatest secrecy, where we combine practices as strange and uniformly disgusting as group sexuality, scarification. He evoked before us images to make you stand hair on your head. He told us about burned flesh, cigarette burns, pierced flesh. He told us that the people who were tortured, sometimes killed during these sittings - well, the people killed were never consenting - and that among the people tortured, there were sick people who demanded this kind of treatment, and then there were non-consenting people, sometimes children, who were first tortured and then put to death, all filmed and subjected to illegal video trafficking that would be exchanged under the cloak at crazy prices. He told us that the prey of this group of high society predators is recruited from the lowest strata of society in the categories of people who will never be sought. He told us about prostitutes, he told us about "clodos", I quote the term used by a magistrate, he even sometimes mentioned foreigners in an irregular situation according to what was happening to them I imagine. That is to say, people who have either severed ties with their environment or have no legal existence, people whom no one is going to go looking for or about whom any investigation will be more or less doomed to failure from the outset. And then of course, the members of this group because of the influential positions they occupy are able, in the event that certain cases threaten to come out, and well to cut in the egg by manipulating the levers that are theirs, especially since they all stand among themselves by the goatee ...

- Samir Aouchiche

In France, we also have the testimony of Samir Aouchiche, revealed in bruno Fouchereau's book entitled "The Child Sacrificed to Satan", an investigation published in 1997. That same year, the television news of France 2 devoted a small report on this case of satanic ritual abuses practiced by a sectarian group called "Alliance Kripten''. Here is the transcript of the report:

- Daniel Bilalian: Unfortunately, France is not out of the way of these problems posed by paedophile networks. A 26-year-old man, Samir, has just told his terrible story in a book that has just been published. From the age of 12 in Paris, he was the victim of a satanic sect, tortured and then raped for nearly a decade.

- Voiceover: When he had to walk down that hallway, Samir knew the horror was at the end. At the time he was only 12 years old, but for a year already he had been subjected in his flesh to the fantasies of real executioners. Repeated rapes, torture sessions, here in the heart of Paris, nothing has been spared him. And the life of this child martyr plunges a little further into delirium, to the rapes are added real sessions of torture and barbarism.

- Samir: Yes it was there. They brought me here, they tied me up, they handcuffed me and they put products on me.

- Reporter: What kind of products?

- S: According to the doctor, it was acid.

- Voiceover: Burned with acid by the leaders of the sect, a small group of about twenty people called "Kripten Alliance". Samir, like other children, became its toy. A mutilated toy on 2500 cm square of skin...

- S: They couldn't live without torturing children. Initially it was through rituals, ceremonies and after that it ended in orgies. it ended in sexual acts. And then you had to have sex with adults what.

- J: Several adults?

- S: Yes.

- J: There were several children?

- S: Yes there were several children.

- Voiceover: With his eyes fixed, Samir still bears the stigmata of his physical and moral suffering. Last Tuesday, accompanied by his friend Willy who brought him out of his ordeal, Samir filed a complaint against two members of the Kripten Alliance. This ordeal, which could have been interrupted. Between 1986 and 1988, two years after the first rapes, the Brigade for the Protection of Minors became aware of his case through cases involving other children. Samir's lawyer, Maître Jean-Paul Baduel, now has documents to prove this.

- Jean Paul Baduel: There are elements that are essential elements, these are the after-effects that my client carries on his body. There are elements that are objective elements, these are photocopies of documents that were communicated to me by my client which show that during the years 1986, 1987, or even 1988, the police authorities who were in charge of the protection of minors, or even magistrates, were fully informed of the existence of a group called "Kripten" and the conduct of its members with regard to certain minors.

On February 26, 1997, the French-language newspaper "La Nouvelle Gazette" published an article on this case of satanic ritual abuse. The paper was entitled "The paedophile sect tortured children".

In the article, Samir's lawyer, Master Baduel, states that he had become a passive subject subject to the perversions of kripten's leaders (...) They were all subjected to abuse, some were even branded with a red iron, they were in fact satanic role-playing games with torture and rape (...) The meetings he will attend will no longer have anything to do with role-playing games, even for adults, but correspond to a ritual of sexual magic.

Samir remained under the influence of Kripten until 1994. An "addiction" maintained according to him through hypnotics and other brainwashing. The article also contains a interview with Samir, of which here are some excerpts: "I met someone from Kripten at theThrone Fair. We were a fifteen children, boys, all minors (...) We were forced to prostitute ourselves with adults, sometimes at ceremonies. It was like in a sect, the adults had black blades with a purple triangle. For years, the ceremonies took place in the basements of the Saint-Lazare train station. At first, it started with a little speech about extraterrestrials . There were generally as many adults as of children. And then there was some pretty sordid stuff with blood, and it always ended in sexual orgies. They said it was to "purify the soul." Some adults were masked. (...) I was taken twice to Belgium, to the charleroi and forchies-la-Marche regions. I remember a large white house with a large garden. The interior walls were lined with purple. There were several black masses which also ended with orgies. There were about twenty adults and about ten children. I remember the presence of swastikas and the rape of a little girl. I also know that children were not coming back... we were told that they had left for Uranus. "

In the book "The Child Sacrificed to Satan" we have the description of the course of a ceremony of the sect "Kripten Alliance". These are ritual abuses on children that take place in the heart of Paris, the author adds in note that it is one of the rituals of the Golden Dawn, a secret society that has already been mentioned in chapter 2:

"A few minutes later, all three descend into the basements of the station to reach the tai-chi-chuan room (...) Again, the scenery has changed. The walls are now stretched with black cloth, the neon lights are turned off and halogens illuminate the room indirectly. A huge purple triangle is drawn on the floor, and a kind of checkerboard has been laid in its center. On each side of the triangle, two species of columns of about two meters stand like obelisks. One is black and white, the other red and green. At the back of the room, facing the entrance, on a kind of platform framed by four candelabras, two large red and gold armchairs seem to be waiting for a royal couple of operettas.

Five to six children are there, some visibly accompanied by their fathers or people close to them. A little boy of about six years old who refused to let go of his father's hand receives a monumental slap that sends him to the ground under the laughter of adults, visibly delighted by the spectacle of this half-stunned boy (...)

Samir can't believe his eyes! Adults are dressed in a singular way. Most wear large white saies, some are green and red. Others are all dressed in leather, which is the case of Ondathom, whom Samir has just seen pass in front of him. Others are shirtless but wear masks. They are about twenty in all to wear heterogeneous outfits. All are clumped near the small room adjoining the room. In this case, it seems to serve as a cloakroom, because the men and women all come out of it with a more or less bizarre outfit, even though they had entered it in city clothes. Ajouilark is there too, draped in a red saie. On his chest is drawn a huge purple triangle bordered in black and surmounted by a white cross. His face is masked, but Samir knows his eyes too well not to recognize him. Ajouilark grabs Steelarow and points him to a big metal cut. With this chalice, the young man makes the rounds of the participants, so that everyone drops a large bundle of tickets. Samir has never seen so much money (...)

A mass music sounds and the 'Emperor", followed by the commander, heads towards the stage. Meanwhile, Steerlarow gets busy and prepares on silver platters outlines of what Samir later learns to be cocaine. Ondathom grabs Samir's arm to guide him, along with the winning women and the other children, in front of the stage, where they all line up. The adults are distributed, with a kind of squeaky good mood, on the sides of the triangle, facing the columns and the platform. Prohne, who for a moment had been away, returns with his dog and attaches it to the handle of the exit door. While the trays pass through the audience, Ondathom and the Chinese unceremoniously undress the children. Some sob, others protect their faces as if they expected to be beaten from one moment to the next. Once everything seems in order, the Chinese will place himself to the right of the stage and Ondathom to his left. The conversations are going well: a man who wears a red mask declares himself sensitive to Samir's buttocks, a woman dressed in a white saie has dislodged only for the winner of Steerlarow (...)

"Let us salute the triangle symbol of our order, let us salute the swastika, eternal sun that regenerates our souls, let us salute the secret forces that, in the night, walk by our side."

"All shout ''Ave!'' as they lift their arms. Ondathom and the Chinese made the children kneel (...) During the Emperor's speech, Ondathom, with a copper ciboire in his hand, made the children drink a sip of a bitter red liquid. Everyone then quickly feels the same way. Their heads are spinning. They do not sink into unconsciousness, but they are caught, suddenly, in a kind of fog. Adults see the effects of the drug because children come on one side (...) Samir hardly hears the emperor's words anymore, he feels like he's falling, being caught in a whirlwind. Everything turns, the faces mix, and it is hardly if he hears the commander declaim:

''The bodies of these children are the bread we share. They cele our bonds and, through our sexuality finally freed from the yoke of the Judeo-Christian oppressors, we purifying ourselves, we are reintegrating the sacred plan of the celestial knights of the order of the Kripten Alliance. Sex and all the pleasures of our senses are the only law to satisfy. Serve your brethren, in the name of the prince our lord, and honor to Thule...''

The commander put his money where his mouth was and raised his saie, revealing an erect sex. He approaches a little girl of about twelve years old who has been sobbing since the beginning of the ceremony. The child barely resists Ajouilark when the latter forces him to receive him in his mouth. Already, men and women have moved aside to indulge in their enjoyment, others seize children... Samir feels palpated, turned upside down... then sinks into a kind of awake coma, a total insensitivity as if all this were not true, that his body was not his body, as if he were only an observer of this odious meeting... (editor's note: a dissociative state)

When Samir reopens his eyes, he does not recognize anything. Neither the bed, nor the bedroom, nor the strange paintings that decorate the walls. He gets up to look at the window, but neither the garden nor the nearby houses he can see are more familiar to him. Sounds of dishes reach him from the next room, and a smell of coffee soon tickles his nostrils. Samir is hungry and he suddenly realizes that he is naked. He looks for his clothes. They are there, in a pile, on a chair. While donning his clothes, Samir feels the pains of his body awaken. His belly hurts him, his sex too, his head turns... With pants on his knees, he is forced to sit down. The door then opens to a round man of about fifty years who smiles at him:

- Well my little one, it's not okay?''

Samir does not answer.

- Last night, the ceremony knocked you out and the Emperor thought you would be better at home to spend the night... I confess to you that I let myself be.''

A smile passes over the lips of the man, still dressed in a red bathrobe, which remains a silent moment in front of the child curled up on himself[275]....

e/ Germany

In October 1998, the Australian Government granted refugee status with a protection visa to a German national, a survivor of ritual abuse, who had spent 15 years in a sect engaged in child pornography and child trafficking. The Australian Refugee Review Tribunal stated at the final hearing: "It is accepted that (...) thirdly, such groups exist in Germany, and the authorities have been largely ineffective in stopping their illegal activities." The decision, taken by the Australian Government, was to give this victim refugee status in need of protection, but there is no law to rule on such cases. This Australian court even declared that "the German government is reluctant or unable to protect the victims of ritual abuse[276].

- Antje, Nicki et Lucie

In 2003, a report by Liz Wieskerstrauch entitled "Living Hell - The Fight of the Victims: Ritual Abuse in Germany" (Hollenleben - Der Kampf der Opfer: Ritualize Missbrauch in Deutschland) was broadcast by the German channel NDR Fernsehen. The documentary gives voice to several survivors of ritual abuse. Once again, the testimonies overlap and describe the horrors that are also systematically filmed by cameras. Most of the women who testify in this documentary suffer from a dissociative identity disorder. Here are some excerpts in transcription:

- Voiceover: Black masses in churches, rituals in cemeteries. Torture and murder of newborns... These are the memories of Antje who spent his childhood in a Satanist environment. It has remained silent until now because of the atrocities. Today she wants to speak out and file a complaint against the guilty parties. In his case and in many others, strangers were hidden behind masks, but his own parents also participated in the rituals.

- Antje: My mother is still alive, she was the "powerful", the Satanist (editor's note: priestess?). My father was the "messenger", the driver, the deliveryman, the carrier. My father died in 1979 and the police did not know whether it was murder or suicide. No autopsy was performed and I suspect he was murdered by my mother.

- Reporter: Did you confide in anyone?

- A : No.

- J: Why is that?

- A: I was afraid of dying. Under torture, I was "programmed" several times than if I talked about what was happening. I was going to die.

- Nicki: I was made to lie down on a table, then I was stung with needles, sometimes very deep under my nails. I felt this intense pain to the point that I thought I was going to die. At that moment, a new personality is created to take over in the face of this insurmountable pain and terror.
- Reporter: When did the abuse start?

- N: We don't remember exactly when it started, it started very early.

- Voiceover: Nicki uses the term "we" because she has a multiple personality, a diagnosis that is still controversial. As she explains, in order to be able to endure these atrocious pains, she divided into different personalities. His memories are so divided that making a connection between the atrocities and the place where it happened is very difficult. This poses a problem to provide evidence (...) Later, Nicki had the courage to file a complaint. Since then other victims have also testified, some openly, others anonymously for fear of criminals (...) Antje also filed a complaint. Like Nicki, she has a multiple personality, which complicates the details of the executioners' locations, dates, and identities. However, the prosecutor takes these testimonies seriously. To ensure that the rest of the investigation is not compromised by the authorities, his lawyer will testify anonymously in our documentary.

- Antje's lawyer: When we are dealing with a person suffering from a psychic problem such as a multiple personality (editor's note: dissociative identity disorder), then questions arise: what is fanciful, what belongs to such "identity" or personality? Does it all stick together, is it consistent? The problem is that, legally, these people are less credible than someone who has no personality disorder.

- Voiceover: In this report, there are also women who testify to satanic rituals but who do not have multiple personalities. They too are pushed by Nicki to file a complaint, but many do not dare to break the code of silence, or else they remain anonymous. They also say that they have been indoctrinated by their families to perpetuate rituals from generation to generation. In this way, each victim also becomes an accomplice... For Annegret, this is one more reason not to go to the police.

- Annegret: The problem. it's not that simple. First, we know how difficult it is to find figures, data or evidence. Secondly, we have a child, and if we start talking about these things, we are afraid that we will be taken away from our custody...

- Voiceover: The meaning of occult symbols and the practice of Satanism is uncharted territory for police and prosecutors.

- Ingolf Christiansen (German specialist on the question of occultism and Satanism, giving a lecture): At the beginning, in the first degrees, I submit to the discipline "Arcanum", "Arcanum" is a Latin name meaning "the secret". This discipline of arcane does not tolerate in any case that the organization of the group is disclosed to an external person who has not been initiated. Failure to respect this discipline results in martial punishment (editor's note: killing). More commonly, they say: if you talk to someone in any way, they will make you pay. and people believe in it.

- Voiceover: Satanic holidays, teachings, symbols. Victims will never forget them, often without really understanding them. For them, these are signs of excruciating pain, as for Lucie, who expresses herself here with an alter personality of a small child.

- Lucie (sitting on the ground in a suit): They always had strange signs, sometimes drawn on our bodies. It was like that, I think. (making the gestures on the ground with his finger).

- Reporter: Three times the number six?

- L: I don't know but it was drawn in a circle...

- J: Three times the number six intertwined. Were there other signs?

- L: Yes, stars... I do not like stars (drawing a pentagram with his finger).

- J: What does the initiation ritual mean?

- L: Let them be us. that they us. let them teach us, they teach us. which is important to live. For example, to rejoice when you hurt someone. because it's better that way, for everyone. For example, they connected us to electric current. They locked us in a cage. Then they would let dogs go on the cage. It is done to make us obedient.

- Ingolf Christiansen: At first, it's not about worshipping Satan, the devil or Lucifer, but it's a way to feel powerful. Man wants to become God, and from there, according to the vision of satanists or occult ideology, it is a question of sourcing energy and power, and this is available in large quantities through the consumption of blood. Because blood is life and if this blood is consumed, it supplies this energy, this power. (...)

- Voiceover: Annette filed a complaint in Hamburg, against her parents, but also against herself. for he was forced to kill. She was not diagnosed with a multiple personality but she nevertheless explains that she led a double life. A quiet life in the house of a pastor in Bielefeld parallel to a violent and destructive life in a sect.

- Annette: My parents took me there when I was 4 years old. My earliest memories go back to the time I was led to kill a cat at the same age. Little by little I was more active in this group, I had to look at how other people raped children. Once I saw my parents and my brother. He was 11 or 12 years old, I was 2 years younger than him. I saw him while he was being raped, and then right after. he was like a lifeless body, moaning on the ground barely moving... It was just a body that was near me. I swired at the time that they would not be able to do such a thing to me.

- Reporter: What happened to your brother?

- A: My brother committed suicide 3 years ago. He shot himself...

- Voiceover: Antje is also looking for leads, witnesses, evidence. She is sure that behind these masked criminals, there were also her parents. She has a witness, Sandra, her sister who is 4 years younger than her. They have not seen each other for more than 10 years. They broke off contact as they did with their mother. the past being too painful. Both sisters were sold to pedophiles.

- Antje (showing a photo of her as a child): This photo is typically intended to circulate in paedophile networks. We are there positioned on all fours, on my right hand, we clearly see a gold ring, which means that I am available for everything, helpful and obedient. That I would do whatever I am asked to do.

- Voiceover: We looked for Antje's sister and found her, but she will remain anonymous. Sandra does not have a multiple personality like her older sister. She offers to help in the search for clues and evidence but also to make a statement to the police. The two women therefore testified separately and without having spoken to each other beforehand, they described in detail the same rituals. But they still don't want to see each other again.

- Reporter: Did they believe in Satan?

- Sandra: For the mother yes. She believes in this power of darkness, she thinks it gives her the power to be someone she is not. to no longer be a victim. Having the feeling of being powerful, yes, she. yes!

- Antje's lawyer: Concrete facts are similar and partially complete.

- Reporter: Does this authenticate this case?

- Lawyer: Yes, absolutely! It is well known that a story of this kind told by a single person seems implausible. When they are told by a single individual, these stories are rather considered fanciful, whereas if someone else comes to confirm and thus validate the testimony, if possible independently, then it is different.

- Voiceover: Antje particularly remembers one night when she was 9 years old. It had to be a night with a very special ritual...

- Antje: That night, it happened in a church, I'm quite sure. I have reviewed my initiation, if it can be called that. I had to receive and channel certain satanic powers. We went to the cemetery, the church was nearby. a vault was opened. the coffin as well. Inside there was a man who died recently. Everything had been cleaned and I had to enter this grave to take away his heart. The high priest took this cup, and the other members of the lodge followed him into the church. At the foot of the steps there was the symbol of the lodge, I do not know if it was drawn or just placed there. I had to lie down on the altar. Things were drawn on my body. There has been sexual abuse. At the end of the evening. I had a new status within the lodge and I suddenly became an important person.

- Sandra: They prepared and conditioned her to become a bad person. They had really managed to instil in him a sense of power and above all to make this power please him.

- Antje: I was taught the use of ritual practices. For example, the sacrifice of a child, or the privilege of being next to the high priest when a person was lying on the altar.

- Sandra: Antje had really developed this feeling of power, so she got closer and closer to the cult where she rose the ranks... This was a recognition for her, because otherwise she was nothing at all... This is how they do the initiations, systematically.

- Voiceover: Almost all the victims testify that during these rituals, films and photos "immortalize" the scenes: child pornography. It is therefore also a question of money and well-organised criminal networks. Without evidence, Lucie cannot file a complaint. She has a multiple personality. who would believe it? Today she is looking for evidence in images on the internet (...) Women from the time of the GDR also reported this kind of ritual abuse, Lucie is one of them. She searches for the places of her childhood, she searches her memories, she finds evidence.

- Lucie: At the time I didn't realize it because I didn't know anything else. Today I realize that my family had a very high standard of living. We had VCRs, several cars (.)

There are 3 rooms, these rooms have no windows, they were cold, we think they were cellars (editor's note: the "we" corresponding to the different alter personalities). The soil was uneven, dusty and dirty. The walls were also in poor condition, there were lamps on these walls. There was a room where we were waiting and another room where it was happening. We also remember another room, rather a kind of large hall with sorts of steel beams. I don't know exactly, we just know that these are steel beams. and that this hall was not very clean...

- Reporter: What happened in this hall?

- L: It's part of our memories, there was a fire in the middle, there were men, black men, so to speak. And then we saw someone who was brought in the direction of the fire, there was fear...

- J: Do you know how you got there?

- L: We got there by a carrier. There too there were no windows. Yes we got there by a carrier. Sometimes there were other children, but we never talked to each other. In those situations, that is not done.

- Voiceover: Underground rooms with a large hall. Looking for them is like looking for a needle in a haystack. The neighbors, the teachers and the inhabitants of the village cannot be questioned, Lucie's parents would suspect something and the risk for her and her sisters is too great (...) Another possible place of child murder: Wewelsburg Castle. But for the police and the prosecutor of Paderborn, the facts go back too long (...) Karine, who also has a multiple personality, testified to ritual abuses practiced within the castle of Wewelsburg...

- Karine: I didn't know that there was a castle with that name but I recognized the ornaments of this room. with the columns. This is the castle that often came back in children's nightmares. I often reproduced these ornaments in drawings when I was little. In the crypt, first there is this swastika on the ceiling. I remember that in this crypt there is a fireplace in the middle to make a fire. There is a kind of stone or altar, and it is on this altar that a child was sacrificed.

This child was mine, he was sacrificed at the age of 6 months.

The documentary Schwarze Sonne (The Black Sun of the Nazis), released in 1998, looks back at the history of this Castle in Wewelsburg. A castle that the Nazis completely restored to establish a place of worship and formation of the S.S. during the Third Reich. Here is the description that is made of the crypt cited in Karine's testimony:

''Just below the room of the ''Obergruppenführer'', is what has been called ''the crypt''. A vaulted room in the shape of a vault where it was planned to celebrate religious holidays. The atmosphere is reminiscent of these rites of destruction of the individual personality, of this second state in which man becomes an empty receptacle where edifying feelings are poured into drunkenness... Clandestine groups from the current extreme right also feel attracted to this room. At night, they sometimes even break into it to hold mystical rituals."

The director of the Wewelsburg Museum, Wulff E. Brebeck, says in this documentary: "On Christmas Eve, in 1992, we found the door broken. On the 12 podiums were white sheets decorated with runes. Of course, we never knew who did this, but we know from our contacts with a few visitors or groups of visitors that the tower is willingly considered a place where black masses or ceremonies of the same kind are held. And we are constantly trying to bribe our doormen, to get the key or to enter this Room at unusual times under all sorts of pretexts. We must take very strict protective measures to prevent this kind of thing. Once, we received a written confession from a group that they had been able to organize a baptism, a black baptism, an admission in their order. and they thanked us.''

- Claudia Fliss

The German psychotherapist Claudia Fliss specializes in trauma caused by ritual abuse. It has helped many victims over the last twenty years and has thus been able to examine many cases. In the documentary "Sexzwang" (forced sex), by the controversial Ivo Sasek, she states:

- The forms of violence are: physical violence, sexual violence, psychological violence, threats, extortion, the law of silence, the sacrifice of animals and humans in the context of rituals, the murder of infants, children and women. Sometimes it is a person who is killed, sometimes it is several people (...) Murders are always described in a similar way, there are different ways, but the testimonies systematically overlap. It always has something to do with blood, it has to do with a murderous frenzy, a drunkenness of power, it has to do with cannibalism: drinking blood and eating human flesh (...) These are cults that have existed for generations, they recruit their members from their own ranks, children are born in them. From their earliest childhood they are accustomed to these rituals, they will be trained daily to become fit for these things. It's brutal, but that's exactly how it happens.

- Have you heard of similar cases in Germany where people are killed by a satanic cult?

- Yes, that's what people almost always report. I lived and worked in different parts of Germany and I had people in therapy who did not know each other but who testified to exactly the same things. I know from colleagues working all over the country that there are victims, who do not know each other, but who report similar things. We then realize that it is something structured.

- Gaby Breitenbach

Also in Germany, the psychotherapist Gaby Breitenbach created in early 2014 a secure place to welcome and help victims of ritual abuse and mind control. The centre is called "Vielseits" and it is a first of its kind in Europe. All the women who arrive at this centre have undergone mental control. These women suffer from severe dissociative disorders and traumatic amnesia. Gaby Breitenbach was interviewed by journalist Antonia Oettingen, here are some excerpts from this interview:

"From an external point of view, these are women who apparently seem to be be behaving normally and a life that seems to be just as normal. Their daily personality is not aware of the abuses to which they are subjected at night, on weekends or during holiday periods. These traumatic experiences are compartmentalized in the different parts of the personality, so that these memories are kept away from consciousness. The person is therefore not aware of the abuses and traumas experienced (...) Victims are subjected at an early age to situations of imminent death, by electric shocks, mock drowning, all kinds of torture during which their executioners pose as "saviours". At a certain point, the psyche of the victim will act in an automatic way: it will split, this for the purpose of survival. The consequences of this systematic torture mean that victims can develop different identities. The criminals who practice these abuses hold the key to this internal system composed of a fragmented personality. They therefore have the ability to induce particular behaviors by using triggers. This can be hand signals, smells or sounds like a particular ringtone (...) Young victims of ritual abuse are most often used for paedocriminal prostitution and trained to take part in the sadistic abuse of children themselves, which is filmed and photographed. These women will be prostitutes for a large part of their lives, they can also be used for sadistic violence and sometimes for espionage. Many of the alter personalities set up by trauma do not feel pain[277].

f/ England

In the 1989 documentary Devil Worship: The Rise of Satanism, politician and member of parliament David Wilshire states:

"Satanism is present in this country just as it is present elsewhere. It is something terribly violent, it is child abuse, it is sexual abuse. This is not a joke, it must be taken very seriously, it is a problem that must be dealt with. What is most tragic about this story is the children who talk about it and to whom we say, 'Don't be stupid, this doesn't happen in our country', or: 'You make up stories, you lie'.'

In 1989, psychiatrist Joan Coleman with the help of other doctors founded the association RAINS (Ritual Abuse Information Network & Support). She also directed the Clinic for Dissociative Studies in London. The RAINS association helps victims of ritual abuse, it also publishes studies on trauma and its consequences. In the book ''Forensic Aspects of Dissociative Identity Disorder'', Joan Coleman looks back at the case of several victims of ritual abuse she met, she reports in particular the testimonies of 'Margaret', 'Theresa' and 'Monica' (pseudonyms).

- Margaret

In 1986, Joan Coleman had been working in a psychiatric hospital for 17 years. She worked with people who had mental disorders with physical repercussions. Margaret was one of his patients, she was a woman in her forties who had been returning frequently for 4 years to make hospital stays. Coleman was worried about her health problems, she suffered from asthma as well as an ulcer and severe migraines. This was obviously related to his psychological disorders, but Coleman could not identify the cause of the problem. Margaret had a lot of visits and according to her there were no family problems. She was prescribed medication, especially when she was out on-weekends. Inevitably, one day there was an overdose accident and she was rushed back to the hospital. Shortly after this incident, she began confiding in a nurse,Eileen, about a family friend she apparently did not like at all. It was from that moment that the floodgates opened for disclosure...

Initially, she talked about what appeared to be a vast paedophile network: she described sadistic sexual abuse of children by men. According to her, some of these people were family members or acquaintances, but also well-known politicians and media figures. During this first period of disclosure, his physical symptoms have improved remarkably. She stopped vomiting and had almost no asthma or migraines. She then stopped the treatment and she seemed ready to keep talking... Coleman and the nurse then decided to contact the police, whether the statements were true or not. However, as the names of the alleged assailants are not on the police files, there has been no investigation.

remarkably attenuated. She stopped vomiting and had almost no asthma or migraines. She then stopped the treatment and she seemed ready to keep talking... Coleman and the nurse then decided to contact the police, whether the statements were true or not. However, as the names of the alleged assailants are not on the police files, there has been no investigation.

In the summer of 1987, Margaret learned that she had a terminal illness. She then wanted to go home while retracting all the revelations she had made about ritual abuse. After only a few weeks, she was back in the hospital after being found wandering on the road, totally drugged. It was then that she was committed to another section of the hospital where she must have felt safer as she began to speak and detail her first statements. She gave details of runaway children who were met at London's central station and were taken back to a hotel. There they were forcibly drugged so much so that they quickly became addicted, the aim being to abuse them sexually. Margaret then described a house where some of these children were taken to be drugged and raped as well. She explained that although she refused, she was forced to look at the abuses and was photographed at the same time to keep silent. After being raped or beaten by several men, some of these children were brought back to "the hotel", others were killed... She says that murders were always done with knives. The bodies were then dismembered and put in plastic bags to be taken to what she describes as a factory, a place where they are cremated. The murders are filmed and the recordings resold at a price of gold.

Margaret described the same pattern each time, saying that "it seemed to be a kind of ritual. She reported that the executioners wore dresses and masks. She spoke of a little Vietnamese girl who was bound on an altar and on an inverted cross. It was following these revelations that Joan Coleman began researching Satanism and ritual abuse. Margaret would later confess that her family was Satanist from generation to generation, and she never again recanted once about her testimony. Her mental state had greatly improved after she confided in herself.

Joan Coleman and her colleagues again contacted the police following the testimony of child murders, this time providing them with names, addresses with details about the alleged executioners and children, also providing the address of the "factory". But all this has led to nothing... The police then appointed a psychiatrist to speak with Margaret: the conclusion of this "expert" was to say that it was the psychiatrist, Joan Coleman, who had invented the whole story. Margaret, however, disclosed much about ritual activities, with the description of ceremonies, places, but also about the hierarchy of worship. She made a very clear distinction between the purely sadistic murders of children in London and ritual sacrifices, that is, religious ceremonies in which both men and women participated. Sacrifices were always made by the high priest on certain calendar dates. Margaret described the methods of mind control used by the sect, she described how children are drugged and hypnotized to believe in the magic of Satan. On certain ceremonial dates, Maragret was still barricading himself in his room...

Joan Coleman and Nurse Eileen saw Margaret just before her death, she assured them that everything she had said about ritual abuse was true and that she wanted everyone to know.

- Theresa

In 1989, as part of her work, Joan Coleman met a 15-year-old girl who claimed to have been abused by family members from whom she had just escaped for a year. Theresa described sectarian activities whose protocols were almost identical to what Margaret had described. She gave many details about a kind of castle to which she and other children were brought regularly. Before going there they were drugged, so she had no idea where exactly this place was. According to her, this place was run by a doctor because part of the house was used for experimental operations. In another part there were young children imprisoned in cages, they came out only for sexual abuse and torture, for experiments and finally for sacrifice.

In this case, the police mobilized and arrested five men for rape of minors and a woman for complicity and clandestine abortion. Although Theresa testified before the police, there was no valid evidence to prove the ritual activities, so this was not retained in the charges. Shortly before the trial, the police went to Theresa's school to obtain the recordings of her presence, the principal of the school then handed them notes and drawings produced by Theresa a few months earlier: one of the drawings represented the ritual sacrifice of a tramp. Theresa had put together a complete file on what she had experienced, but despite this the satanic ritual abuses were not retained for lack of evidence.

- Monica

In the late '90s, Joan Coleman received a phone call from a nurse asking her for an opinion on one of her patients. It was a 37-year-old woman named Monica, she was initially being treated for bulimia but she started talking about ritual abuse dating back to her early childhood. Joan Coleman began to meet regularly with this patient. At first, Monica was terrified of talking about the cult, but after a few weeks she began to give details about her memoirs, which made her relive the trauma when they resurfaced. She then described her traumatic memories with a child's voice, behavior and mimicry. This "child" declared that "they" had different names and different ages, sometimes she wrote with a handwriting of a 5-year-old child. Other times, she seemed totally different and even became hostile to Joan Coleman and the nurse. Little by little it was discovered that some of his personalities had remained loyal to the sect. While Monica thought she hadn't been involved in rituals since she was 15, some of her alter personalities had never stopped these activities and they had no intention of stopping... These alter personalities regularly went to the ceremonies, without the personality "Monica" having any awareness.

It was with Monica's case that Joan Coleman was first confronted with dissociative identity disorder (IDD). She learned a lot with this patient, both in terms of satanic ritual abuse and in terms of the functioning of a multiple personality system, more particularly on how to work with alter personalities who are still faithful to worship. As the amnesic barriers faded, Monica became more and more aware of her involvement in occult and sectarian activities, as well as her awareness of her other personalities. She gave names and places where the ceremonies were held. While Joan Coleman had never told her about other survivors of ritual abuse, some of the information she gave matched not only margaret's, but also details of other cases. She spoke of a "high priest" by giving her name of worship but also by giving her real name. Coleman had already heard of him, he was an important man at the national level.

One of his alter personalities was a 10-year-old girl named ''Scumbag'' (indecent translation). The alter had been created when her mother prostituted her in a back room of a pub. The money collected was intended for satanic worship. Scumbag was a heavy beer drinker, while Monica did not drink alcohol. Monica was a brave woman, she testified in a radio show in 1996, and for that she was punished... it was certainly this that led him to death shortly afterwards[278].

Joan Coleman's association, RAINS, had set up a telephone line that received many calls from therapists seeking help and advice. Their patients were talking about exactly the same satanic ritual activities. In 2014, RAINS established a list of people involved in ritual abuse in England. The list, which gives both names and places of worship, was drawn up on the basis of the testimony of a victim, but also thanks to a member of the network who decided to speak. This blacklist includes politicians, actors, journalists, police officers, doctors, entrepreneurs and churchmen. We will return in particular to the case of the "star" Jimmy Savile in the chapter on the entertainment industry.

g/ Belgium

- Case X (Dutroux case)

In Belgium, at the time of the Dutroux case, file X was filled with testimonies related to ritual abuse. It is also the X file that led to the Belgian elitist network... It is for this reason that it was quickly closed, Marc Dutroux then remained the "isolated predator" and the media all shouted in heart that the paedocriminal networks: "It does not exist!"

Judge Jean-Marc Connerotte had however conducted the investigation well, so well that the file was withdrawn when it finally ended up with the trail of a very embarrassing network with testimonies of satanic ritual abuses related to the Belgian gratin... It was then Judge Jacques Langlois who was appointed to take over the file, not appearing to be interested in these X witnesses talking about ritual abuse or in the 30 or so witnesses who died in this case... It is also he who will not deem it necessary to have the 6,000 hairs/hairs found in Marc Dutroux's cellar analyzed. In addition, it should be stressed that the Belgian authorities considered that the analysis of all these DNA traces would be too expensive... This is how the second file of the Dutroux case could be closed so easily. Former Belgian MP Laurent Louis said on his blog: "How can we accept that the BIS Dutroux file could have been closed without further action when there were thousands of genetic traces found in Marcinelle's cache to analyze. Can we accept that the argument used was the cost of these analyses when every year we spend insane amounts of money to ensure the lifestyle of our Ministers and the royal family? Aren't the search for the truth and the criminalisation of paedophiles and child killers worth all the money in the world?"

At the time, however, witnesses X clearly described satanic ritual abuses with the murder of children. In April 2009, the Wikileaks website posted a 1235-page PDF document containing the hearings and minutes of the Dutroux case! [279]], the document contains testimonies describing extreme practices such as hunting with children as game! These are alleged facts because, of course, no proper investigation has ever been carried out to verify the statements. Here are some excerpts from the document:

Facts committed in Chimay: She went 5 or 6 times to a huge wood for hunts. She was forced to go there (...) Participated the most violent of the knokke gang whose brothers L.A Chimay she heard screaming and shooting but she does not know what, she has never seen game (...) It was around the castle of Chimay - description of the castle she already knew before. The wood is walled. It was screams from children of maybe 10 years old. She thinks there were 4 or 5 children. The screams stop sharply. She stayed with L. and at that moment the brothers L. left with 1 or 2 other people including the "gamekeeper". The participants were all from Knokke and Eindhoven (...) The cries were horrible and indescribable (...) Initially the screams were not loud, rather cries of pain then much louder screams for a few seconds and stop sharply. In Faulx, there were also screams but they did not stop. She has never seen an entire girl come back from L.L.'s. When the screams stopped L. Stopped him to silence love' and very quickly returned to the car with her.

PV 151.150 - Hearing of witness X2 - 03/04/97 (page 1066):

A hunting party in the south of the country with people on horseback - many were armed - During the hunt there is rape on X2 - She goes there with C. in Ranch or Land Rover or Cherokkee (...)
The riders arrived on horseback, we shoot but she does not know what, she did not see any game or dog. One of the riders came up to her, got off the horse and raped her. The same also raped Eva. The hunt takes place around 17.00 hours. She was also raped by a smaller one. Violence but less than in Eindhoven (blows to the face and strangulation). We strangle X2 because she screams. Eva was only hit in the face and stomach. There was another minor under the age of 15 (blonde) but she does not know if she was raped - she was with a woman.

PV 116. 022 - Hearing of witness XI - 31/10/96 (page 411) :

Murder of children in the Ardennes and Luxenbourg in hunting parties. Thatched villa. (...)

Specifies that she was taken away one day by a person who came to pick her up: a man she did not know well - she associates him with serious things: ritual. (30 years old, glasses, short curly brown hair, whiskers). He was driving in a black BMW (...) XI describes the interior of the building (aerial photo, tiles, dark brown carpet in the office...). Present, the person who brought him, Tony, the old man of the 'deascoop', and 2 other men. XI has to undress and is brought to a room. Presence of a certain pierrot the lighting designer + camera (...) The man who brought her enters with a little girl of 2 or 3 years old (blonde with straight hair). In front of XI the man in the BMW plays with the child then pulls out a knife and pushes it between the legs of the screaming child. The man in the BMW finishes the child. XI is then raped by him, Tony, and the others.

XI was 12 years old and it was the first time she had witnessed such events. She had never seen the child before.

Castle of Ameroix. Letter from a retired Gd (M.)In early April 96 he hosted a Mexican priest. A Dutch friend of the priest came to pick him upThe Dutchman cited the castle of Ameroix as a place where satanic and pedophile type parties take place with sacrifice of children. The information was given to him by an American from NATO who returned to the USA. This American participated in an evening and was disgusted (...) Perhaps to put in relation with the hunting parts described by the witness X1.

XI says he went 15 or 20 times to antwerpen castle between 1990-95. She witnessed 6 or 7 murders of children including Katrien De Cuyper. Description of the people who brought the children in a van (white - rusty - diesel). She can make robot portraits. The men drop off the children and leave (...) XI confirms that this is the castle seen in Gravenwezel. XI doesn't know what was done with the corpses - Tony may have been taking care of it. He always brought her to the place and brought her back only when there had been no death (...)

PV 118.452 - Hearing of witness XI - 10/12/96 (page 542)

Mr. Was killed in November 1984 in Knokke in the villa of XI's grandmother. First party: B. Brought an 8-year-old boy. Owner of the villa = man of more or less 40 years and his wife around 20 years. Description of the villa. XI killed two rabbits and a dwarf goat on the orders of B.. The partouze took place in the garage. Two dobermans and a German shepherd participated in the partouze. Description of the garage: sealed rings in the wall, walled cabinet with sado-maso equipment and cassettes of paedophilia. Participants with special costumes: leather, capes, masks. C. Was raped by T., N., B. and the owner. C. She must eat the heart of the sacrificed rabbit. Children attached to the rings in the garage. The blood of the goat is shed on C.

(Royal family component)

Support in pink American car with white roof driven by Charly. Always luxurious houses (...) On the spot the car stopped on a lawn in front of the house surrounded by a park. Two supervisors on site: Ralf and Walter. The children were brought into a natural stone turret with wooden door. There was probably a floor to the turret. An underground started from the turret to cellars. Underground without light - earthen and sloping. In the cellars there were cells where the children were locked up waiting for their turn. There were also cells for dogs (dobermans). The corridor overlooked a performance hall. In the turret: bodies of children who died at various stages of decomposition (sometimes dismembered and/or missing pieces) and dog carcasses. Spectators: always the same but difficult to identify - about fifty. She recognized C., B. and .A. and two others whom she calls Charly and Polo. She thinks she recognized W.C. and Doctor V.E.. The Dogs were drugged to be excited. Shows = orgies, killing of children and dogs. Performance hall with strong smell of dog feces. Dogs in freedom in the garden. Gilles (12 years old) was emasculated by POLO. The other children had to drink his blood. She thinks she saw him cut out of the room for the dead. Slashed girls with razor blades (...) Hunt prepared by Charly and Polo.

In another location:

Large white house with floor and stables. Park with round basin and fountain coming out of a statue. The children were let go naked and when they were caught, they were raped. The hunt ended with torture in the theatre (...) (unsustainable details)

PV 466 - Hearing of * - 16/01/97 (page 260)

He is very scared. He was treasurer of the Young PSC. He frequented M.D., P.S. and J.P.D. extensively. They tried to direct him to OPUS DEI which was the 'ultimate' according to them. Under the pretext of tests of initiation to opus DEI, he was brought to Black Masses with sexual acts. It mentions the presence of young girls from eastern countries (13-14 years old). In 1986, after a well-watered political meeting, he went with S. and D. to a meeting that they announced spiced up. On the spot he was drugged before being brought to a room with people masked and dressed in black 'djellabas'. Participants drank blood. He was put in the presence of a lying on an altar - she was dead (12 years old) He wanted to leave but was drugged again. He woke up the next day in his car. He left the party and made a statement to the BSR of Charleroi (...)

PV 114.039 - Hearing of witness XI - 13/01/96 (page 407)

In the house we spoke French, English, German and Dutch (...) Evening with atmosphere comparable to the New Year's party. After an hour or two, when everyone was present, went down to the cellar where the children were waiting. Description of the room: (...) A wardrobe with sado-maso objects (...) Generally from 2 to 5 children for about 10 people including couples (...) Violence against children: tied to the neck, cut with knives (...) Several children raped by V.. Photos taken (films?). A girl was cut from the vagina, a doctor who was involved in the partouze sewed her up. No more violence during school holidays. Use of drugs and medicines during the partouzes. Kill animals (rabbit, cat, chicken...) in order to make children suffer.

Sect - Orgies - Ballets roses in Holland.

Letter addressed to the Dutch Justice concerning sects in this country.

There is in HOLLAND a group of 300 people who form a sect. They organize partouzes with minors (3 years and older). Members = lawyers - lawyers - judges - police officers...

Meetings in country properties, hotels or at the home of one of the members (...) Assembly on the first Saturday after the full moon as well as on christian holiday dates or birthdays. Groups of 12 people with children. Rape and torture of children. Grand assemblies = 50 adults and 50 children - drugs, beverages, orgies, rapes, video recording of child abuse. The children of the members of the group participate in the parties. This leads to the creation of multiple personalities in children. At Christmas we simulate the sacrifice of a 1-year-old child who suffers abuse but who is replaced by a doll at the time of the real tortures. Mock burial of a 15-year-old child as punishment. We provoke multiple personalities for example by making small children believe that we introduce into them a cat that grows and becomes a panther who will watch them if they want to talk or leave the clan. These multiple personalities are maintained by psychotherapists. The multiple provoked personalities allow a continuous control even of adults by creating a certain balance. This makes all the perpetrators victims (...)

- The multiple personality of Régina Louf

In the document relating to the Dutroux case cited above, PV No. 116.231 dated November 1996 reports that XI (Régina Louf) speaks of her various personalities and the police note in her important differences in writing. Pv No. 116.232 reports that Régina Louf speaks of another personality named "Hoop" ("hope" in Flemish) who can "disappear very deeply and reappear in one go." In PV N°116.234, it is noted about Régina Louf: "She finds herself whole and understands the why of her multiple personalities. She understands that only one person could not have put up with it."

In case X of the Dutroux case, it is the testimony of Régina Louf (witness XI) that is the most complete and the best known. Since his birth, his family has conditioned him to serve as a sex slave. She herself states that it was a practice passed down from generation to generation, that her grandmother had abused her mother and so on... The abuse and extreme violence she has suffered since early childhood in this network have ended up creating in her a multiple personality, a dissociative identity disorder. This disorder was diagnosed by five therapists appointed by the Belgian justice during the study of file X of the Dutroux case.

Here is an extract from the book "Les dossiers X: Ce que la Belgique ne devait pas savoir sur l'affaire Dutroux" which clearly addresses the question of the multiple personality of the witness X1, Régina Louf:

"One of the few decisions taken during an Obelix meeting on April 25 is to hire a panel of five psychiatric experts to examine XI. The request had been made a few months earlier by Warrant Officer De Baets, but since magistrates from all over the country had been dealing with the case, everything had been proceeding a little more slowly. Each of the five experts has its own specialization. And everyone must evaluate XI and his testimony of his professional angle. The college is headed by Professor Paul Igodt, a Louvanist neuropsychiatrist, and composed for the rest of his colleagues Peter Adriaenssens and Herman Vertommen, Johan Vanderlinden, a doctor at the Kortenberg Psychiatric Hospital, and the psychiatrist Rudy Verelst. Because of his specialization, the child psychiatrist Peter Adriaenssens has a special mission to examine the children of XI, but this will never happen.

The college of experts must check XI's memory capacity and examine whether there was any question of suggestiveness on the part of the investigators during the hearings. What is thus literally written in judge Van Espen's apostille shows that he has already been briefed, at the end of April, on the rereadings that began in secret under the leadership of Commander Duterme. Until then, no one has ever commented on the conduct of the hearings, which are instead described as 'exemplary'. Only Duterme and some of his followers do not share this opinion. "I clearly felt it," says Regina Louf, "the psychiatrists knew very quickly that their work would not change anything. They started around the time de Baets was sidelined. In total, I spent more than thirty hours talking and undergoing psychological tests. Sometimes it was really ridiculous testing, but these people were trying to do their job honestly. I think they ended up in the crossfire. They were in contact with the investigators who certainly told them that I was crazy to bind. When they talked to me, there was always an atmosphere like this: we think you are fine, but we are told that... During the last interview, Vertommen advised me not to agree to be auditioned under hypnosis. He told me to think about my family and resign myself to the fact that there was not much that could be done with my testimony."

When seeking the advice of scientists, it is rare for the answer to be black or white, and most often it is gray with many changing shades. This is also the case with the eight-page report that Professor Igodt sent to Van Espen on 8 October 1997. This report indicates - just as XI did from day one - that we are dealing with a person suffering from dissociative identity disorders. Igodt even speaks, in his report, of a "borderline personality disorder". But, he adds: "Thanks to many years of therapy, the woman has nevertheless succeeded (...) to achieve an integrated mode of operation; her various personalities (alter), some of whom she can name, collaborate quite well and the woman manages to control each of these partial personalities, so that the loss of control occurs only rarely and in a limited way. A situation that could also be noticed during the anamnestic psychiatric clinical examination: apart from somewhat uncontrolled laughter, especially when it comes to the most horrible sexual abuse, the patient controls herself quite well and no dissociative changes could be observed. As already mentioned, this must be attributed in large part to the rather long period of psychotherapy that she has already completed."

With regard to the causes of these disorders, Igodt formally pleads in favour of XI: "The anamnestic psychiatric clinical examination confirms, however, the suspicion of massive sexual abuse in the past of the woman concerned. To the question of whether these abuses have occurred and have indeed been significant in intensity, it seems that the answer must be in the affirmative. These massive abuses seem to be the main etiological factor in the psychiatric syndromes observed, which is in line with the abundant results of examinations in this area."

The Igodt report can undoubtedly be regarded as one of the few objective elements of investigation which are still on the file after the summer of 1997. Igodt draws attention to the dangers of "contamination" with regard to XI's memory - "without there being any question of intentional lies" - because of her therapy, her attention to her own situation, as well as her obvious motivation to fight against sexual abuse of children. Igodt explains that the credibility of a person's memories of their youth can be measured by how they are told. If the narrative takes the form of a "fluid story" from which doubt is absent, there is a good chance that this story will be invented or "reconstituted". The more muddled the testimony seems, the more authentic it will be, he believes. Because a testimony about things you experienced during your childhood must almost sound like it were told by a child! [280]]."

In a France 3 documentary entitled "Passed in silence: Witness XI - Régina Louf' broadcast in 2002, psychiatrist Paul Igodt, said about The Dissociative Disorders of Regina Louf: "During the examination of Regina Louf, it was obvious from many indications that it was a person who was seriously disturbed by prolonged sexual abuse in early childhood. But it is at the same time, and we see this very often, someone solid and intelligent, who has kept intact formidable defense and survival mechanisms. I think it can be said that the prolonged and very serious sexual abuse she suffered gave rise to the development of a multiple personality with alter-egos. Victims of rape or sexual abuse will tell you: "I was not there in this body, I was somewhere else... I dissociated myself." But this is not madness, it is not schizophrenia, nor mythomania. It is obviously the search for one's own story, one's truth, and it is a painful and groping process. "

At the age of 11, Regina Louf's mother introduced him to a certain Tony V. and said, "From now on you belong to him, he is your owner." This individual then became his "master". He had an ambiguous relationship with her, mixing pimping with an unhealthy attachment that was said to be love between the child and his master. This is nothing more and nothing less than trauma-based mind control. It was this Tony who was in charge of Regina and it was he who "remotely guided" her in the paedocriminal network. Even after she turned 18, Tony continued to pursue her, and although she got married, he managed to manipulate her to convince her sometimes to return to participate in ritual abuse: she had not managed to get away from it completely. Regina Louf's lawyer, Patricia van der Smissen, states in the documentary "Les Dossiers X" that she thought That Tony had somehow "protected" her and that this explained the fact that she stayed in vid[281!.] Slaves under mental control are usually under the direction of one or more people who hold the codes, triggers, to control and manipulate the victim. We find the same thing in the testimony of Cathy O'Brien who "belonged" to a certain Alex Houston, who was neither her husband, nor her friend, nor her tutor... he was his "Handler", his "owner", his "exploiter", his "master", his "trainer" holding the keys to his mind and directing his life from A to Z.

In her autobiography 'Zwijgen is voor daders - De getuigenis van XI' (Silence is for the guilty, the testimony of XI) published in 1998, Régina Louf describes how her alter personalities are always the same age as when they were created during traumatic experiences. She also explains how her writing differs depending on which alter is active. In this book, she clearly describes the phenomenon of dissociation that occurs during trauma, dissociative disorders that can go as far as a personality split.

"This book began to take shape in July 1988, when for the first time I wrote down my memoirs and nightmares in a notebook. I then discovered that I had different writing styles, and each type of writing was a very distinct part of "me". It was very scary, especially since often I didn't remember what I had written. When I reread the pages, I stumbled upon memories that had been buried in me for a long time. I had never really forgotten the facts, they had simply been scattered in different personalities, each with its own traumas... In the space of six weeks, I had already written a lot of the content of the book, a book that ended with the investigators of the BOB (...)

More than ever, I discovered that I had black holes. I went to school, I had good grades, I even had several classmates, but somehow it all happened without me. It was as if someone else took over as soon as the school doors closed behind me. As if the abused 'Ginie' was put aside until Tony stood in my bed again or at the school door. The abused 'Ginie' was hardly aware of school life and family life, the other 'Ginie' did not seem to be present during the abuse, and therefore she could live 'normally' (...)

In Knokke, at my grandmother's house, the adults had realized that I was talking with the voices in my head, that I was changing my mood quickly, or even that I was sometimes speaking with another voice or accent. Although I was only 5 or 6 years old, I understood that these things were weird and that it was not allowed. So I learned to hide my inner voices, my other 'me'. After what happened to Cio, this weird feeling that I was sometimes led by these inner voices became stronger. After the initiation, I no longer resisted the voices in my head. I was happy to disappear into nothingness, only to regain consciousness when Tony was there. The pain thus seemed more bearable (...)

Tony was the only adult who realized that something was wrong with my head. It did not bother him at all, on the contrary, he cultivated it... He gave me different names: "Pietemuis", "Meisje", "Hoer", "Bo". The names slowly became a part of me. The strange thing was that if he mentioned a name, the personality that corresponded to the name was immediately called.

"Pietemuis" (little mouse) became the name of the little girl he brought home after the abuse - a frightened and nervous little girl whom he could comfort by speaking to her in a benevolent and paternal way.

"Meisje" (girl) was the name of the part of me that belonged exclusively to him. If he abused me in my bed early in the morning, for example, or if there was no one around us.

"Hoer" (whore), was the name of the part of me that worked for him.

"Bo" was the young woman who took care of him if he was drunk and needed to be watched over.

"'Now you let me take care of this,' he said when I asked him with curiosity why he gave me so many names, he added: "Papa Tony knows you better than you know yourself"... And that was unfortunately true! [282]!."

The question that can be asked is who initiated this Tony on how to cultivate and exploit Regina Louf's dissociative identity disorder? Where did he receive the teachings about these mind control techniques? Is he himself a member of an occult network, of a secret society? Was he a victim of ritual abuse in his childhood and does he himself have a split and multiple personality? Is the division of personality systematic among the victims, and consequently among the aggressors who have generally been victims themselves in these infernal networks?

One of the minutes of the Dutroux case contains a particularly interesting report of a hypnosis session practiced by Dr. Mairlot on the witness Nathalie W., heard in the investigation of the X files: "On December 12, while Nathalie testifies, it takes three gendarmes and a psychologist to control and calm her. She has just started a series of auditions where she talks about extreme sexual sadism, ritual murders of babies and ceremonies that look very much like black masses. This is the time when some investigators are studying the most seriously in the world the secret satanic groups with which Dutroux and Weinstein would have had contact. On January 16, 23 and 30, 1997, Nathalie was hypnotized in the audition room by Dr. Mairlot, a specialist in the field. This does not clarify the investigation. "We mix the blood of the baby with that of the slaughtered sheep (...). They burn the baby and the sheep, and everyone sleeps with everyone (...) The monster is gone. They tear the baby's heart out." At the end of this session, Nathalie declares that she feels that she has attended this show from several angles at once, as if she herself were present through several personalities. "If only part of what she tells us is accurate, it is perfectly normal for it to happen like this", *theo Vandyck tells his*colleaguesl [283]}."

During the hypnotic trance, Nathalie W. Reported in writing satanic ritual abuses that took place in a castle during a full moon. She describes the sacrifice of a sheep and a baby around a fire, a ceremony followed by an. The end of the minutes reports in an enigmatic way:

"When she woke up, she had the impression that there were several people attending what she described and that these people (these Nathalies) were fading in front of the other. She thinks she has disappeared a dozen times! [284]]."

If we do not know the phenomenon of personality splitting, the dissociative identity disorder (T.D.I.), it is difficult to understand what this passage of the minutes means. Indeed, here it is reported that when she woke up from the hypnotic trance, Nathalie described that several of her alter personalities emerged to succeed each other during this hypnosis session. Each of them (these Nathalie) bringing pieces of memory on this specific event. It is noted that "these people were fading in front of each other, she thinks she disappeared a dozen times". This means that a dozen alter personalities (or alternating personalities) succeeded each other during the hypnosis session, each having experienced part of the ceremony at one time or another. The memory of the event is therefore broken into several pieces, like puzzle pieces preserved by the different fragments of Nathalie's personality. It is therefore difficult for a victim to remember the entire event in detail, coherently and chronologically, unless you access the memories of each alter personality who was involved and you can thus piece together the puzzle. The survivor Carole Rutz describes very well this phenomenon of memory bursting of a traumatic moment of life in a child already divided: the little victim passes from one alter personality to another throughout the event, one personality will live the transport, the other the abuses, yet another will attend or participate in the sacrifices, etc...

In the report of France 3 "Passed in silence: Witness XI - Régina Louf', Warrant Officer Patrick de Baets then in charge of file X in the Dutroux case, said about Régina Louf: "She had a problem to put everything on a timeline, but she gave enough elements to make a good investigation. It was actually a puzzle that was thrown on a table but that held the road and was coherent"

A large percentage of victims of ritual abuse and mind control therefore have Dissociative Identity Disorder, formerly known as "Multiple Personality Disorder", dissociative identity disorder being the ultimate stage in the scale of dissociative states. But it is important to remember that not everyone who has developed dissociative disorders has necessarily suffered trauma as a result of ritual abuse as described in this chapter.

Chapter 5

The Fractional and Amnesic Personality

''At the level of children, small children, it's very complicated... Trauma of this nature, of sexual assault, triggers quite specific psychological effects that manufacture in the victim a kind of psychological dissociation. This means, to make simple, that his body is there but that his head is elsewhere to be able to survive the event[285].

Martine Nisse, co-founder of the Buttes-Chaumont centre

"People have a whole range of abilities to cope with upsetting experiences. Some people, especially children, are able to disappear in a world of fantasy, to dissociate oneself, to pretend that it had never happened. they are thus able to continue their lives as if nothing had happened.

sometimes it comes back to haunt them."

Bessel van der Kolk - Trauma and Memory, 1993

"As we learn more and more about dissociation, we come to the conclusion that in individuals highly traumatized, it is a fairly common defense process aimed at keeping oneself safe and compartmentalizing these things separately because being far too difficult to integrate. "

Christine Courtois, auteur de "Healing the Incest Wound : Adult Survivors in Therapy"

1 - Introduction

Knowledge and understanding of dissociative disorders and more particularly dissociative identity disorder (personality) multiple) and traumatic amnesia is an essential point when one seeks to understand the process of trauma-based mind control.

Knowledge of these psychotrauma disorders makes it possible to grasp that the human mind can be divided into several independent identities from one another, separated, partitioned, by amnesic walls. we can thus understand that the mind of an individual is potentially programmable like a computer with files and access codes. that Personality fracking phenomenon is the cornerstone of abuse rituals because it "unlocks" the psyche which then becomes accessible to y integrate programming.

The horror and fear experienced by a ritually abused child means that his brain will react with varying degrees of dissociation proportional to the severity and repetition of traumatic experiences. It is a mechanism of natural defense in the face of intense psychic terror and physical pain extreme. Most of the children who were abused as well during the little one childhood will be totally dissociated from the events experienced and will often be unable to consciously remember what happened. Unbundling can go as far as the break-up of the personality into multiple alters, which is the most extreme stage, the one sought by the executioners who aim to establish mental control over the victim.

2 - Dissociation

In humans, the phenomenon of dissociation manifests itself to several degrees. It can be a slight trance, a minor dissociation of everyday life, such as when you read a book page for realize at the end that you have learned absolutely nothing from what you have just yet good to read. But this natural function can go up to a heavy psychopathology called dissociative identity disorder

(T.D.I.) : the most extreme degree of dissociation resulting from severe Trauma. The term "Dissociation" was first used in 1812, in a medical text written by Benjamin Rush, one of the fathers of American psychiatry.

In 1889, Dr. Pierre Janet (one of the French fathers of the concept of dissociation) wrote a thesis entitled "Automatism" mental'', in which he presents 21 cases of hysteria and neurasthenia, more than half of which are traumatic. Janet demonstrates that these States can be treated and reduced through hypnosis. For him, it is a question of a "dissociation of consciousness", hysteria being caused by the raw memory of the traumatic experience making band except in a corner of consciousness. Like a foreign body, this memory unconscious arouses archaic, inappropriate acts and daydreams, automatic, without connection with the rest of the consciousness, which it, continues to inspire detailed and adapted thoughts and actions[286].

As early as the beginning of the twentieth century, Pierre Janet and Charles Myers described this process of dissociation as a "split of the personality". Janet, long before the neurochemical causes of this phenomenon were established, explained that it was, in a form the system of defence of the individual and the systems that involve the management of daily life and the survival of the species. Myers describes this primary structural dissociation in terms of division between ''seemingly normal personality'' (PAN) and ''emotional personality'' (PE). PE gets stuck in traumatic experience and fails to become a a narrative of remembrance of trauma, i.e. a narrative memory. While the PAN is associated with the avoidance of traumatic memories, detachment, anesthesia and partial or total amnesia. These are indeed two distinct entities. Some clinical observations indicate, by for example, that they are associated with a different sense of self, and preliminary discoveries in experimental research on dissociative disorders of identity (T.D.I.) suggest that they respond differently to memories of trauma and preconsciously treated threatening stimuli[287].

Psychotrauma disorders were defined in the 80s starting with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (E.S.P.T.) which manifests itself as a result of a traumatic experience and which will persist over time with flashbacks, insomnia, nightmares, hypervigilance, etc. The definition of dissociative disorders subsequently arrived in the DSM-IV (Manual diagnosis and statistics of mental disorders - USA) which they are characterized by "a sudden or progressive, transient or chronic disturbance of normally integrated functions (consciousness, memory, identity or perception of the environment". They include the five the following disorders:

- Dissociative amnesia: characterized by an inability to evoke important personal memories, usually traumatic or stressful.

- Dissociative fugue: characterized by a sudden and unexpected departure from the home or place of work, with inability to remember one's past, i.e. the adoption of a new identity, which is a confusion about personal identity.

- Dissociative identity disorder (multiple personality): characterized by the presence of at least two distinct identities that take turns taking control of the individual; the latter is unable to evoke personal memories.

- Depersonalization disorder: characterized by a prolonged or recurrent feeling of detachment from one's own mental functioning or body, with the appreciation of reality remaining Intact.

- Unspecified dissociative disorder whose main characteristic is a dissociative symptom that does not respond not to the previous criteria of specific dissociative disorders.

American clinical psychologist James Randall Noblitt has classified the types of dissociation into five categories:
- Dissociation of consciousness: Occurs during trance states. Such states vary in intensity, which may range from a slightly foggy state to a deep state of amazement and of physical numbness.

- Memory dissociation: When the person has large portions of their memory that disappear without explanation. Dissociative amnesia is not explained by a shock to the head or by neurochemical effects (drugs, alcohol).
- Identity dissociation: When the individual suddenly experiences (consciously or unconsciously) that he or she is itself another person or an external entity. This phenomenon is the main common point between dissociative identity disorder and demonic possession.
- Dissociation of perception: Manifests itself in the modification of auditory, visual and tactiles that can be considered hallucinations. The unbundling of perceptions may also include a distortion of the meaning of reality by the individual who undergoes it.

- Dissociation of the will: The dissociation of the will involves automatisms, behaviors automatic and cataplexy or dissociative conversion disorder (a inability to move and exercise muscle tone).

the Book "Thanks for the Memories' by survivor Brice Taylor contains an interesting description of the phenomenon of physical and psychic dissociation. This is the testimony of a woman (Penny) who suffered repeated sexual abuse during her childhood: "Dissociation is a way to escape the intolerable. This happened as early as first trauma, it was a way to cope with physical pain unbearable but also to psychological pain. For me, it took the form of numbness and cooling of the body, and since that day, when I dissociate myself I become all numb. First of all these are my hands, then my feet, I can no longer feel them and if my eyes
